SCOTTISH NATION.

DALE

DALE, DAVID, an eminent manufacturer, the son of a grocer, was born at Stewarton, January 6, 1739 He worked as a weaver in Paisley till 1761, when he went to Glasgow, and became clerk in the shop of Mr Alston, a silk mercer He first commenced dealing in linen yarn, and, in connection with a Mr M'Intosh, in 1775 established the first works in Scotland for dyeing cotton Turkey-red After being a partner in a manufactory of inkles and tapes, he was, by Sir Richard Arkwright and Co appointed agent for the sale of their cotton yarn, and in 1785 began to erect mills at New Lanark, the first of the kind in Scotland for spinning cotton wool into yarn In 1800 he was one of the magistrates of Glasgow He established schools for the education of his workers, and throughout his life he was distinguished for his benevolence and public spirit He died March 17, 1806 Mr Dale originated and regularly preached to an independent religious sect in Glasgow His son-in-law, Mr Robert Owen, celebrated in his day for his visionary notions and socialist projects, ceased to have any connexion with the New Lanark works in 1827, and died in 1858

DALGARNO, a surname originally derived from the lands of Dalgarnock in Dumfries-shire The old family of Dalgarno of that ilk, however, were in Aberdeenshire. The name is now corrupted into Dalgarns.

It may be remarked that the prefix Dal is not, or at least not often, as generally stated, from the Saxon dahl or dale, but is more frequently a corruption of the Norman del or de la, as Dalmellington, De la moulme-ton, of the town of the mill Dalgarnock may therefore imply Del-garnock, or de la garnecca, of the large enclosure or defence for cattle, — garne in old French signifying a defence

DALGARNO

DALGARNO, GEORGE, a learned and original writer, was born in Old Aberdeen about 1626, and appears to have studied at Marischal college in New Aberdeen In 1657 he went to Oxford, where, according to Anthony à Wood, he taught a private grammar school with good success, for about thirty years He died of a fever August 28, 1687, and was buried, says the same author, "in the north body of the church of St Mary Magdalen" He seems to have been one of the first who conceived the idea of forming a universal language His plan is developed in a work, entitled 'Ars Signorum, Vulgo Character Universalis et Lingua Philosophica,' London, 1661, 8vo, from which, says Mr Dugald Stewart, it appears indisputable that he was the precursor of Bishop Wilkins in his speculations concerning "a real character and a philosophical language" Dalgarno was also the author of 'Didascalocophus, or the Deaf and Dumb Man's Tutor,' printed in a small volume at Oxford in 1680, the design of which he states to be to bring the way of teaching a deaf man to read and write, as nearly as possible to that of teaching young ones to speak and understand their mother tongue In his 'Account of a Boy born Blind and Deaf, in the seventh volume of the Transactions of the Royal Society of Edinburgh, Mr Stewart speaks very highly of this publication

DALGETY, a surname derived from a parish of that name in Fife, or from the lands of Dalgetty in Aberdeenshire, formerly belonging to a family of the same name. An old half-pay ensign of the name, who had served in the German wars, and resided in the village of Prestonpans, suggested to Sir Walter Scott his celebrated character of Captain Dalgetty in the 'Legend of Montrose.' De la gaste de Del gate, in the old French or modern Spanish for, of the wild cat, or of a party called after that animal.

DALGLEISH, a surname derived from a table-land of that name on the borders of Dumfries-shire, originally Dalglise, (De Paglise, pertaining to the church). The name possesses an historical interest from the circumstances that the earl of Bothwell who married Queen Mary had a confidential servant of the name of George Dalgleish, who was hanged and quartered for being concerned in the murder of King Henry (Lord Darnley), and whose very circumstantial and most interesting deposition is inserted with others in Pitcairn's Criminal Trials, vol. iii. page 495. In the sixteenth century there was an eminent minister of the name of Nicol Dalgleish, who was at one time one of the regents of the university of St. Andrews, and afterwards minister of St. Cuthberts parish, near Edinburgh. In December 1584, he was accused of praying for the banished ministers, but acquitted on trial of all the crimes laid to his charge, except the reading of a letter which Mr Walter Balcanquhal had sent to his wife out of England, for which he came in the king's will. He was detained in the Tolbooth for several weeks, during all which time the scaffold stood ready for his execution. He was afterwards transferred to the castle of St. Andrews, where he was for some time kept in ward. He subsequently took a prominent part in the affairs of the church, and was elected moderator of the General Assembly which met at Edinburgh the 2d of July 1591.

DALHOUSIE, earl and marquis of, the former a title in the Scottish peerage, and the latter in that of the united kingdom, (conferred on the tenth earl in 1849) possessed by a family of the name of Ramsay, of German origin, the first of whom in Scotland was Simon de Ramsay, who settled in Lothian under King David the First; and which, previous to its being ennobled, on several occasions made a conspicuous figure in Scottish history [See RAMSAY, surname of] A descendant of the above Simon, Sir Alexander Ramsay of Dalhousie, who lived in the fourteenth century, is celebrated as one of the bravest warriors of that age. He was appointed warden of the middle marches, and in 1342 constable of the castle of Roxburgh, which he had taken by escalade. Having been by David the Second nominated sheriff of Teviotdale, an office held by Douglas of Liddesdale, he was, out of envy, treacherously seized by that baron, and starved to death within the walls of Hermitage Castle.

The title is taken from the lands and barony of Dalwolsey, a name which may imply Del-wolsey, of Wolsey, an English name. Wolsey, or Woolsea, the island of wool, is nearly similar in signification to Ramsey or Ramsea, the island of Rams. This title was first conferred on William, second Lord Ramsay, (see RAMSAY, lord,) in 1629 who was created Earl Dalhousie of Dalhousie castle, and Lord Ramsay of Kerington in Mid Lothian, by Charles the First, on 29th of June 1633, to himself and his heirs male. He had the office of high sheriff of the county of Edinburgh 24th October 1646, and on May 4th 1648, he was nominated colonel of horse for Mid Lothian, for "the Engagement," in the duke of Hamilton's ill-appointed and hastily-levied army for the relief of Charles the First, out does not appear to have accepted the commission, as he sat in the parliament of the following January in which a severe act was passed against all who had joined in it. For his loyalty to the king, however, a fine of fifteen hundred pounds was imposed upon him by Cromwell's act of grace and pardon, 12th April 1654. He died 11th February 1674. He was twice married, and had four sons and three daughters. His first wife, Lady Margaret Carnegie, eldest daughter of David, first earl of Southesk, died in April 1661, and at her funeral, as appears from a curious Confession of one "Janet Watsone," accused of witchcraft, (inserted in the Appendix to Pitcairn's Criminal Trials, vol. iii.) "ther was ane rix-dollar given to Jean Baghane, to be pairted (divided) among a certain number of poore folks, whereof she was one," but Jean Baghane having run away with the money, to have amends on her for so doing, she gave herself over to the devil, &c.

His eldest son, George, second earl, only enjoyed the title one year, as he died in 1675. He had seven children. His third son, the Hon. George Ramsay of Carriden, entered the army, and in his youth served in Holland and the Low Countries. In 1690 he had the rank of brigadier-general, after the action at Valcour, and was appointed colonel of the Scottish regiment of guards. After the battle of Landen in 1693, he was promoted to the rank of major-general, and in 1702 to that of lieutenant-general, and appointed commander-in-chief of the forces in Scotland. He died at Edinburgh, 2d September 1705. Maky, in his Memoirs, describes him as a "gentleman of a great deal of fire, and very brave; of a sanguine complexion, well-shaped, a thorough soldier, and towards fifty years old." He had a daughter, who did not long survive him.

The eldest son, William, third earl, was, in 1678, appointed captain of the Edinburghshire militia. On 23d February 1682, he was sworn a privy councillor, and, soon after, constituted high sheriff of the county of Edinburgh, but died the same year (1682). He had three sons and a daughter, Lady Elisabeth, married to Lord Hawley.

George, the fourth earl, his eldest son, was under age at his father's death, and it appears from Fountainhall's Memoirs that the earl of Perth, then chancellor, who was a Roman Catholic, endeavoured, but without success, to get him sent to Douay, to be educated in the Popish religion. The young earl, who was unmarried, was killed in Holland, by one Mr Hamilton, in 1696.

His next brother, William, fifth earl, who succeeded him, took the oaths and his seat in parliament, 29th October 1700, and was appointed high sheriff of the county of Edinburgh, 24th February 1703. He steadily supported the union, and voted in favour of that measure on every division. On the breaking out of the war of the Spanish succession, he was colonel of the Scots guards in the forces sent to the assistance of the Archduke Charles of Austria (afterwards the emperor Charles the Sixth), in his competition with Philip of Bourbon, for the crown of Spain, and had the rank of brigadier-general, 1st January 1710. He died in Spain, unmarried, in October following. His younger brother, the Hon. James Ramsay, died young, and the earl had been persuaded by his mother to execute a disposition of his estate and honours in favour of his sister the Lady Hawley; but it was found to be ineffectual as regards the honours, and not valid as to the estate. Her ladyship, however, succeeded to his personal property.

The title descended to William Ramsay, son of the Hon. Captain John Ramsay, (second son of the first earl) by his wife Miss Sinclair. The sixth earl, who was a colonel in the army, was served heir to the fifth earl 9th February, 1711.

and died at Dalhaith 8th December 1739, in the seventy-eighth year of his age. He was twice married, and by his first wife had three sons and two daughters, who all, except the eldest son, died unmarried. George, Lord Ramsay, the eldest son, died in the lifetime of his father, at Dalhousie, 25th May 1739, aged about forty. By Jean, second daughter of the Hon. Harry Maule of Kelly, brother of James fourth earl of Panmure, he had seven sons, of whom four died young, two of them poisoned by eating the berries of the ivy The survivors were, Charles, seventh earl; George, eighth earl; and the Hon Malcolm Ramsay, lieutenant-colonel in the army, and deputy-adjutant-general to the forces in North Britain, who died, unmarried, at Edinburgh on 18th July 1783.

Charles, the seventh earl, succeeded his grandfather in 1739, and on 22d December 1758, was appointed captain of a company in the 3d regiment of footguards, with the rank of lieutenant-colonel in the army He died, unmarried, at Edinburgh, 29th January 1764, and was succeeded by his brother, George, the eighth earl, who had been admitted a member of the faculty of advocates in 1757 At the general election of 1774, the eighth earl was chosen one of the sixteen representatives of the Scots peerage, and rechosen in 1780 and 1784. On 25th February 1775, he was appointed one of the lords of police, an office which he held till the suppression of that board in 1782. In 1777 he was lord high commissioner to the General Assembly of the church of Scotland, and every year thereafter till 1783. On the death of his uncle, William, earl of Panmure, in 1782, without issue, the extensive estates of that nobleman devolved upon him in liferent, in virtue of a settlement executed by Lord Panmure in 1775, with remainder to his son, the Hon William Ramsay Lord Dalhousie died at Abbeville in France, 4th November 1787 A high eulogium of his lordship, in Latin, by his old preceptor, Professor George Stuart, is recorded in Douglas' peerage, Wood's edition, vol. i p. 407 His lordship married, 30th July 1767, Elizabeth, daughter of Andrew Glen, Esq., and niece and heiress of James Glen, Esq of Longcroft, Linlithgowshire, by whom he had seven sons and five daughters. George, the eldest son, became ninth earl. The second son, the Hon. William Ramsay, on his father's death, succeeded to the large possessions of the Panmure family, and in consequence assumed the name and arms of Maule of Panmure. In 1831, he was created Lord Panmure of Brechin and Navar, in the peerage of the United Kingdom [See MAULE, surname of, and PANMURE, lord.] James, the third son, was a lieutenant-general in the army, born 1st October 1772, died 15th November 1837 John, fourth son, also a lieutenant-general in the army, was on the general staff in India, born in 1775, and died 28th June 1842, leaving issue. The fifth son was named Andrew The sixth son, Henry, was in the naval service of the East India Company; and David, the seventh son, a captain in the army, died in 1801

George, ninth earl, a distinguished military commander, the eldest son of the eighth earl, was born 22d October 1770 He received his education at the High School and university of Edinburgh, and was a school companion and fellow-student of Sir Walter Scott. He entered the army as a cornet in the 3d dragoon guards, July 2, 1788, and soon after was appointed captain in an independent company raised by himself. On 4th January 1791, he was made captain in the 2d battalion of the royals, which he joined at Gibraltar In June 1792 he became, by purchase, major in the 2d foot, and went in command of that regiment to Martinique. In August 1794 he succeeded to the lieutenant-colonelcy, and in 1795, having been severely wounded, he returned to England. He served in Ireland during the rebellion of 1798. In 1799 he accompanied the expedition to the Helder, and was present in all the actions of the campaign in Holland. On 1st January 1800, he received the brevet of colonel, and in that year he was employed under General Maitland before Belle-Isle. He afterwards proceeded to Egypt, and was present in the actions of the 6th and 21st of March 1801 He commanded a detachment sent to reduce the forts of Aboukir and Rosetta, and subsequently advanced to Cairo. In 1802, he was placed in garrison at Gibraltar, and in 1803 appointed brigadier-general on the staff in Scotland. He received the rank of major-general, April 25, 1805. In May 1808 he was appointed to the staff in England, and afterwards served in the expedition to the Scheldt, and was latterly in command of Flushing.

On the evacuation of Walcheren in Dec. 1809, he returned to England, and was subsequently appointed to the staff in the Peninsula. During the peninsular war he commanded the seventh division. He received a medal and clasp for the battles of Vittoria and the Pyrenees, and was one of the general officers to whom the thanks of parliament were voted. On June 4, 1813, he was promoted to the rank of lieutenant-general, and on 11th Sep. following was made a military knight grand cross of the bath. He had been for some years a representative peer of Scotland, but Aug. 11, 1815, he was created a peer of the United kingdom as Baron Dalhousie of Dalhousie castle. In Aug. 1816, he was appointed to the command of Nova Scotia, and in 1819, he succeeded the duke of Richmond as captain-general and governor-in-chief of the forces in North America. He attained the full rank of general in 1830 He was also captain-general of the royal company of Archers or Queen's body-guard in Scotland. He died at Dalhousie Castle, March 21, 1838. By his countess, Christian, only child and heiress of Charles Broun, Esq of Coalstoun, East Lothian, he had 3 sons, George, Lord Ramsay, born 1806, died unm. 1832, Charles, born in 1807, died in 1817, and James Andrew Broun, tenth earl.

The latter, created in 1849, marquis of Dalhousie, of Dalhousie Castle and of the Punjaub, peerage of United kingdom was born April 22, 1812, and educated at Oxford university, where in 1838 he took the degree of M A In June 1843 he was appointed vice-president of the board of trade, and sworn of the privy council. From Feb 1845 to July 1846 he was president of that board. In 1845 he was constituted lord clerk register and keeper of the signet in Scotland, and the same year was made constable of Dover Castle, and lord warden, keeper and admiral of the Cinque Ports. In Aug. 1847, he was appointed governor-general of India, and he remained in that high office till July 1855. A knight of the Thistle, 1848. He m. January 21, 1836, Susan Georgiana, eldest dr of George marquis of Tweeddale, issue 2 drs., Lady Susan Georgiana, b 1837, and Lady Edith Christian, b. 1839, the latter m. in 1859, Sir James Fergusson of Kilkerran, bart. He died Dec. 19, 1860, when his title of marquis became extinct.

The Scottish titles of earl of Dalhousie, and Baron Ramsay, devolved on his cousin, Fox, 2d Lord Panmure, 11th earl (see PANMURE, Baron).

DALLAS, probably originally Delosse, a surname adopted from the barony of Dallos or Dollas, in the county of Elgin, and most likely derived from the Losse, which takes its rise in this barony The name corresponds with another Losse in Hautes-Pyrenees, being the region which history, tradition, and its topographical nomenclature point out as that whence the present population of Moray shire were introduced, on the expulsion of the original inhabitants by Malcolm the Fourth. Another, a Celtic derivation, has been attributed to the word, but it is unlikely that a barony under that settlement would bear a name given by an expelled people.

DALMAHOY, a surname derived from the barony of that name in Mid Lothian. The first on record appears to have been Henry de Dalmahoy, who lived in the reign of Alexander the Third. His name occurs in the Ragman Roll as among the Scottish barons who swore fealty to Edward the First in 1296. Richard de Dalmahoy, the third of that ilk, is particularly named in the burrow's rolls in the reign of King Robert the Second, as a free baron of Lothian. His son, Thomas de Dalmahoy, is witness in a charter from Robert duke of Albany, to Alexander Lauder of Hatton, 17th December 1408. In 1425, among the gentlemen of inquest at serving William Lord Somerville, heir to his father Thomas, first lord of that name, was Sir Alexander Dalmahoy of that ilk. A descendant of his, also Alexander Dalmahoy of that ilk, was, on 26th February 1534, one of the assize on the trial of Lord Sempill and others, for the slaughter of Cunningham of Craigends and his servant, when they were all acquitted. On July 17, 1572, Alexander Dalmahoy of that ilk was on the assize of George Wilkie, portioner of Sauchtonhall, and Robert Wilkie his son, for treasonably intercommuning with the earl of Huntly, Kirkcaldy of Grange, Sir James Balfour of Pittendreich and others, within the town of Edinburgh, after their forfeiture in 1571 On 10th July 1579, the laird of Dalmahoy, William Dalmahoy, his brother, John Dalmahoy, his uncle, and five others were indicted for besieging the house of Warriston in June 1578, then in the occupation of one William Somerville, but acquitted. In the forty-third General Assembly, which met at Edinburgh in October 1581, the laird of Dalmahoy was one of the twenty-four gentlemen to whom, with six ministers, was committed the consideration of the very important question as to how the temporal rights of the bishops were to be preserved, without prejudice to the king, when the office was abolished, on which, after due deliberation, they reported an overture, that for voting in parliament, assisting in council, commissioners from the General Assembly should supply the place of bishops, and as to their civil and criminal jurisdiction, the head bailiffs should exercise the same. On the 16th June, 1582, Dalmahoy of that ilk was one of the assize on the trial of George Hume of Spott, for being concerned in the murder of Henry Lord Darnley, in February 1566, when Hume was acquitted He was also one of the jury summoned on the trial, May 26, 1586, of Mr Archibald Douglas, parson of Glasgow and cousin of the Regent Morton, for the same crime, but not appearing he was fined in the sum of forty pounds.

The representative of this family in the reign of James the Sixth obtained by patent the hereditary office of under master of the royal household, which was confirmed by Charles the First, and the family were, in consequence, entitled to place one baton, gules, (as the principal master was entitled to two,) powdered with thistles of gold, and ensigned on the top with an imperial crown, wherein was set the royal crest of the kingdom, erect in pale behind the middle of the escutcheon of their arms.

In 1636, Sir Alexander Dalmahoy of that ilk, had a charter under the great seal of the lands and barony of Dalmahoy By his wife, Marion, daughter of James Nesbit of Dean, he had, with four daughters, two sons: John, his heir, and William of Ravelbridge, ancestor of the Dalmahoys of Ravelbridge. The eldest daughter was married to Henry Trotter of Morton Hall; the second, to Stewart of Blackhall; the third to Alexander Swinton Lord Mersington; and the fourth, Barbara, to Sir William Scott of Clerkington, from which marriage descended the Scotts of Malony, and the Blairs of Blair in Ayrshire

The elder son, John Dalmahoy of that ilk, was created a baronet by Charles the Second, by patent to him and his heirs male general, dated 2d December 1679. He married twice, and had, by his first wife, Lilias Elphinston, a daughter, married to Watson of Saughton, and two sons, Alexander and Robert. The elder son, Sir Alexander Dalmahoy, second baronet, married Alisa, daughter of John Paterson, archbishop of Glasgow, and had, besides a daughter, Margaret, wife of Alexander Campbell of Kinpont, two sons, Alexander, his heir, and William, father of Alexander Dalmahoy an eminent chemist in London

The eldest son, Sir Alexander, third baronet, left by Elisabeth Cornwall his wife, a son and successor, Sir Alexander Dalmahoy, fourth baronet, an officer in the French service, and knight of St. Louis, on whose death, the title became extinct. The estate of Dalmahoy, about the middle of the seventeenth century, was purchased by the Dalrymples, from whom it was bought, about the middle of the eighteenth century, by James earl of Morton, and it now belongs to that noble family

DALRYMPLE, (formerly written Dalrimpill,) a surname derived from a barony of that name, now a parish, in the district of Kyle, Ayrshire. There seems to be a conspiracy on the part of our Scottish topographers and statistical writers to deduce the names of places generally from the Gaelic, even in districts of the country where the Gaelic never prevailed. Hence, the name Dalrymple is said by some of them to be an abbreviation of the Gaelic words Dail-a'-Chruimpaill, signifying "the dale of the crooked pool," a derivation very likely discovered, as in many instances appears to have been the case, long after the name had become familiarly known, as it exactly describes the situation of the village where the church of Dalrymple stands, at a bend or turn of the river Doon A river, however, is not a pool, and the present parish church was not built till 1764 Others, rejecting this etymology, state that it is derived from Dal-ry-mole, also Gaelic, denoting the valley of the slaughter of a king or kings, there being a tradition that there was a battle fought, before the Christian era, in the valley of Dalrymple, in which two kings, Fergus and Colus by name, were slain. If it were so, the words Dalle-ros-mel—derived from the French, and signifying the vale of the meles of kings—would much better express the meaning The Saxon words dahl and krympe form the most obvious etymon, and together come nearest to the exact pronunciation of the name; the surface of the parish having, from the numerous rising grounds, or little mounds or knolls, with which it undulates throughout, a very rumpled or puckered appearance

The barony of Dalrymple was held in ancient times by a family who, according to the custom of those days, assumed their name from it. Adam de Dalrymple, the descendant of this family, lived in the reign of Alexander the Third, and died in 1300 His son, Gilchrist de Dalrymple was contemporary with Robert the Bruce. He had a son, Malcolm de Dalrymple, who, in the reign of David the Second, divided his lands between his two sons, John and Roland. On the 30th of May 1371, John Kennedy of Dunure, ancestor of the marquis of Ailsa, (to whom more than half of the parish of Dalrymple now belongs) obtained from Robert the Second a charter of confirmation of half the barony of "Dalrimpill," upon the resignation of Malcolm, the son of Gilchrist, the son of "Adam de Dalrimpill" and on 18th September 1377 the same John Kennedy obtained another charter from the same monarch of the other half of the barony, upon the resignation of Hugh, son of Roland de Dalrympill.

John, above-mentioned, the elder son of Malcolm, appears to have been the father of William de Dalrymple, who, in 1450, acquired the lands of Stair-Montgomery, in the same county, on his marriage with Agnes Kennedy, heiress of that estate, and grand-daughter of Malcolm de Carrick de Stair He was thus the first of the Dalrymples of Stair Their son, William Dalrymple of Stair, married Marion, daughter of Sir John Chalmers of Gadgirth in Ayrshire. This lady was one of the Lollards of Kyle, who were summoned, in 1494, before the king's council. They had a son, William, who predeceased his parents, leaving a son, William Dalrymple of Stair By his wife, Margaret, daughter of Wallace of Cairnhill, the latter had a son, James Dalrymple of Stair, who was one of the first who made open profession of the reformed doctrines. In 1544, he joined the earls of Lennox and Glencairn against the earl of Arran, then regent In 1545, he obtained a remission for being "in feir of weir" (warlike array) at the unlawful convocation of the queen's leges on the muir of Glasgow, with Mathew sometime earl of Lennox, and William earl of Glencairn. By his wife Isabel, daughter of George Crawford of Lochnorris, he had a son, James Dalrymple of Stair, who was one of those that signed the confession of faith, and entered into an association for the defence of the reformed religion in 1562 He joined Arran who, in 1548, had been created by the French king duke of Chatelherault, in France, and now bore that title, in his opposition to the marriage of the queen with Darnley in 1565, for which he obtained a remission in 1566. In the following year he entered into the association for the defence of the young king, James the Sixth. He died in 1586. His son, John Dalrymple of Stair, had a son, James Dalrymple, who succeeded him. His name occurs in the list of Ayrshire barons who, in 1600, were indicted for abiding from the raid of Dumfries appointed by the earl of Angus, warden of the west marches, for the trial and punishment of disorderly persons on the borders. He married Janet, daughter of Fergus Kennedy of Knockdaw, and died in 1624. His son, James Dalrymple, an eminent lawyer and statesman, was the first viscount of Stair (so created in 1692) of whom a memoir is given elsewhere. [See STAIR, first viscount.]

Sir James Dalrymple, the second son of the first viscount of Stair, first designated of Borthwick, afterwards of Killoch, and subsequently of Cousland, was the ancestor of the Dalrymples of Cranstoun, who now possess the earldom of Stair He was one of the principal clerks of session, a man of great learning, and one of the best antiquaries of his time. He published 'Collections concerning the Scottish History preceding the death of King David the First, anno 1153,' Edin 1705, 8vo; and 'Vindication of the Ecclesiastical part of his Historical Collections, in answer to a late Pamphlet, entitled The Life of John Sage, &c.' Edin. 1714, 8vo. He was created a baronet of Nova Scotia, 28th April 1698. He was thrice married, and had eight sons and five daughters. Admiral John Dalrymple, who died in October 1798, was his grandson, being the only son of his third son Robert, writer to the signet, to whom his father left the Killoch estate. The eldest son, Sir John Dalrymple, the second baronet, was designated of Cousland. He was one of the principal clerks of session, appointed on his father's demission from the office on 30th September 1708. He was twice married, and had five sons and six daughters. His first wife was Elizabeth, eldest daughter of William Fletcher of New Cranstoun, advocate, whose widow, his father, Sir James, had taken for his second wife. By Sir John's contract of marriage with Miss Fletcher, dated 7th August 1702, to which his father was a party, he acquired the lands of New Cranstoun, which estate, together with those of Cousland and Heriotmuir, in the county of Edinburgh, being the family estates, were entailed on the heirs of the marriage, with remainder to the other sons of Sir James. On Sir John's death, 24th May 1743, he was succeeded by his eldest son, Sir William Dalrymple, third baronet, of Cousland. He was twice married, and had eight sons and six daughters. His second son, William, a colonel in the army, distinguished himself on several occasions, particularly at the capture of Omoa, on the Spanish Main, in the West Indies, where he commanded. His uncle, Hugh, left him the Fordell estate in Mid Lothian, and the Cleland estate in Lanarkshire. He died in 1791, leaving issue. Three of Sir William's sons by his second marriage were also in the army The third baronet died 26th February 1771 Of his eldest son, Sir John Dalrymple, afterwards by right of marriage Sir John Dalrymple Hamilton Macgill, fourth baronet, an eminent lawyer and miscellaneous writer, a memoir is given below He married his cousin, Elizabeth Hamilton Macgill, daughter of Thomas Hamilton of Fala, Esq, and heiress and representative of the viscounts Oxenford (a title dormant since 1706), by whom he had a numerous family His eldest son, Thomas, died an infant. William, the second, a midshipman on board his majesty's ship Santa Margarita, was killed in the eighteenth year of his age, 29th July 1782, in an action with the Amazone French frigate, off the coast of Virginia. The third son also died an infant, and he was succeeded, on his death, in 1810, by his fourth son, Sir John Hamilton Dalrymple, fifth baronet, who assumed the name of Hamilton, through his mother, by whom the estates of Oxenford and Fala were acquired He was a general in the army, and colonel of the 26th regiment. He married on 23d June 1795, Henrietta, eldest daughter of the Rev Robert Augustus Johnson, at Kenilworth, in Warwickshire, and aunt of the earl of Craven, by whom he had no issue. This lady died in 1828, and he married, secondly, 8th June 1825, Adamina, daughter of Adam Viscount Duncan On the death of his kinsman, John William Henry, seventh earl of Stair, in March 1840, Sir John succeeded to that title as eighth earl, and was created a baron of the United Kingdom as Baron Oxenford of Cousland, 11th August 1841, with remainder to his brother, North Dalrymple, Esq of Cleland and Fordell, who succeeded as ninth earl of Stair, on the death of his brother in January 1853 See STAIR, earl of

Three other families of Dalrymple, all descended from the first Viscount Stair, bear the honours of the baronetage, namely, the Dalrymples of North Berwick, the Dalrymples of Hailes in Haddingtonshire, now Dalrymple-Fergusson, bart. (see p 7), and the Dalrymples of High Mark, Wigtonshire; the former two of Nova Scotia, created respectively in 1697 and 1700, and the latter of Great Britain, created in 1815

Sir Hew Dalrymple, the first baronet of North Berwick, was the third son of the first Viscount Stair He was admitted advocate 23d February 1677, and afterwards constituted one of the commissaries of Edinburgh, on the resignation of his brother, Sir James. On 11th January 1695 he was chosen dean of the faculty of advocates, in place of Sir James Stewart, lord advocate, and held that office till his elevation to the bench He was created by King William a baronet, 29th April 1697, and by letter dated 17th March 1698 he was nominated by the king president of the court of session, in the room of his father, that office having been vacant since his death in 1695. Some opposition to his admission in the usual manner,—that is, without undergoing his probationary trials, by hearing causes for three days in the outer house, as customary with the other judges,—was occasioned by the discontent of Sir William Hamilton, Lord Whytlaw, who expected to have got this appointment, through the interest of Lord Tullibardin, at that time secretary of state. When Sir Hew Dalrymple was sitting as Lord Probationer, Lord Whytlaw shunned to sit with him in the outer house. [Fountainhall's Decisions, vol. ii. p. 1.] After undergoing the usual probation, he was admitted, took the oaths, and his seat as president of the court of session, 7th June 1698. He represented the burgh of New Galloway in the Scots parliament from 1696 to 1702, and in 1703 he sat as member for North Berwick. In 1706 he was one of the commissioners appointed to arrange the articles of Union, of which he was a steady supporter Besides being president of the court of session, he was also a commissioner and trustee for improving the fisheries and manufactures of Scotland.

In 1713 he was much annoyed by the chancellor (Seafield) who frequently presided in court, and claimed the right of subscribing the decisions. President Dalrymple, in consequence, absented himself from the house, for the purpose of forming a party in the court against the chancellor [Wodrow's Analecta, MS. iii. 254.] In 1726, he went to London, to solicit permission to resign with a pension equal to his salary, and also to procure the appointment of an ordinary lord of session for his second son Hew In the latter object he was successful, but not so in the former Sir Robert Walpole opposed giving him a pension upon his resignation, as forming a bad precedent, and the answer to his application was, according to Wodrow, "that the king was so well pleased with his services as president, he could not want him at the head of that society," on which that writer remarks, "thus, as the English speak, is a being kicked up stairs." [Ibid. ii 184.] He continued president till his death, on 1st February 1737, in the eighty-fifth year of his age. Macky in his Memoirs, page 211, says of him, "He is believed to be one of the best presidents that ever was in that chair, and one of the completest lawyers in Scotland; a very eloquent orator, smooth and slow in expression, with a clear understanding, but grave in his manner" Lord Woodhouselee in his life of Lord Kames (vol. i. p. 30) passes this eulogium on President Dalrymple: "If he inherited not the distinguished talents of his father, the viscount of Stair, and his elder brother the secretary, he was free from that turbulent ambition and crafty policy which marked the characters of both; and, with sufficient knowledge of the laws, was a man of unimpeached integrity, and of great private worth and amiable manners." His lordship collected the decisions of the court of session from June 1698 to 21st June 1720, printed at Edinburgh in 1758, folio. He was twice married, first to Marion, daughter of Sir Robert Hamilton of Preesmannon, one of the lords of session, by whom he had five sons and three daughters, and secondly, to Elizabeth, daughter of John Hamilton of Olivestob, Esq., the widow of Hamilton of Bangour, and mother of the poet, by whom he had no issue. Robert, his eldest son, was created a knight bachelor, and died before his father His son succeeded as the second baronet, as after stated.

Hew Dalrymple of Drummore, the second son, was born 30th November 1690, and admitted advocate 18th November 1710. Being appointed a lord of session, he took his seat on the bench 29th December 1726, by the judicial title of Lord Drummore, and on 13th June 1745 was nominated a lord of justiciary. He died at his seat of Drummore, in the county of Haddington, 18th June, 1755. Being at the time of his death governor of the Edinburgh Musical Society, the members of that body met in Mary's chapel on the 27th of the same month, and performed a concert as a token of respect for his lordship's memory, which was attended by a numerous company, all dressed in deep mourning. [Scots Mag vol. xviii. p. 316.] Lord Woodhouselee, in his Life of Lord Kames (vol. i. p. 36), describes Lord Drummore as having "inherited the talents and genius of his forefathers, and as having been an acute and sound lawyer, and possessed of a ready, distinct and forcible, though not a polished elocution;" and as having had "a great command of wit and humour.' By his wife, Miss Horn, heiress of Horn and Westhall, Aberdeenshire, he had twelve children. His second son, Hugh Horn Dalrymple of Westhall or Westerhall, died without issue. Robert, the third son, succeeded his brother, and took the name of Horn, also of Elphinstone, having married the daughter and heiress of Sir James Elphinstone of Logie in Aberdeenshire. [See ELPHINSTONE, surname of.] David, the fourth son, passed advocate 8th January 1743, and was appointed sheriff depute of Aberdeen in 1748. He was named a lord of session, and took his seat on the bench as Lord Westhall, 10th July 1777 He died 26th April 1784, in the sixty-fifth year of his age

James the third son of President Dalrymple, was designed of Nunraw John, the fourth son, a captain in the Enniskillen dragoons, who died at Ayr, where he latterly resided, 19 April 1753, was the father of Lieutenant-general Sir Hugh Whiteford Dalrymple, created a baronet in 1815, of whom afterwards. William, the fifth son, a captain in the army, married a lady, who was cruelly murdered in her own house in Cavendish Square, London, on the 25th March 1746, by her footboy, after receiving upwards of forty wounds.

Sir Robert Dalrymple, the eldest son of the first baronet of North Berwick, (who as above stated predeceased his father,) was a knight bachelor, and was twice married, first in March 1707 to Johanna Hamilton, only child of John master of Bargeny, and secondly to Anne, eldest daughter of Sir William Cunningham of Caprington By the former he had three sons and two daughters, and by the latter he had four sons and a daughter, Anne, married to the fifth earl of Balcarres.

Sir Hew, the eldest son, succeeded his grandfather, in 1734. John, the second son, who was an advocate, got, in right of his mother, the estate of Bargeny, by a decree of the house of peers in 1739, upon the death of his mother's cousin, James, fourth Lord Bargeny, when he was obliged to change his name to Hamilton, [see ante, BARGENY, Lord, page 251,] but dying without issue, 12th February 1796, the estates returned to the elder branch, who also assumed the name as afterwards mentioned. Robert, the third son, was a physician. William, the fourth son, and eldest by the second marriage, was a Spanish merchant long settled at Cadiz. James, the fifth son, was a captain of dragoons. Charles, the sixth, took for his second wife, 23d December 1769, Mrs. Dalrymple, widow of Colonel Campbell Dalrymple, of the family of Drummore, and formerly governor of Guadaloupe. Stair, the youngest son, died in India.

Sir Hew, the second baronet, was M P for Haddingtonshire. In 1756 he obtained a reversionary grant of the office of king's remembrancer in the exchequer for Scotland, to which he succeeded in 1768. He died at London 30th November 1790. He was twice married, and by his first wife, a Miss Sainthill, daughter of a surgeon in London, he had two sons. Robert Stair Dalrymple, the elder, died at Manchester, 11th September 1768, in the twenty-fourth year of his age, being then a captain of dragoons.

The younger son, Sir Hew Dalrymple, third baronet, as-assumed the name of Hamilton, in addition to his own, on succeeding to the Bargeny estate, 12th February 1796, by the death of his uncle, John Hamilton, Esq., advocate, as above stated. He married Janet, second daughter of William Duff, of Crombie, Esq, by whom he had ten sons and four daughters, all of whom died young, except four sons and two daughters. He was for some years in the army, but sold out on his marriage in 1774. He represented the county of East Lothian in several parliaments, and died at Bargeny, 18th January 1800. The second son, John, was a lieutenant-general in the army

His eldest son, Sir Hew Dalrymple-Hamilton, the fourth baronet, of North Berwick and Bargeny, born 3d January 1774, was seven years in the guards and one in the dragoons. He first represented the county of Haddington and afterwards Ayrshire in parliament. He was also lieutenant-colonel of the Ayrshire militia. He married at London 19th May 1800, the Hon. Jane Duncan, eldest daughter of Adam, first Viscount Duncan, by whom he had a daughter, Henrietta-Dundas, born 8th November 1801, married in 1822 to Augustin-Louis-Joseph-Assimir-Gustave-de-Franquetot, duc de Coigny in France. This lady now possesses the Bargeny estates in Ayrshire. Sir Hew died 23d February 1834, and was succeeded by his brother, Major-general Sir John Dalrymple Hamilton, who married 30th July 1806, Charlotte, only daughter of Sir Patrick Warrender of Lochend, Bart., and had two sons and five daughters. He died 26th May 1835.

His eldest son, Sir Hew Hamilton-Dalrymple, sixth baronet, born in 1814, entered the army, and in 1847 became lieutenant-colonel of the 71st foot, but retired in 1852 He served at the capture of Coorg in the East Indies in April 1834, and in 1846 was appointed a deputy-lieutenant of Haddingtonshire. He married in 1852 the only daughter of Robert Arkwright, Esq of Sutton Scarsdale, Derbyshire. Heir presumptive, his brother, John Warrender

The first of the Dalrymples of Hailes, who became so distinguished, was the Hon Sir David Dalrymple, an eminent lawyer, the fifth son of the first viscount of Stair He was created a baronet on the 8th May 1700, and in 1708 was member for Culross in the Scots parliament. In 1706 he was one of the commissioners for arranging the articles of Union, and was afterwards lord advocate of Scotland in the reigns of Queen Anne and George the First (from 1709 till 1720). His eldest son, Sir James Dalrymple, the second baronet, held the office of auditor of the exchequer By his wife, Lady Christian Hamilton, second daughter of Thomas, sixth earl of Haddington, he had sixteen children. Sir David, the eldest, was the celebrated Lord Hailes, the eminent lawyer and accurate historian, of whom a memoir is given below, as is also one of the fifth son, Alexander, the distinguished hydrographer John, the fourth son, lord provost of Edinburgh in 1774, and in several succeeding years, married Anne, daughter of Walter Pringle, Esq. of St. Kitts, by whom he had two sons, James and John. Provost Dalrymple died 8th August 1779

Sir David Dalrymple, Lord Hailes, married first, on 12th November 1763, Anne Brown, only daughter of Lord Coalston, one of the lords of session, by her he had a son who died an infant, and a daughter, Christian, born on the 28th December 1765, who inherited the family estate, and died on the 9th January 1838. Lady Dalrymple died 18th May 1768, and on 20th March 1770, Lord Hailes married, secondly, Helen, youngest daughter of Sir James Fergusson, baronet, Lord Kilkerran, also a lord of session, and by her had a daughter, Jane, born 30th May 1777, and married, 8th November 1799, her cousin James Fergusson, Esq., who, in 1813, on the death of his uncle, Sir Adam Fergusson, became Sir James Fergusson, fourth baronet, of Kilkerran. Leaving no male issue, the baronetcy, on the death of Lord Hailes, in 1792, descended to his nephew, James.

Sir James, the fourth baronet, the elder son of John Dalrymple, lord provost of Edinburgh, perished at sea in the end of the year 1800, and was succeeded by his brother, Sir John Pringle Dalrymple, a colonel in the army On his death, 17th October 1839, the title became extinct, and in January 1838, the estate of New Hailes fell to Sir Charles Fergusson of Kilkerran, who took the name of Dalrymple before his own. [See DALRYMPLE-FERGUSSON, surname of]

The family of Dalrymple of High Mark, Wigtonshire, and Delrow Castle, Hertfordshire, who also possess a baronetcy, are descended from Captain John Dalrymple of the Enniskillen dragoons, the fourth son of the Hon. Sir Hew Dalrymple, first baronet of North Berwick, as above mentioned. Captain Dalrymple had an only son, Sir Hew Whiteford-Dalrymple, a general in the army, and colonel of the 51st foot, born at Ayr, 3d December 1750, and knighted at St. James', 5th May 1779 He was created a baronet 6th May 1815. He married 16th May 1788, Frances, youngest daughter and coheir of General Francis Leighton, and had two sons and three daughters. He died 9th April 1830 Sir Adolphus-John, second baronet, born in London, 3d February 1784, married in June 1812, Anne, daughter of Sir James Graham, first baronet of Kirkstall, M P for Carlisle, without issue a lieutenant-general in the army, was M P for Weymouth in 1817, for Appleby in 1819 and 1820, for the Haddington district of burghs from 1826 to 1831, and for Brighton in 1837 The brother of the 2d baronet, Leighton-Cathcart Dalrymple, C B., lieut.-col. 15th hussars, died unmarried in 1820

DALRYMPLE, JAMES, first Viscount Stair, an eminent lawyer and statesman, son of James Dalrymple of Stair, and Janet, daughter of Fergus Kennedy of Knockdaw, (see ante, p 5,) was born at Drummurchie, Ayrshire, in May 1619 He lost his father before he had attained his fifth year, and after receiving the elementary part of his education at the school at Manchlin, he was sent, at the age of fourteen, to the university of Glasgow, and in 1637 took the degree of master of arts In the following year he had a company of foot in the earl of Glencairn's regiment In 1641 he stood a candidate, in military uniform, for the chair of philosophy in Glasgow college, and was the successful competitor In 1647 he resigned his professorship, and having turned his attention to the study of the civil law, he was, in February 1648, admitted an advocate, and soon became eminent at the bar In 1649 he was appointed secretary to the commissioners sent to Breda, to invite Charles the Second to come to Scotland, and during his absence he was appointed by the parliament one of the commissioners for revising the ancient books of law, the acts of parliament, and practice of the several judicatures. He returned home in 1650 with the other commissioners, some time before the king, but waited upon his majesty at his landing in Scotland, as appears from the following entry in Balfour's Annals (vol iv. p 18) · "20 May The housse this afternoone dispatched Arthur Erskyne of Scottscraige, to the northe, with instructions to attend the king's landing, and with him Mr James Dalrymple, the commissioners secretary, with letters to them" He afterwards used every exertion to unite all parties for the king's interest, and also in raising an army for the invasion of England After the king's defeat at Worcester he continued his practice as an advocate, bnt when the oath called the Tender was imposed, he and a number of the most eminent lawyers of the day absented themselves from the court, and did not again attend its sittings till Cromwell either laid the oath aside, or did not insist upon its being taken In July 1657 he was, on the recommendation of General Monk, approved of by Cromwell as one of the commissioners for the administration of justice in Scotland He seems to have been a great favourite with Monk, who consulted him on various matters of state, and particularly before marching with his army into England in 1659 When he asked his opinion as to the best mode of settling the three nations, he advised him to call a full and free parliament, and at the same time earnestly recommended that the courts of justice, which had for some time been interrupted in their sittings, might be again opened This advice was followed by Monk, as appears by his letters addressed to Sir James Dalrymple, dated from Dunstable, 7th June 1659, which Forbes says he saw in the possession of Sir James Dalrymple of Borthwick [Forbes' Journal, quoted in Haig and Brunton's Senators of the College of Justice, page 364] At the restoration he repaired to London to wait on Charles the Second, by whom he was knighted, and made one of the lords of session, 14th February 1661 On the 4th November 1662 he was appointed vice-president in absence of the president In 1663, when the declaration was enacted, he resigned his seat on the bench rather than subscribe it, and with his eldest son went on a tour to France. On his return he waited on the king at London, when his majesty intimated to him that he could not accept of his resignation, and would rather allow him to explain in what sense he could sign the declaration; and, having done so to the satisfaction of the king, his majesty addressed a letter to the lords of session, dated 21st April 1664, stating his pleasure that he should continue one of their number, on receipt of which they again reponed him in his office He then signed the declaration, with the qualification that "he was content to declare against whatever was opposite to his majesty's just right and prerogative" He was created a baronet, June 2, 1664, and in 1670 was appointed one of the commissioners to treat of a union of the two kingdoms, an attempt which at that time proved abortive. He was shortly after appointed a privy councillor, and in January 1671 he succeeded Gilmour of Craigmillar as lord president In consequence of "the many great and signal services" done to the city of Edinburgh by Sir James Dalrymple, the Town Council, on the 15th December 1676, passed a resolution that he and all future presidents of the court of session should have their house rent paid by the town, a privilege which was relinquished by President Forbes in the year 1741 When the course of persecution of the Presbyterians began under Lauderdale, Sir James Dalrymple used all his influence with that minister to pursue moderate measures, which gave great offence to Archbishop Sharp and the prelatical party He also did all he could to dissuade the duke from bringing in the Highland host upon the western counties, but not succeeding he entered his dissent against this inroad in the Council books [Murray's Literary History of Galloway, p 139] According to Burnet, however, [Hist of His Own Times, vol ii p 136] Sir James pretended that by a fall his hand was out of joint "so he signed none of these wild orders" In 1681, when the famous test act was proposed in the Scots parliament, Sir James, with the view of neutralising it, suggested that the first, or Knox's Confession of Faith, should be added, which was adopted. This highly offended the duke of York, and as he himself refused to take it, he was obliged to resign his office of president, and retire to his country seat in Wigtonshire. Receiving a hint from the king's advocate that it was intended to commit him to prison, he deemed it expedient to take refuge in Holland in October 1682 At Leyden he published his 'Physiologia nova Experimentalis,' by which he acquired considerable reputation During his exile, Spence, the secretary of Argyle, having under torture confessed that Sir James Dalrymple was privy to the Ryehouse plot, he was prosecuted for treason, and outlawed on the 17th March 1685, but his son, Sir John Dalrymple, becoming Lord Advocate in 1687, procured him a pardon The subjoined woodcut is from an engraving of his portrait by Sir John Medina, in Park's Walpole's Royal and Noble Authors·

While he resided in Holland, he was much in favour with the prince of Orange, and before he sailed for England he asked his highness what was his true design in invading his father-in-law's dominions The prince replied that it was for the glory of God, and for securing and establishing the Protestant religion, on which the aged statesman, who had spent six years in exile for the same cause, pulled off his wig and said, "Though I be now in the seventieth year of my age, I am willing to venture that (meaning his head,) my own and my children's fortunes in such an undertaking" He accompanied the prince to England, and was consulted by him in the arrangements of government consequent on the Revolution, as he had been by Monk previous to the Restoration, which shows that in both of these remarkable crises of affairs, the greatest reliance was placed on his political sagacity and judgment by the prime movers in them After the settlement of affairs, he was re-appointed lord president of the court of session, November 1, 1689, and raised to the peerage, under the title of Viscount Stair, Lord Glenluce and Stranraer, on the 21st April 1690 He died November 25, 1695, in the 76th year of his age

DALRYMPLE, JOHN, 2d earl of Stair See STAIR

DALRYMPLE, SIR DAVID, LORD HAILES, an eminent lawyer, antiquary, and historian, the eldest son of Sir James Dalrymple, second baronet of Hailes, and brother of Alexander Dalrymple, the eminent hydrographer, a memoir of whom is subsequently given, was born at Edinburgh October 28, 1726 He was educated at Eton school, and after attending the university of Edinburgh, studied the civil law at Utrecht He returned to Scotland in 1746, and was admitted advocate February 23, 1748 As a barrister he was not distinguished, for his utterance was rapid, and his articulation rather indistinct But his deep knowledge of law, his unwearied application, the solidity of his judgment and his probity, raised him to high esteem He continued eighteen years at the bar before he was raised to the bench. During this period he dignified his profession by uniting scientific researches with those of law, directing the lights of history and antiquities on its obscurities In 1751 appeared his first publication, a collection of 'Sacred Poems' From that period scarcely a year passed in which he did not print some original work of his own, or revise and bring into notice some learned and useful publication by others, neglected and in danger of being lost to posterity Every edition almost which he published he improved On the death of Lord Nisbet, he was, in March 1766, created a lord of session, when he assumed the title of Lord Hailes, and on the resignation of his father-in-law, Lord Coalston, he was appointed, 3d May 1776, one of the lords of justiciary As a judge, he was distinguished for his strict integrity, unwearied diligence, and dignified demeanour One of his characteristics, however, was a minute observance of forms, which often exposed him to ridicule His lordship became more conspicuous as a scholar and author than as a judge His researches were chiefly directed to the history and antiquities of his native land, and to the illustration of the early state of the Christian Church The first volume of his 'Annals of Scotland' appeared in 1776, and the second in 1779 This, the most important of his works, contains the history of fourteen princes, from the accession of Malcolm Canmore to the death of David the Second In 1776, also, he published the first volume of the remains of 'Christian antiquity,' a work of great erudition, containing accounts of the martyrs of Smyrna and Lyons in the second century, with explanatory notes, dedicated to Bishop Hurd The second volume, dedicated to Dr. Newton, bishop of Bristol, appeared in 1778, and the third volume in 1780, dedicated to Dr Thomas Balgray He published several other works treating of the early ages of Christianity, which were evidently suggested by the appearance of Gibbon's 'Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire,' and in the critical notes to these he ably exposes the misrepresentations and inaccuracies of that historian In 1786 he published a quarto volume, entitled 'An Inquiry into the Secondary Causes which Mr Gibbon has assigned for the rapid Progress of Christianity,' which he inscribed to Dr Hurd, bishop of Worcester, and which was a complete answer to Gibbon's statements and conclusions. His lordship wrote also a few sketches of eminent Scotsmen, designed as specimens of a Biographia Scotica. His writings are distinguished by sound judgment, acuteness, fidelity, accuracy, and candour rarely equalled. In accuracy he is not approached by any historical writer of his time It is his most characteristic quality The writer of the preface to an octavo edition of his 'Annals' very justly observes that "an historian was wanting whose principal endowments were a sagacious spirit of criticism to distinguish truth from falsehood, and a freedom from prejudice to let that truth be known He wages war in every page with credulity and imposture, and his industry in exploring the sources of authentic history is equally commendable with the zeal which he has shown in clearing these sources from every taint of fiction" The historical documents and state papers, which have been discovered since his day, testify strikingly to his wonderful correctness in many details that would have been passed over by an ordinary historian The deep research, scrupulous fidelity in examining authorities, as well as the acute judgment and judicious spirit of investigation for which he was so remarkable, admirably fitted him for the branch of historical inquiry on which he entered, and his Annals continue to be consulted and followed by all writers desirous of attaining to the truth on the most obscure portion of our national history It is only to be regretted that he stopped at a period of no less interest, the accession of the House of Stuart In his labours and studies, he was persevering and indefatigable, scarcely allowing himself any recreation or exercise whatever Except regular motion in his carriage five days a-week during session between his seat at New Hailes, five miles from Edinburgh, and the Court, with his journeys during the circuit twice a-year, and sometimes after it short excursions to England, his habits were almost quite sedentary

Predisposed by corpulence and by the form of his body, which was shortnecked, he was attacked by symptoms of apoplexy on his way from the court of session, when about to come out of his carriage near his own door at New Hailes, on the 26th November 1792 He obtained some temporary relief, but died of a second attack, on the 29th, in the sixty-seventh year of his age A funeral sermon was preached on the occasion by the Rev Dr Carlyle of Inveresk He was twice married, as already stated

DALYELL, Dalziel, or Dalzell, an ancient and local surname taken from the barony of Dalziel in Lanarkshire, now the name of a parish there. The name is supposed to mean "the white dale" or meadow (Dal-ghéal, Gaelic,) from the whitish scurf on the surface of the clay-soil, or large white gowan which covered the ground before it was improved by cultivation. This is a more likely derivation than the one given by tradition, as follows The armorial bearing of the family of Dalzell was anciently a man hanging on a gibbet, a device which Nisbet says was intended to perpetuate the memory of a dangerous exploit of one of their progenitors, in taking down from a gibbet the body of a favourite kinsman of King Kenneth the Second, who had been hanged by his enemies. For, as the story goes, the king being exceedingly grieved that the body of his friend should be allowed to hang there, proffered a great reward to any of his subjects who would venture to cut it down, but no one would undertake that hazardous enterprise, until a brave gentleman of the court said to the king, Dal zell, which in the old Scottish language signifies "I dare." His posterity, in consequence, took the word Dalzell for their surname, with the signification thereof, "I dare," for their motto. [Nisbet's System of Heraldry, vol i. page 332.] In the old Scottish language, however, if by that is meant the Celtic, there are no words approaching to Dalyell, either in sound or spelling. It is not improbable, however, that the legend had some foundation, the authentic record of which is lost.

Thomas de Dalziel is mentioned in the Ragman Roll, as one of the great barons that swore fealty to King Edward the First in 1296. He was afterwards one of the patriots who joined King Robert the Bruce.

Sir Robert de Dalzell, knight, his successor, continued faithful to King David Bruce, during his captivity in England, and from that monarch he got the sergeantship of Lanark, and, with other lands, the barony of Selkirk. The charter of the latter grant is dated 15th May 1365 He was one of the Scottish barons who, in 1379, became surety to Hakon the Sixth, king of Norway, that Henry Sinclair, earl of Orkney, should faithfully govern the Orkney islands. and in 1380 he was sent over to Norway by the earl. He died the same year immediately on his return home.

The next mentioned is Sir William de Dalyell, a brave and humorous knight, who lost an eye at the battle of Otterburn in 1388. He accompanied Sir David Lindsay of Glenesk, afterwards earl of Crawford, to the famous tournament on London bridge in 1390, in which Lindsay was the victor, and is celebrated for the ready reply he made to an English knight, who, jealous of the honour of his countrymen, admitted that there were brave men in Scotland, but they were, he said, the issue of the illicit intercourse of the English with the Scottish ladies during the time that the former overrun their kingdom; to which Sir William replied that if the allegation were true, it was no less certain that a proportional degeneracy had taken place among the English warriors, who were the offspring of valets, cooks, and father-confessors, whom the English ladies had admitted to their arms during the absence of their rightful lords in Scotland. This reply was reported to the English sovereign, who applauded the spirit and humour shown in it, and, immediately after, Sir Piers Courtenay, a gallant English knight, appeared, attended by a numerous retinue, and bearing a falcon embroidered on his sleeve, with a scroll having the following motto, in token of defiance:

"I beir ane falcone, fairest of flicht
Qwha so pinches at her, his deth is dicht
In graith."

Sir William Dalyell assumed a similar dress, with the badge of a magpie, and this device

"I beir ane pi, pykkand at ane pese,
Quha so pykis at her, I sal pyk at his nase,
In faith."

The challenge was understood and accepted. In the first course the Scottish knight twice lost his helmet, but he succeeded in wounding the English champion, and the contest terminated in a ludicrous demand of Dalyell, that, as by the laws of tournament the champions ought to be perfectly equal, Courtenay, of course, should have one of his eyes put out to render him equal to himself He recovered the estate of his ancestors, which had been forfeited in the reign of David the Second (see CARNWATH, earl of, page 593), and had two sons, George and John

George, the elder, obtained, on the resignation of James Sandilands, brother-in-law of King Robert the Third, a charter of the barony of Dalyell in the county of Lanark, to him and the heirs male of his body, whom failing to the heirs male of his father, Sir William de Dalyell, 5th July 1395 He predeceased his father before 1400

Sir John de Dalyell, the younger son, had a letter of safe-conduct to pass into England with four other knights and sixty horse in their train, to treat about national business, 24th July 1392. [Fœdera, iii. iv 81.] From him was descended Robert Dalyell of that ilk, who was killed at Dumfries in a skirmish between Lords Maxwell and Crichton 30th July 1508. The second after him was Sir Robert Dalyell of Dalyell, who firmly adhered to Queen Mary in all her troubles, and was engaged on her side at the battle of Langside. He was the father of another Robert, who married Janet, daughter of Gavin Hamilton of Raploch, commendator of Kilwinning, and by her had a son, the first earl of Carnwath. See CARNWATH, earl of

The family of Dalyell of Binns in Linlithgowshire, whose possesses a baronetcy, is one of the oldest cadets of the name. Thomas Dalyell of Binns (born in 1571, died in 1642), a lineal descendant of the Lanarkshire Dalyells, who became earls of Carnwath, by his wife, Janet, eldest daughter of Edward Bruce, the first Lord Kinlos, had, with two daughters, a son, Thomas, the celebrated General Dalyell, of whom a memoir is given below in larger type. By his wife, a daughter of Ker of Cavers, General Dalyell had a son, Thomas Dalyell of Binns, a captain in the army, who immediately after his father's death was created, by James the Seventh, a baronet of Nova Scotia, by patent dated 7th November 1685, to himself and his heirs or entail succeeding to the estate of Binns, in consideration of the "innumerable, faithful, and eminent services of General Dalyell to Charles the First and Second, and, notwithstanding all losses and injuries sustained, that his fidelity remained unshaken, and further, considering that Captain Thomas Dalyell, his eldest son, has on all occasions testified the like alacrity in promoting our service, &c." By his wife, Catherine, daughter of Sir William Drummond of Riccarton, he had a son, Thomas, and two daughters.

The son, Sir Thomas Dalyell, the second baronet, died unmarried. The elder daughter, Magdalen, had married in 1688, James Menteith of Auldcathy, heir-male and representative of the ancient family of Menteith earls of Menteith (see MENTEITH, surname of), and had by him seven sons and three daughters. The eldest son, James Menteith, succeeded his uncle Sir Thomas Dalyell, as the third baronet of Binns, on which he assumed the additional name of Dalyell He also succeeded as heir-male to James Menteith of Milnhall, to whom he was retoured, 20th December 1728. He served in the army during the reigns of George the First and Second, and died 28th February 1747 He had three sons and a daughter James, the second son, a captain in the first regiment of foot, and aide-de-camp to Lord Amherst, was killed in an engagement at a place since called Bloody Bridge, near Fort Detroit, in America, in 1763, and Thomas, the youngest, an officer in the navy, died in consequence of a wound on board the Valiant, in 1765 The daughter, Magdalen, married Robert Stewart, Esq of Binny, and their son, Captain John Stewart, in command of the Wyndham East Indiaman, particularly distinguished himself when twice taken by the French in 1810

The eldest son, Sir Robert Dalyell, the fourth baronet, served in the army during his earlier years, on the continent of Europe. He married, 22d September 1773, Elizabeth, eldest daughter of Nicol Graham, Esq of Gartmore, by Lady Margaret Cunningham, eldest daughter of the twelfth earl of Glencairn, by whom he had five sons and six daughters.

Sir James, the eldest son, on the death of his father, 10th October 1791, succeeded as the fifth baronet. He was born on 7th July 1774, and entering the army, was in the expedition to Flanders commanded by the duke of York in 1793 He died unmarried in 1841, when his brother, Sir John Graham-Dalyell, became the sixth baronet. Of this gentleman, who was the eighteenth in descent from Walter earl of Menteith, third son of Walter, lord high steward of Scotland, and the author of several works on antiquities, science, and history, a memoir is given at page 18. Robert, the third son of Sir Robert Dalyell, a general in the army, died in 1849 He was at one period captain of the 42d foot, and served in India, at the siege of Copenhagen, on the retreat through Spain with Sir John Moore, &c., and was wounded at the battle of Pombal, as also at that of Setubal in Portugal. Thomas, the fourth son, served with much approbation under Sir Alexander Cochrane, and other distinguished persons, but lost his health in the West Indies, and died young

On the death of Sir John Graham Dalzell, the sixth baronet, in 1851, he was succeeded by his next surviving brother, Sir William Cunningham-Cavendish-Dalyell, fifth and youngest son of Sir Robert, the fourth baronet. Born in 1784, he entered the navy in 1793, and in 1800 he was mate of the Seine at the capture of the French frigate La Vengeance. He was subsequently frequently noticed in the official despatches for services with the Antelope and the Rattler in the Channel and North Seas In 1805 he was very severely wounded in an attempt to cut out the Vimereux from St

Valery. He was taken prisoner by the French, and remained some time in captivity in France. He became a commander in 1814, and in 1820 married a daughter of Antony Teixiera Sampayo, Esq of Peterborough House, Fulham, by whom he had issue. In 1852 he was appointed a deputy-lieutenant of Linlithgowshire, and is in receipt of a pension for the wounds which he received during the war

DALYELL, Sir Thomas, of Binns, in West Lothian, an eminent Cavalier officer, was born there about 1599 He was the son of Thomas Dalyell of Binns, by his wife the Hon Janet Bruce, daughter of the first Lord Bruce of Kinloss. He early entered the army, and on the breaking out of the civil wars he fought bravely for the king He had at one time the command of the town and garrison of Carrickfergus, where he was taken prisoner by the rebels. After the execution of Charles the First, he never shaved his beard, which grew white and bushy, and descended almost to his girdle He adhered to the fortunes of Charles the Second with the utmost fidelity, and at the battle of Worcester, in 1651, he had the rank of major-general, but being again taken prisoner, he was committed to the Tower, his estates forfeited, and himself excepted from the general act of indemnity Having succeeded in escaping from the Tower, he seems to have gone abroad In 1654 he landed with some royalists in the north of Scotland, and, supported by a small party, took possession of the castle of Skelko He assisted in the exertions then made for the restoration of Charles, who soon after sent him the following testimony of his approbation:

"Tom Dalyell,

"Though I need say nothing to you by this honest bearer, Captain Mewes, who can well tell you all I would have said, yett I am willing to give it you under my owne hand, that I am very much pleased to heare how constant you are in your affection to me, and in your endeavours to advance my service. We have all a harde work to do yett I doubt not God will carry us through it. and you can never doubt that I will forgett the good part you have acted, which, trust me, shall be rewarded, whenever it shall be in the power of your affectionat frind.

"Colen, 30 Dec. 1654. Charles R."

When the affairs of Charles became desperate in Scotland, Dalyell, provided with several strong recommendations from that prince, for eminent courage and fidelity, went to Russia, and entered the Muscovite service, when the Czar, Alexis Michaelowitch, made him a general. He displayed much bravery in the wars with the Turks and Tartars, and after some years' active employment, he requested permission to return to Scotland, whereupon the Czar ordered a flattering testimony of his services to pass under the great seal of Russia.

In 1665 he returned to Scotland, and in the year following, Charles the Second appointed him commander-in-chief of his forces in that kingdom He was also created a privy councillor, and afterwards elected a member of parliament for the county of Linlithgow On the 28th of November 1666, he suppressed the rising at Pentland, and his memory is still execrated for his cruel persecution of the Covenanters

In the same year he raised a regiment of foot, but its place in the military lists is not now known He was not at Bothwell Bridge, his commission as commander-in-chief in Scotland having been intermitted for a fortnight in June 1679, and bestowed on the duke of Monmouth, in consequence of which General Dalyell resigned all his employments, but was immediately restored to them, and received an ample pension besides He had received the gift of the forfeited estate of Muir of Caldwell, in lieu of large sums which he had expended for the king At the Revolution, all the forfeited estates were restored to their right owners, and the General's family never obtained any indemnification for a claim exceeding one hundred thousand pounds against Government, except an inconsiderable pension [Playfair's British Family Antiquity, 8th vol app p ccxxxi Note.]

In 1681 he raised the regiment which has since so often distinguished itself under the name of the Scots Greys It was formerly the custom for the younger sons of reputable families to serve in that regiment as volunteers, whence the opinion long prevailed that at one time the whole regiment consisted of gentlemen only. The letters of service for raising the Greys are dated the 25th November 1681 He generally went to London once or twice a-year to kiss the king's hand, and the eccentricity of his dress and appearance drew crowds after him, whenever he was observed on the streets "As he was a man of humour, he would always thank them for their civilities, when he left them at the door to go in to the king, and would let them know exactly at what hour he intended to come out again and return to his lodgings. When the king walked in the park, attended by some of his courtiers, and Dalyell in his company, the same crowds would always be after him, showing their admiration at his beard and dress, so that the king could hardly pass on for the crowd, upon which his majesty bid the devil take Dalyell, for bringing such a rabble of boys together, to have their guts squeezed out, whilst they gaped at his long beard and antic habit, requesting him at the same time (as Dalyell used to express it) to shave and dress like other Christians, to keep the poor bairns out of danger All this could never prevail upon him to part with his beard, but yet, in compliance to his majesty, he went once to court in the very height of fashion, but as soon as the king and those about him had laughed sufficiently at the strange figure he made, he reassumed his usual habit, to the great joy of the boys, who had not discovered him in his fashionable dress" [Memoirs of Captain Creichton, by Swift]

On the accession of James the Seventh, he received a commendation and approval, under the great seal, of his conduct in Scotland, and a new and enlarged commission to be commander-in-chief An historian of that period observes that "after he had procured himself a lasting name in the wars, he fixed his old age at Binns, (his paternal inheritance) adorned by his excellence with avenues, large parks, and fine gardens, and pleased himself with the culture of curious flowers and plants" This fierce and unrelenting persecutor, who, as Bishop Burnet says, "acted the Muscovite too grossly," died about Michaelmas 1685 His private eccentricities furnished a subject for the sarcastic pen of Dean Swift in his 'Memoirs of Captain Creighton' above quoted, while his public history forms an important element in the narrative of the troublous times of the Church of Scotland

DALZELL, ANDREW, M A and F R.S, an eminent scholar, the son of a wright or carpenter, in the parish of Kirkliston, Linlithgowshire, was born there in 1742 After receiving the elementary part of his education at the village school, he went to the university of Edinburgh, with a view of studying for the ministry, but though he delivered the prescribed course of lectures in the divinity hall, to the satisfaction of Professor Hamilton, then in the theological chair, it does not appear that he was ever licensed Having been appointed tutor to Lord Maitland, afterwards earl of Lauderdale, he travelled with him to Paris, and shortly after his return he was, in 1779, through the interest of his pupil's father, elected by the town council, professor of Greek in the university of Edinburgh, that chair being vacant by the death of Professor Robert Hunter In the university of Edinburgh classical literature had, for a long period, been in a great measure neglected The great fame of Professor Moor, of the college of Glasgow, with the excellent editions of the Greek classics, then issuing from the press of the Foulises, had given that city a higher reputation for Greek learning than Edinburgh had for many years possessed The enthusiasm and ability of Professor Dalzell, however, imparted a new impetus to the study of the most polished language of antiquity, and the various improvements which he introduced in his system of tuition, tended in an eminent degree to restore the character of the university, and to attract to his classes students from many distant quarters The elementary class-books he compiled were so well adapted to the object for which they were designed that they soon found their way into many of the chief towns of England, and with certain modifications and improvements, are still generally in use He also delivered a course of lectures to his students on the literature, philosophy, history, the eloquence, the poetry, the fine arts, and the antiquities of the Greeks, which were published, after his death, in two volumes, by his son

In 1783, when the Royal Society of Edinburgh was instituted, Professor Dalzell was prevailed upon to undertake the duties of secretary to its literary class, and he contributed various able essays, and other interesting communications to the Society's Transactions He had for some time been associated with Dr James Robertson, professor of Oriental languages, as conjunct secretary and librarian of the university, and on the death of that gentleman in 1795, he was appointed keeper of the college library, having as his assistant Mr. Duke Gordon, who had been a candidate with him for the Greek chair, and on whose death, in 1802, he did ample justice to his memory in an interesting memoir of his life contributed to the Scots Magazine

In 1789, Professor Dalzell succeeded his father-in-law, the Rev Dr John Drysdale of Kirkliston, as principal clerk to the General Assembly of the Church of Scotland, being the first layman who ever held that appointment. The contest was a keen one, his opponent being Dr Carlyle of Inveresk, who was supported by the moderate party, while Mr Dalzell was the candidate of the popular or evangelical section of the Assembly When the votes were taken, there appeared to be a majority of three in favour of Dr Carlyle (145 to 142), but on a scrutiny the election was found to be in Professor Dalzell's favour On this occasion Kay of Edinburgh published a full-length portrait of the professor, one of his most finished sketches, under the title of "the successful candidate"

After a lingering illness, Professor Dalzell died on the 8th December 1806 He left several children One of his sons, John Dalzell, born in 1796, passed advocate in 1818, and died in 1823 The professor's personal appearance was prepossessing He had a fair complexion, mild aspect, blue eyes, full of vigorous expression, and plump features, without heaviness or grossness, while his address was graceful and impressive His works consist principally of collections from Greek authors, with short Latin notes. Subjoined is a list of them

DALYELL, Sir John Graham, the sixth baronet of Binns, editor of various works illustrative of the poetry, history, and antiquities of Scotland. was born in 1776. He was the second son of Sir Robert Dalyell, the fourth baronet, and was educated for the bar He passed advocate in the year 1797 Having little practice, he devoted himself to literary pursuits, and turning his attention to the collection of manuscripts preserved in the Advocates' library, Edinburgh, he commenced an industrious career of editing and publishing old journals and neglected historical tracts, with the view of rescuing such useful and authentic materials for illustrating our national history and antiquities from oblivion, and was thus one of the first of that valuable class of literary labourers in the department of research which the nineteenth century has so abundantly produced His first publication, entitled 'Fragments of Scottish History,' contained, among other matters of interest, the characteristic 'Diary of Robert Birrell, burgess of Edinburgh from 1532 to 1608' In the preface to his second work, a collection of 'Scottish Poems of the Sixteenth Century,' published in 1801, he stated that, in the course of his preparatory researches, he had examined "about seven hundred volumes of manuscripts" In 1809 he issued a small work with the title of 'A Tract chiefly relative to Monastic Antiquities,' the first of four or five thin octavos, in which he called attention to those ecclesiastical records of Scotland, so many of which have since been printed by the Bannatyne, Maitland, and Spalding Clubs The chartularies which occupied his pen were those of the bishoprics of Aberdeen and Moray, the abbey of Cambuskenneth, the chapel royal of Stirling, and the preceptory of St Anthony of Leith His edition of the Scottish Chronicle of Lindsay of Pitscottie is still considered the best, though it is probably destined to be superseded by the more complete one of this most pleasing of Scottish annalists which Lord Lindsay has undertaken

In 1836, he received the honour of knighthood under the great seal, for his attainments in literature, and on 1st February 1841, on the death of his elder brother, he succeeded to the baronetcy and family estate He was for many years one of the vice-presidents of the Society of Antiquaries of Scotland, in the affairs of which he long took an active interest. He was also president of the Society for Promoting Useful Arts in Scotland, vice-president of the African Institute of Paris, and for several years he represented the fourth district of the city in the town council of Edinburgh He did not confine his attention to antiquities and history He was distinguished also by his acquaintance with mechanical science, and still more by his knowledge of natural history Of the zeal with which he prosecuted this last pursuit he has left a signal monument in his 'Rare and Remarkable Animals of Scotland,' a handsome work in two costly quartos He was also conversant with the art of music, of which he was particularly fond, and in one of his later works, the 'Musical Memoirs of Scotland,' he has condensed the result of his researches on this favourite subject, during a long literary life The volume is illustrated by many curious engravings, and its pages preserve a few of those social anecdotes which its author was accustomed to relate with characteristic vivacity

The number and extent of Sir John Graham Dalyell's works will appear surprising when it is considered that his habits of composition were most fastidious Some of his manuscripts he copied four or five times over before he would commit them to the printer's hands The selection and editing of old manuscripts for the purpose of being printed, and of rare works for republication, form, even in practised hands, by no means so easy a labour as those not accustomed to such employment may be inclined to suppose Sound judgment, and research of no ordinary kind, with a knowledge of old writings and authors, and a practical acquaintance with what is precisely wanted to supply materials for history, or for the illustration and elucidation of antiquities, are essentially requisite for such a department of literature, which is one of the most important, though it be one of the least pretending, that can be named, and in these respects Sir John Graham Dalyell showed himself every way qualified for the task which he had chosen for himself, as a lifelong occupation He died unmarried, on the 7th June 1851, and was succeeded by his younger brother, Sir William Cunningham-Cavendish Dalyell, commander, R.N, of the Royal Hospital, Greenwich, as already stated

Sir John Graham Dalyell's publications are

He was also the author of various articles in the Encyclopedia Britannica.

DANIEL, Robert Mackenzie, an eminent novelist, designated from his originality and graphic power of depicting human life, "the Scottish Boz," was born in Inverness-shire in 1814 His father was a small landed proprietor or laird, within a short distance of the county-town, and Robert was the youngest child of a rather numerous family. His school education having been completed at Inverness, he was sent at the age of fifteen to Marischal college, Aberdeen, where he remained for three years, after which, with the view of studying for the bar, he removed to Edinburgh, and entered the office of a writer to the signet, at the same time attending the law and moral philosophy classes in the university of that city After a residence of four years at Edinburgh, Mr Daniel began to abandon the idea of following the profession of an advocate The tardiness of success at the Scottish bar, to any but those of powerful connexion amongst writers or solicitors, is proverbial He looked before him, and beheld in the vista of professional struggle long years of obscurity and neglect He thought that he might meet with success as a literary man in London, and, accordingly, we find him there in the latter part of 1836 He wrote for periodicals by the dozen, but his communications were often rejected After a season of trial and vexation, he was for a brief period engaged in connexion with the 'Courier,' an evening paper long since discontinued He subsequently became editor of the 'Court Journal,' which he conducted for the space of two years Of Mr Daniel's ephemeral productions, poetical and prose, we can take no account, scattered as they are over numerous London Magazines, to which he in time found admission His maiden novel was the 'Scottish heiress,' which was produced in 1842 The marked success which attended this, his first considerable attempt, encouraged him to another effort in the following year, and accordingly the 'Gravedigger' appeared in 1843 His second production, however, was scarcely received with the same amount of popular applause as the first, and it was always regarded by its author as a failure

In 1844, Mr Daniel, having recently married, removed from London to Jersey, hoping that there he might find that quiet and repose so requisite to continuous literary labour There, in a short space of time, he produced the 'Young Widow,' which, from the universal favour with which it was greeted, at once placed its author in a distinguished position amongst popular novelists. He was now in regular demand at the circulating libraries—a work by the "Scottish Box" was sure to command a sale, and he needed no longer indulge misgivings as to his prospect of success in that department of literature which he had adopted. His next effort was the 'Young Baronet,' which was fated to be the last published in its author's lifetime. It was published in November 1845, and fully supported the opinions which the best critics had already expressed of Mr Daniel's talents In January 1845, Mr Daniel accepted the editorship of a paper then started in Jersey, designated the 'Jersey Herald' In the small community of the Channel Islands, the tide of party politics runs to an inconceivable height, and any individual occupying the position of editor of a public journal, is always regarded as the rightful devoted victim of personal abuse, from all who differ in opinion from that system of policy which he advocates

There are, or were then, two political parties in Jersey—the Rose party, and the Laurel party They are so called from the distinctive badge which the adherents of each respectively wear in their buttonholes on gala days Their politics of course have nothing to do with the politics of England, but originate entirely within their own little circle The Rose party may be regarded as the Whigs of the locality, and very illiberal Whigs they are the Laurel party may be called the Tories, and, if there is a pin to choose between them, the latter are decidedly the more liberal of the two Mr Daniel was the editor of a Rose paper, and the numerous attacks, both personal and literary, of which he was the victim, at the hands of the Laurelites, embittered the existence of a man not adapted for, at least, that species of party strife He conducted the 'Jersey Herald' till September 1846, when he was overtaken by a mental malady, on the appearance of which he was removed by his friends to Bethlehem Hospital, London, where he died in March 1847, aged 33 A posthumous production from his pen, entitled 'The Cardinal's Daughter,' was considered one of his best works of fiction

DARNLEY, (anciently Dernely) earl of, a secondary title of the duke of Lennox (See LENNOX, duke of) It is taken from the lands of Darnley in the parish of Eastwood or Pollock, Renfrewshire, which for ages belonged to a branch of the house of Stewart. For Lord Darnley, so conspicuous in Scottish history as the unfortunate husband of Queen Mary, see

LENNOX, earl of, and the article MARY STUART, queen of Scots. In the beginning of the eighteenth century the duke of Lennox and Richmond sold his estates in Scotland, including Darnley, to the marquis afterwards duke of Montrose, and about the year 1757 the estate of Darnley was purchased by Sir John Maxwell of Nether Pollock, baronet, and it has since continued in that family

In the Irish peerage there is an earldom of Darnley (created in 1725) possessed by a family named Stuart Bligh The first peer having married the heiress of the baroness Clifton (in the English peerage, created in 1608,) descended by the female side, from the house of Lennox in Scotland, was ennobled under that title in the Irish peerage in 1721, and in 1723 was created Viscount Darnley, and, two years afterward, was advanced to the dignity of earl of Darnley The fourth earl claimed the dukedom of Lennox as heir of line to the sixth duke, to whom Charles the Second was served heir The house of Lords, however, came to no decision

DARSIE, a surname derived from the lands of that name, in Fifeshire, now comprehended in the parish of Dairsie These lands were anciently held by the Dairseys of that ilk, under the bishops of St. Andrews, the hereditary offices of bailie and admiral of the regality of St. Andrews being also possessed by them The family ended in an heiress, Janet de Dairsey, who, marrying a younger son of Learmonth of Ercildoune, Berwickshire (see LEARMONTH), brought to him the lands of Dairsie and the heritable offices attached to them They continued in the possession of his descendants, until the whole were purchased from them, during the reign of James VI, by the then Lord Lindsay of the Byres. The lands afterwards belonged to the Spottiswoodes. In the old castle of Dairsie a parliament was held in the reign of David II About 1590 the name of Darsie is found to occupy a prominent place in the records of the two neighbouring parishes of Easter and Wester Anstruther In the Commissariat records of the diocese of St. Andrews the Darsies of Anstruther are mentioned in 1594, 1626, &c., and in an old folio volume of Retours the name of Dursie has been noticed in connexion with property in Anstruther In some of the old Records, the name is spelled Darsie and not Dairsie James Melville in his Diary, and Sir Walter Scott in Redgauntlet, adopt the same spelling Arms of the Darsies, Az. on a bend argent three roses gules. Crest, a rose slipped gules. Motto, Spero

DAVID THE FIRST, King of Scots, a monarch who, by his admirable capacity for government, and skill in availing himself of opportunities of aggrandizing his kingdom, may be truly said to be the founder of the monarchy on its modern basis and extended limits, was the eighth son of Malcolm the Third, but the sixth and youngest by his queen, Margaret, sister of Edgar Atheling, the displaced heir of the Saxon line of English princes None of his brothers by Queen Margaret, (two of whom, Edgar and Alexander, reigned before him,) bore the Christian names of any of the previous kings or nobles of Scotland They were principally such as were borne by Queen Margaret's relatives, and seem to have been chosen by herself, and Lord Hailes conjectures that the youngest son received the name of David, from his having been born at a time when his mother had no hope of more children, in reference to the youngest son of Jesse. [Dalrymple's Annals, 4to edit. 1779, vol i p 43, note] After the death of his father, his uncle Donald Bane usurped the throne, and the young princes Edgar, Alexander, and David retired into England, where they were kindly entertained by their maternal uncle, Edgar Atheling David is said to have afterwards spent some years at the English court, and according to the English historian, William of Malmsbury, "By his early converse with his countrymen his manners were polished from the rust of Scottish barbarity," but this is doubtful, as the English historians who refer to this matter, speak of him as "living as a count in England," comite in Anglia [Ordericus Vitalis, in Dalrymple's Annals, vol i p 100] Now he was only a count in or of Cumbria, which was always spoken of by them in that age as a part of England The Scottish historians have supposed that when in England, his residence was at the court of Henry the First, who had married his sister Matilda, overlooking the fact that this marriage did not take place till 1100, two years after his brother Edgar had ascended the throne by the expulsion of Donald Bane, and probably after David had, as the same historians relate, soon after that event, at the head of an army of Norman knights, in the service of William Rufus, proceeded into Scotland from Lothian or Cumbria, to assist in the settlement of his brother's kingdom This view of the matter appears the more probable from the circumstance that all these writers describe his residence in England to have extended during and until the close of the reign of his brother Alexander, whereas during the whole of that reign, excepting perhaps occasional visits, he was unquestionably residing and governing as a count or prince in Cumbria. By his marriage with Matilda, daughter of Waltheof, count of Northumberland, David appears to have acquired great possessions in Cumbria (Inquisition) as also the foundation of a claim of some kind to succeed to the government of that province

deathbed in January 1107, the province of Cumbria, (see art. ALEXANDER I., page 52), as a sovereignty independent of the Scottish crown, but held (as it had been by his brother) as a fief under that of England The writer to whom we owe the knowledge of this circumstance, mentions it under the designation of "a part of England," portio regni. [Dalrymple, vol. i. page 49] The extent of this province, which originally included the north-west counties of England, is distinctly stated in the 'Inquisition' to have been curtailed, and from the names referred to therein, to have comprised all modern Scotland, south of the firths of Clyde and Forth, with Dumbartonshire on the north of the former river We have already, in our life of Alexander the First, alluded to Prince David's happy genius for government, and to his ruling that portion of the country as an independent prince (see vol i., page 53), and we need not dwell farther on either subject here While still prince or earl of Cumbria, (he appears at this period to have resided at Selkirk,) David appointed several of the older and more influential inhabitants (seniorum hominum et sapientiorum totius Cumbriæ) to make an inquisition concerning the lands pertaining to the see of Glasgow This inquisition, preserved in the Chartulary of Glasgow, is a valuable record of the names of places at that period in the district, and a copy is published in one of the volumes of the Maitland Club This must have been about 1116, as in the previous year he had appointed a person of great learning and piety named John, who had had the charge of his education, bishop of the see, and he was most anxious that it should possess all the lands which of right belonged to it

On the death of his brother, Alexander the First, on the 27th April 1124, David succeeded to the throne of Scotland His right to it was not disputed at the time, and on his accession he for the first time introduced the Norman or feudal system into the northern portion of his kingdom, which gradually displaced the institutions that till then had prevailed After this period he does not seem to have resided much at Selkirk. The larger part of Scotland proper was also now under his sway, and as he was on the most friendly terms with his brother-in law, Henry the First of England, whose court he frequently visited, several years of peace ensued, and the nation, under his mild and beneficent rule, made rapid progress in prosperity and civilization.

One of David's characteristics was the founding and endowment of religious houses. In the same year that he founded the monastery of Kelso (1128) he also erected that of Holyrood, styled by Fordun "Monasterium Sanctæ Crucis de Crag," and liberally endowed it. For the canons of Holyrood and the use of the inhabitants, he built a mill at the place which afterwards became the village of Canonmills. In the charter of foundation he granted liberty to these canons to erect a burgh between the abbey and the town of Edinburgh, hence the origin of the burgh of Canongate, afterwards the seat of royalty and the residence of the Scottish nobility while Scotland remained an independent kingdom The legend of the circumstances which are said to have led to the foundation of this abbey, although adopted by modern writers on antiquities, is quite unworthy of serious attention He likewise afterwards founded the abbeys of Melrose, Newbattle, Cambuskenneth, Dryburgh, Kinloss, and Jedburgh, as well as the priory of Lesmahago and the Cistertian convent of Berwick, all or nearly all in that portion of the country where he himself had formerly resided In founding these institutions he acted with profound policy as well as piety The inhabitants were rude and ignorant, and no mode of instructing or of civilizing them presented itself in that age so simple and effective as was the establishment of religious houses, which were then more industrial and educational than in later ages, when they became seats of luxury and idleness, and, by attaching a powerful body to the interests of his crown, he laid the foundation of that deep attachment to the monarchy which eventually promoted its entire independence of England Besides, most of the lands with which he endowed them had originally belonged to the church, and many of the substantial grants were at the same time made by his nobles.

On the death of Henry the First of England in 1135, his nephew, Stephen earl of Boulogne, usurped the throne, and David immediately assembled an army to support the right of his niece,

Henry's daughter, the empress Matilda, which, as a vassal of the English monarchy, he had, as the first noble in that kingdom, sworn to maintain Entering England, he took Carlisle and Newcastle, and overran the counties of Cumberland and Northumberland, compelling the northern barons to swear fealty to Matilda, and to give hostages for the performance of their oath. To arrest his progress, Stephen, at the head of a large force, marched to Durham, and the king of Scots, finding himself deserted by the English barons who had joined him and had sworn to maintain the claims of Matilda to the throne, entered into a negociation with Stephen, which terminated in a treaty of peace, by which he restored all the towns and castles he had recently occupied, and Stephen, on his part, ceded the castle of Carlisle to Henry the son of the Scottish king, with the Honour of Huntingdon, and lands in Doncaster, for which the latter did homage Stephen is also said to have promised not to make any grant of the earldom of Northumberland until he had examined the pretensions of Prince Henry, who claimed it as grandson and heir of Waltheof the last Anglo-Saxon earl, although the elder son of his mother by a former marriage was then living The peace, however, was a hollow one, for in the same year, during the absence of King Stephen in Normandy, David invaded Northumberland, availing himself of the occasion to press the doubtful claim of his son Prince Henry to that county On this occasion Thurstin, the aged archbishop of York, who some years before had consecrated Robert prior of Scone bishop of St. Andrews, (see life of ALEXANDER I vol i p 57), repaired to Scotland, and prevailed upon King David to consent to a truce until Stephen's return to England When the latter came back, however, he haughtily rejected the demands of the Scottish king, and in the beginning of the following year David again invaded Northumberland. Exasperated at not being able to take the castle of Wark, which he had assaulted, the Scottish army committed the most cruel ravages, burning all the towns, villages, and churches, and sparing neither men, women, nor children. On being apprised of these devastations, King Stephen marched to the north at the head of a large force, and pursued the Scots as far as Roxburgh, and, crossing the Tweed wasted the Scottish borders. On his retreat soon afterwards, David again invaded Northumberland, where, in spite of every effort to restrain them, his fierce soldiery committed the most frightful excesses At the report of the approach of an English army they retired hastily, but their retrograde march was stayed by David, who, laying siege to Norham castle, captured and destroyed it; while another division of the Scottish army, under the leadership of the king's nephew, William the son of Duncan, penetrated through Craven in Lancashire, and routed with great slaughter, at Clitheroe, upon the confines of Yorkshire, the English troops that had assembled to oppose its passage across the Ribble From Norham King David marched southwards to join the victorious army of his nephew The English, unable to contend against their superior force, attempted in vain to negociate a peace The battle that ensued, known in history as that of "the Standard," was fought on Cutton Moor near Northallerton on August 11, 1138. The Scots were defeated with considerable loss, and the attendants of the king, seeing the day irretrievably lost, hurried him from the field With his shattered army, he reached Carlisle, where he was joined by his son Prince Henry, who had escaped with difficulty

After restoring order among his soldiers, and binding their leaders by a solemn oath "never to desert him in war," he led his troops to besiege the castle of Wark, which he reduced by famine, and razed to the ground In the beginning of the following year, by the mediation of Queen Maude, the wife of Stephen and also a niece of King David, who had an interview with her uncle at Durham, a peace was at length concluded to the satisfaction of all parties, and the earldom of Northumberland granted to Henry prince of Scotland

The dislike with which a portion of the original races of the north had regarded the introduction of hereditary succession in the family of Malcolm the Third, by his second marriage, into the ancient kingdom of Scotland, to the exclusion of their ancient custom of Tanistry, however checked and overawed it might be for a time by the chastisements inflicted on their chiefs during the reign of his brother Alexander, did not prevent attempts being made by them, when favourable occasions presented themselves, to return to that rule of government, although the notices of these outbreaks that have come down to us in the national chronicles are vague and brief It appears that in 1130, when David was absent in England, Angus earl of Moray, a descendant of Lulach, or of one of the family of Macbeth, invaded the adjacent county of Forfar with an army of 5,000 men, and was slain at Strickathrow with many of his people, and his territory overrun and subdued In this attempt he is said by an English historian to have been aided by Malcolm, said to have been a bastard son of Alexander the First, but supposed with more probability to have been a son of Malcolm the Third, younger brother of Duncan by the first marriage of that king with the widow of the earl of Orkney, and an elder brother of David himself by the father's side, whose name appears in a charter of Duncan to the monastery of Durham [Dalrymple's Annals, vol i pp 45, 67]

In 1141 one Wimond, an English monk who possessed some address and genius, and had obtained a precarious living by copying old writings at Furness abbey in Lancashire, having proceeded to the Isle of Man in connexion with a religious house there founded, so pleased the natives that they obtained him for their bishop Whether he there heard of the affection of the people of Scotland for their ancient chiefs, and sought to avail himself of that feeling for his own aggrandizement, or whether he had in reality some ground for his pretensions, cannot now be even conjectured, but he declared himself to be the son of Angus earl of Moray, above referred to, and professed his intention to vindicate his rights The Isle of Man, at that time governed by Olive, a Norwegian chief, as king, had subjected to it various of the islands of the Hebrides Repairing to these, joined by many bold men of desperate fortunes, and gathering strength by making piratical excursions, he obtained for wife a daughter of Somerled, the chief or thane of Argyle, who supported his pretensions, and invading the Scottish coasts, pillaged the country and slew its inhabitants. He eluded various forces sent against him, and becoming formidable, although defeated on one occasion by a bishop of those parts, David was at length obliged to make terms of accommodation with him by bestowing on him some lands with the superiority of a monastery of his own order On account of his overbearing conduct, however, a conspiracy being formed against him, he was mutilated by his own followers, had his eyes put out, and in this condition was delivered into the hands of David, who, after imprisoning him for some time in the castle of Roxburgh, at length suffered him to retire to the abbey of Byland in Yorkshire, where he died

After King Stephen's defeat and capture at Lincoln in February 1140, and the temporary acknowledgment of the empress Matilda as queen, David repaired to London, to give her his advice and assistance He was with her in the castle of Winchester, in the following August, when it was invested by Stephen's brother, the bishop of Winchester, and it was with great difficulty that he succeeded in escaping with his niece A young Scots soldier, named Oliphant, in the army of Stephen, to whom David had been godfather, concealed him from a very strict search, and conveyed him in safety to Scotland In the last years of Stephen, David's son, Prince Henry, (and after his death his grandson Malcolm,) remained in the quiet possession of Northumberland, (with the exception of the fortresses of Newcastle and Bambrough,) as also of Carlisle and a portion of modern Cumberland, connected therewith, and the possession of the former was promised to the Scottish crown by his grand-nephew, Prince Henry Plantagenet, the son of the empress Matilda, afterwards Henry the Second of England, when he received the honour of knighthood from him at Carlisle, May 22, 1149, should he succeed to the throne

In his old age, King David lost his only son, Henry, one of the most virtuous and accomplished princes of that age, who died suddenly on June 12, 1152 By the Lady Ada, a daughter of the earl of Warrene and Surrey, whom he had married in 1139, Prince Henry had three sons, Malcolm and William, successively kings of Scotland, David, earl of Huntingdon, and three daughters. The aged monarch took immediate measures to have the rights of his grandsons established, and he had no sooner done so than his health, which had been long declining, gave way, and he was found dead in his bed at Carlisle, in an attitude of prayer, May 24, 1153

The character of this pious and patriotic monarch stands out in history as that of one of the wisest and best of the kings of Scotland Under his beneficent sway, the country was contented and happy The endowments which he bestowed upon the church produced immediate and beneficial effects upon the nation, for to the influence of the clergy may be mainly attributed not only the promotion of knowledge and of the arts of industry among the people, but the loyalty and love of order of the barons, at that time for the most part a simpler race, now to their dignities, and more under the persuasive influence of the clergy than in later periods of Scottish history, when, their families having multiplied and become powerful, they vexed the kingdom by their ambition and rivalries Besides Edinburgh and St Andrews, the towns of Brechin, Montrose, Haddington, Linlithgow, Jedburgh, and Rutherglen owe their charters of burghal rights to the wisdom of David the First His seal as count of Cumbria has been already given (vol i p 53) In one of the charters of his grandson Malcolm, who succeeded him as king, is a representation of an old and a young man, generally supposed to represent these two monarchs from which the preceding as his portrait has been taken

In a work upon Scottish biography the circumstance of the settlement in Scotland of the ancestors of most of the families who, even to modern times, are reckoned of note in that country, having occurred during the reign of this great prince, must not be omitted To enumerate even the names of the principal of these would exceed our present limits Originally located, for by far the greatest part, on lands in his principality of Cumbria, (the modern Lothians, and Ayrshire,) which their prowess had probably contributed to conquer, these chiefs, for the most part of Norman descent, gradually extended themselves by marriage, or by confiscation of the native possessions, into and over the northern portion of the kingdom, and holding them by tenures which necessarily called forth and strengthened their military spirit, and with regalities and rights more ample than could be obtained from the neighbouring monarchy of England, they became the firm advocates of the integrity of the kingdom, whilst their descendants in subsequent ages having greatly multiplied, and forming the majority of the inhabitants of these regions, gradually gave an entirely new aspect to the social character of the population

DAVID THE SECOND, king of Scots, son of Robert the Bruce, succeeded his father, 7th June 1329, when little more than five years old, having been born at Dunfermline, 5th March 1323-4 On the 14th November 1331, he was crowned at Scone, with his consort, Johanna, daughter of Edward the Second, whom, child as he was, he had married at Berwick, on 12th July 1328, in virtue of the treaty of Northampton, which had restored peace between Scotland and England After the success of Edward Baliol and the disinherited barons, on their invasion of Scotland in September 1332, the disgraceful surprise of Dupplin, and the more fatal battle of Halidon Hill in 1333, David and his infant queen were, for greater security, sent to France, where they remained till Baliol had been driven out of Scotland, and his adherents dispersed In 1340, the young king of Scots was with the French army under Philip of

Valois, in Flanders, when Edward of England was unsuccessfully besieging Tournay. On 4th May 1341 he landed, with his consort, at Inverbervie in Kincardineshire, being then in his nineteenth year Rash and impetuous, like his uncle Edward Bruce, he had no sooner returned than he showed himself anxious for a rupture with England, and in the following February he accompanied the earl of Moray as a volunteer, when he invaded the western marches, wasted the English borders, and plundered Penrith In the summer of 1342, after creating a numerous body of knights, he himself led a large force into Northumberland, but was obliged to make an inglorious retreat. A third invasion, soon after, met with no better success

In 1346, when Edward the Third was occupied with his wars in France, David, at the instigation of the French king, resolved to invade England, and having mustered a large army at Perth, commenced his march After storming the fortress of Liddel on the borders, and beheading Walter Selby, its governor, disregarding the advice of Douglas, the knight of Liddesdale, he continued his advance, eastward and southward, marking the progress of his army through Northumberland and towards Durham, by all the wasting ravages of war. He was defeated, however, after a great battle, and taken prisoner, at Neville's Cross, near Durham, October 17th of the same year According to Rymer and Froissart, though he had two spears hanging in his body, his leg desperately wounded, and his sword beaten out of his hand, he disdained captivity, and provoked the English by opprobrious language to kill him When John Copeland, a gentleman of Northumberland and governor of Roxburgh castle, advised him to yield, he struck him on the face with his gauntleted hand so fiercely that he knocked out two of his teeth He was conveyed to the Tower of London, being, it is said, conducted to that celebrated fortress under an escort of twenty thousand men, accompanied by the different companies of the city in their proper dresses. In 1351, after several negociations, in consequence of an agreement between Edward and the commissioners from Scotland, David was allowed to visit his kingdom, on giving hostages and making oath to return to captivity, when required. His confinement had been very strict, and it is believed that to obtain his liberty he had entered into a secret treaty with Edward, unfavourable to the independence of Scotland. Having failed in his attempts to procure its confirmation he returned to the Tower in 1352 After long conferences a treaty for his liberation and a truce of nine years was concluded at Newcastle, 18th July 1354, and duly ratified, but it was prevented from being carried into effect, in consequence of the intrigues of the king of France, who, by sending a body of soldiers and a sum of money into Scotland, prevailed upon the Scots to continue the war against England In 1357, however, a treaty was finally entered into, whereby the ransom of the king was fixed at one hundred thousand marks, to be paid in ten years, and David returned to Scotland, October 3d of that year His long residence in England had led him to admire the superiority of English policy and manners His captivity, in the castle of Odiham in Hampshire, was alleviated by the similar fate of John the French monarch, and was gradually enlarged Gold medals of David were struck in England, (Pinkerton's Essay on Medals, vol ii, plate 2,) and he returned to Scotland impressed with the most favourable sentiments of that country and its sovereign, notwithstanding the defeats, disorders, and miseries to which his subjects had been reduced by the English monarch He afterwards paid frequent visits to England, and was engaged in certain secret intrigues with the English king to prevent the succession of his nephew Robert the Steward, who had been regent during his captivity In 1363, after his return from one of these visits, he made a proposal to the parliament at Scone, that if he died without issue, Lionel duke of Clarence, second son of Edward the Third, should be chosen king, a proposition which the parliament indignantly rejected, and the Steward and others of the nobility entered into an association to maintain the legal succession to the crown David, after issuing an energetic proclamation, had recourse to arms, on which the insurgents submitted, and a general amnesty was granted. In the same year, however, he again repaired to London, and was present, with Edward the Third, at a conference, held 23d November, at which it was agreed that in the event of David dying without issue, the king of England was to become sovereign of Scotland, but, in the then temper of the Scots nation, he did not venture to bring such a project forward, and it was not known till published in the sixth volume of Rymer's 'Fœdera,' after the union of the two kingdoms.

David's queen, Johanna, had died in England in 1362, and in the following year he married a second time Margaret Logie, a gentlewoman of singular beauty In 1369, yielding to her suggestions, he imprisoned the Steward and his three sons The marriage was an unhappy one, and he obtained a divorce from her by the Scottish bishops in 1370 On her disgrace the Steward and his three sons were released from prison David died in the castle of Edinburgh, on 22d February 1371, in the 47th year of his age, and 42d of his reign Dying without issue, he was succeeded by his nephew, Robert the Steward, (Robert the Second) Notwithstanding the weakness and degeneracy of character of David the Second, the veneration of the Scots people for the memory of their illustrious deliverer, Robert the Bruce, kept them steady in their attachment to his only son

From a fine portrait of David the Second in Pinkerton's Scottish Gallery, 2d vol., the preceding woodcut is taken.

DAVID, earl of Huntingdon, prince of Scotland, was the son of David the First and brother of William the Lion In early life he seems to have possessed the lands and the earldom of Lennox, a fact hitherto unknown to all our genealogists, but established by the details of an inquest into the property of the lands of Monoch-Kenneran in Dumbartonshire held in the early part of the reign of Alexander the Second, preserved in the Chartulary of Paisley, and published in the appendix to the descriptions of the sheriffdoms of Lanark and Renfrew by the Maitland Club, 1830, p 275, where Anekol, one of the witnesses, confirmed by three others, viz Nemias, Kissin, and Gillemor, swears to these lands having been exempt from aids when demanded by "Comes David frater regis Wilhelmi ea tempore que habent comitatum de Levenax et possedit," as pertaining to the church of Kilpatrick It would thus appear, as has been supposed by Skene, that these lands of Lennox were originally a royal patrimony, and were first erected into an earldom in his favour either by his grandfather David the First, or by his elder brother Malcolm The history of this prince is full of romance, and has been made the groundwork, with of course many of the usual inventions of the novelist, of Sir Walter Scott's brilliant story of the Talisman in the 'Tales of the Crusaders' Soon after his marriage with Matildis, daughter of Ranulph earl of Chester, he departed for the Holy Land, to fight against the Saracens, under the banners of Richard the First of England, surnamed, from his bravery, Cœur de Lion, or the Lion-hearted On his voyage homeward, he met with some strange adventures Having been shipwrecked on the coast of Egypt, the prince was made captive, and having lost all his retinue, and his rank being unknown, he was sold as a slave to a Venetian, who carried him to Constantinople In that city some English merchants accidentally recognising him, redeemed him, and sent him home After having surmounted various difficulties, he was in imminent hazard of a second shipwreck on the coast of Scotland He is said to have returned from the Holy Land in the eighth year of King William In accordance with the superstitious notions of the times, he ascribed his deliverance to the Virgin Mary, and in memory of her efficacious intercession, he founded the monastery of Lindores in Fife, which he dedicated to St. Mary and St. Andrew Some of the ruins of the abbey, the buildings of which were at one time very extensive, still remain The monks were of the Benedictine order They had 22 churches, and large estates in several counties This earl of Huntingdon possesses an interest in Scottish history beyond that attaching to his mere personal adventures, as being the father of the two princesses, from whom Bruce and Baliol were descended, and on which descent they founded their respective claims to the throne.

DAVIDSON, clan of, see SUPPLEMENT.

DAVIDSON, JOHN, an eminent divine of the Church of Scotland, was born about 1550, and studied at St Andrews for the ministry He afterwards became regent or professor in St Leonards college of that university, and having in 1573 written a book entitled 'Dialogue betwixt a Clerk and a Courtier,' against a project of the regent Morton for the union of four parishes into one, he was summoned before the regent and council, and sentenced to imprisonment, but being liberated on bail, he went for a time into England He was one of the clergymen, however, who attended the earl on the scaffold He was afterwards appointed minister of Liberton, and having, at the order of the presbytery of Edinburgh, in 1582, pronounced sentence of excommunication against Robert Montgomery, minister of Stirling, who claimed to be archbishop of Glasgow, and boldly remonstrated with the king for his countenance of the latter, he was again forced to take temporary refuge in England He was subsequently made minister of Prestonpans. In 1596 he took a prominent part in accomplishing the renewal of the National Covenant In the General Assembly held at Dundee in 1598, he opposed the proposition that the clergy should vote in parliament in name of the Church, as a mere device for the introduction of the bishops. In consequence of a protest which he entered against this measure, he was, by order of the king, committed prisoner to the castle of Edinburgh; but on account of bad health, his place of confinement was changed to his own manse and parish He died in 1604 at Prestonpans, the church, manse, school, and schoolhouse of which parish he built at his own expense Several well-authenticated anecdotes are told of his prophetic powers He was the author of 'Helpes for Young Scholars in Christianity' Edin 1602, 8vo

DELORAINE, earl of, a title in the peerage of Scotland, now extinct, derived from certain lands in Selkirkshire, parish of Ettrick, and probably so called from the name of the original possessor, (De Lorraine, a province in the north-east of France,) and conferred in 1706, on Lord Henry Scott, grandson of Charles the Second, being the third but second surviving son of the unfortunate duke of Monmouth and his wife Anne, duchess of Buccleuch, and born in 1676. His lordship took the oath and his seat in the last parliament of Scotland, in October 1706, and steadily supported the treaty of union In 1707 he had the command of a regiment of foot, and in 1730 he rose to the rank of major-general in the army At the general election in 1715, he was elected one of the sixteen representative Scottish peers, and rechosen in 1722 and 1727 He was so much distinguished for his politeness, that Dr Young, author of the "Night Thoughts," "The Revenge," &c., depicting the character of a conceited coxcomb, says,

> "He only thinks himself, so far from vain, > Stanhope in wit, in breeding Deloraine."

He died 25th December 1730

Francis, his elder son, second earl, born 5th October 1710, died without issue at Bath, 11th April, 1739, in his 29th year

His brother, Henry, third earl, born 11th February 1712, was a captain in the royal navy, and commander of the Sanford in the Mediterranean, at the time of his brother's death Being obliged to return home, on account of the bad state of his health, he died in his coach at Acton, on his way to London, 31st January 1740, in his 28th year, leaving two sons, Henry, fourth earl, and the Hon John Scott, a councillor at law, and commissioner of bankrupts, who died in Gray's Inn, London, 8d December 1788.

Henry, fourth and last earl of Deloraine, born 8th February 1737, succeeded to the title when only three years old Having by extravagance in his youth deeply involved his estate, he in middle age secured from the wreck of his fortune an annuity of one thousand pounds, on which he afterwards lived very privately He died without issue in September 1807, when his titles became extinct.

DEMPSTER, a surname derived from Doomster, an ancient name for judge or executioner It is of great antiquity in Scotland. The honourable office of dempster of parliament was long heritably enjoyed by the old family of Dempster of Muresk, Pitliver, &c., who were free barons and proprietors of the lands of Carolstoun, Auchterless, &c., in Aberdeenshire, before the middle of the fourteenth century David Dempster of Auchterless and Carolstoun, who lived in the reign of King David the Second, is one of a perambulation of marches near Arbroath in 1370 His son, Andrew, got the office of dempster confirmed to him and his heirs by a charter under the great seal from Robert the Second, but his son.

David, third baron of Carolstoun, resigned the office of dempster to the abbacy of Arbroath in September 1460.

Thomas Dempster of Muresk having squandered away the greater part of his estates, fell into vicious courses, and on April 20, 1620, he was tried and found guilty of forgery and falsehood, and beheaded at Edinburgh in consequence. "The frequency of the crime of forgery," says Mr Pitcairn, "during some years preceding the date of this trial, seems to have induced the public prosecutor to make several severe examples. Not a few of the criminals were persons of considerable rank in society, who, by desperate courses, had been reduced to the worst shifts to procure the means of subsistence." [Criminal Trials, vol iii. p. 487, note.]

The family of Dempster of Skibo, in Sutherlandshire are descended from James, second son of James Dempster of Muresk, living in 1574, and representative of David Dempster of Auchterless and Carolstoun The first of this family, Mr George Dempster of Dunnichen in Forfarshire, (a short memoir of whom is subsequently given,) purchased the estate of Skibo in 1786, and Mr John Hamilton Dempster, his younger brother, shortly after purchased the estates of Pulrossie and Over-Skibo. Their grandfather, a merchant in Dundee, had bought the estate of Dunnichen about 1700 That estate ultimately came into the possession of James Hawkins, Esq, advocate.

Mr John Hamilton Dempster of Skibo was succeeded by his daughter and heiress, Harriet Dempster of Dunnichen and Skibo, born in 1786 She married in 1801, William Soper, Esq, of the East India Company's service, who assumed by royal license the surname of Dempster, in compliance with the entail of the estates. Mrs. Dempster died in 1810, leaving a son, George Dempster, Esq of Skibo, and four daughters. The third daughter, Charlotte, was married in 1830 to James Whiteshed Hawkins Dempster, Esq of Dunnichen, and died in 1842

DEMPSTER, THOMAS, a learned historian, was born at Brechin in 1579, and studied at Aberdeen and Cambridge He early went to Paris, and taught classical learning in the college of Beauvais He was of a quarrelsome disposition, and as ready with the sword as with the pen Having publicly whipped one of his scholars for challenging a fellow-student to fight a duel, the young man brought three of the king's life-guards into the college, when Dempster made all his pupils take arms, and, after hamstringing their horses at the gate, compelled the three warriors to sue for quarter, and confined them for several days close prisoners in the belfry In consequence of this affair he was obliged to quit Paris. Proceeding to England, he married there a woman of uncommon beauty, who eloped with one of his scholars after his return to the Continent He afterwards read lectures upon polite learning at Nismes, became professor of philology at Pisa, and subsequently at Bologna, where he died in 1625 He had such a prodigious memory that he acquired the name of 'The Living Library.' He was the author of numerous learned works, of which the following is a list.

DEMPSTER, GEORGE, of Dunnichen, an eminent agriculturist, was born about 1735, and in 1755 was admitted advocate In November 1762 he was elected member of parliament for the Fife and Forfar district of burghs In 1765 he obtained the patent office of secretary to the Order of the Thistle In 1790 he retired from parliament. He had supported the financial plans of the Pitt administration, but was opposed to the continued sovereignty over India of the East India Company, of which he was at one time a director. Anxious to promote the internal improvement of his native country, it was chiefly by his exertions that an act of parliament was obtained for affording protection and encouragement to the fisheries in Scotland A joint-stock company having been formed for this object, he was, in 1788, elected one of the directors. From his patriotism he was designated honest George Dempster Besides the fisheries he also took a leading part in promoting the manufactures and the agriculture of Scotland He was the first to suggest the plan of sending fresh salmon to the London market packed in boxes filled with ice, instead of being pickled as formerly. His latter years were devoted to the improvement of his estate Mr Dempster died at Dunnichen, in Forfarshire, February 13, 1818 He published 'Discourse containing a summary of the Report of the Directors of the Society for Extending the Fisheries of Great Britain,' 1789.

DENHAM, STEWART, Sir John See STEWART, Sir John Denham

DENHOLM, a surname derived from the village of Denholm in the parish of Cavers, Roxburghshire, celebrated as the birthplace of the poet Leyden.

DENNISTOUN, a surname derived from the ancient barony of Danielstoun, in Renfrewshire, belonging to a family, the representative of which is Dennistoun of Colgrain in Dumbartonshire, now styled Dennistoun of Dennistoun. The ancestor of the family, Daniel or Daniel, conjectured to have been of Norman extraction, is said to have settled on the Gryfe in the former county, and to have called his lands Danielstoun, after himself, assuming that name also, in accordance with the practice of the age, as his own surname. In process of time it was gradually softened into Dennistoun. The statement of Buchanan of Auchmar that the family sprung from a younger branch of the old earls of Lennox, and had large possessions on the Endrick in 1016, is extremely doubtful.

In both Crauford's and Douglas' Peerages, (the latter quoting the Chartulary of Paisley, 127 D) it is stated that Ronaldus de Dennestoun was one of the witnesses to the Inquisition made by David the First, when prince of Cumbria, into the possessions of the church of Glasgow in 1116; but the name is not to be found in the copy of it printed in Hamilton of Wishaw's Description of the Shires of Lanark and Renfrew issued by the Maitland Club. In these "Peerages" Dennistoun of Dennistoun is styled Lord Dennistoun, but the date of creation is not stated; neither is the person specified on whom that title was first conferred, nor the monarch mentioned by whom it was bestowed.

Sir Hugh de Danielstoun, or Danzilstone, of that ilk, one of the patriotic barons who unwillingly submitted to Edward the First of England, (although his name does not occur in the Ragman Roll,) was the father of Joanna or Janet Danielstoun, who married Sir Adam Mure of Rowallan, and whose daughter, Elizabeth Mure, married, in 1347, King Robert the Second, and was the mother of King Robert the Third, a circumstance which gave rise to the proud saying among the Dennistouns, that "Kings come of us, not we of kings." From both monarchs the family received various grants of land, principally in the western counties, till their possessions came to be very extensive.

Sir John de Danielstoun of that ilk, knight, the only brother of the above-named Joanna or Janet, was, in the checkered reign of David the Second, the constant associate in arms of his illustrious father-in-law, the earl of Wigton, and the brave Sir Robert Erskine, and like them was distinguished for his loyalty He was high sheriff of Dumbartonshire, governor of Dumbarton castle, and one of the lords of parliament who concurred in the settlement of the crown upon the descendants of his niece, Elizabeth Mure. With one daughter Janet, married to her cousin, Sir Adam Mure of Rowallan, ancestor, through the female line, of the marquis of Hastings, he had five sons, namely, Robert, his heir, Walter, pastor of Kincardine O'Neil, of whom afterwards, Sir William of Colgrain, Hugh, and Malcolm

Sir Robert, the eldest son, was one of the hostages selected from the noblest families in Scotland for the ransom of David the Second, specified in the treaty of 3d October 1357 (see page 26 of this volume), and in 1370 he was commissioner for a treaty of peace with England. He succeeded his father as sheriff of Lennox and keeper of the castle of Dumbarton, and died in 1399 Having no sons, his two daughters were coheiresses of his great estates. Margaret, the elder, married Sir William Cunningham of Kilmaurs, ancestor of the earls of Glencairn, Elizabeth, the younger, became the wife of Sir Robert Maxwell of Calderwood, from whom descended the Maxwells of Calderwood and Pollock, and the Lords Farnham in the Irish peerage.

On the death of his elder brother, Walter, the second son, parson of Kincardine O'Neil, already mentioned, forcibly took possession of the castle of Dumbarton as belonging heritably to his family, and held it till 1402, when Robert III offered him the see of St. Andrews, then vacant, as a recompense for its surrender, but he died about Christmas of the same year

The male line of the family was represented by Sir William de Danielstoun of Colgrain, third son of Sir John de Danielstoun above-mentioned This gentleman had acquired from his father, before 1377, the lands of Colgrain and Camis Eskan in Dumbartonshire, and had, besides, several grants from the crown. He held office in the household of Robert the Third, as well as in that of his eldest son, the ill-fated duke of Rothesay, and on his death in 1393 his widow, the Lady Marjory, had a pension from the king's chamberlain. His descendant, Robert Danielstoun of Colgrain, was attainted for joining William, fourth earl of Glencairn, in his correspondence with Henry the Eighth of England, but in 1546, had a remission under the great seal for all treasons and crimes committed by him in concert with the said earl.

In the seventeenth century, John Dennistoun of Colgrain, in direct descent from this Robert, adhered faithfully to the king during the civil wars, and in 1653, when the last effort was made by the cavaliers in Scotland, under the earl of Glencairn, for the restoration of Charles the Second, he joined that nobleman's banner, and received from him the commission of colonel In the following autumn, however, after Glencairn had left the army, and General Middleton who had succeeded him in the command, had been surprised and defeated in a defile in the Highlands by Morton, one of Monk's officers, the laird of Colgrain was specially included in the treaty of surrender, and his estates exempted from attainder. He died in the ensuing year, from a wound received in the Highland expedition Having no issue male, his eldest daughter, Margaret, succeeded to the estates in virtue of an entail made by her father, on condition of her marrying the heir male of the family, William, the elder of the two sons of Mr Archibald Dennistoun of Dalchurne, minister of Campsie,—which she did,—and of sixteen children which they had, only one son survived, John, who freed the property, which had been much involved, from debt. James, his son and successor, was twice married, and had three sons, and a daughter, Mary, the wife of John Alston of Westerton, Dumbartonshire. Richard, his third son, purchased Kelvin Grove, near Glasgow, and took his designation from that estate. He married Christina, daughter of James Alston, merchant in Glasgow, heir to the estate of Westerton.

James Dennistoun of Colgrain, the eldest son, succeeded in 1796, and for nearly thirty years, was convener of the county of Dumbarton He was also vice-lieutenant of the county, and colonel of the Dumbartonshire militia. He died in 1816. His only son, James Dennistoun of Dennistoun, inherited the estates of Colgrain and Camis Eskau, and in 1828 obtained from the Lord Lyon of Scotland, authority to bear the arms and style proper to the baronial house of De Danielstone of that ilk in Renfrewshire. He commanded the yeomanry cavalry of Dumbartonshire, and was a deputy-lieutenant of the county He died 1st June 1834 By Mary Ramsay his wife, daughter of George Oswald of Auchencruive, he had 5 sons and 6 daughters. His eldest son, James, born in 1803, author of 'Memoirs of the Dukes of Urbino,' and 'Memoirs of Sir Robert Strange,' died in 1855 For a memoir of him see SUPPLEMENT

Alexander Dennistoun, a son of the late James Dennistoun of Golfhill in Lanarkshire, was M P for that county from 1835 to 1837, and his brother, John Dennistoun, a merchant in Glasgow, represented that city from 1837 to 1847

DEWOON, surname of, see SUPPLEMENT

DICK, a surname of great antiquity in Scotland, supposed to be of Danish extraction, and to have had the same origin as the name of Van Dyke in the Netherlands.

The progenitor of the Dicks of Prestonfield in Edinburghshire, was one William de Dyck, who was first magistrate of Edinburgh in 1296, before the institution of the office of lord provost. To this family, who were deeply embarked in commerce, Scotland owes much of the advancement of her foreign and domestic trade during the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries. Their immediate ancestor, James Dick, a considerable merchant at Arbroath, lived in the reign of King James the Fifth, and chose that port for his residence, for the convenience of shipping and carrying on a foreign trade. In a charter under the great seal, dated in January 1539, he is designed "merchant burgess" of Arbroath. Contemporary with him was Sir Alexander Dick, archdean of Glasgow, who got a charter under the great seal of the lands of Dillerburn, Doggflatt, &c, in the county of Peebles, 29th September, 1548.

James Dick's son, Alexander Dick, resided chiefly in the Orkneys, where he had some landed property He was a person of considerable knowledge and learning, and after the Reformation he was appointed provost of the Cathedral church of Orkney He died before 1580. His son, John Dick, also a man of abilities, was proprietor of the islands of North Ronaldshay, Ormsay, &c., and carried on, from the Orkneys, a very extensive and advantageous trade with Denmark. Having gone there in command of one of the largest of his own ships, about the time that King James the Sixth went for his queen, in 1590 he returned with the squadron which conducted her majesty to Scotland, and becoming a great favourite with the king, afterwards resided chiefly at Edinburgh

His only son, Sir William Dick, a banker in Edinburgh, and one of the most eminent Scotsmen of the seventeenth century, acquired considerable wealth, even in his father's lifetime, and advanced to James the Sixth six thousand pounds sterling, to defray his household expenses when his majesty held a parliament in Scotland in 1618. In 1628 he farmed the customs on wine at six thousand two hundred and twenty-two pounds sterling, and the crown rents in Orkney at three thousand pounds sterling per annum, and afterwards the excise. By his connexion with the northern islands and Denmark he introduced a most advantageous and extensive trade from the Baltic to the Frith of Forth, as well as from the Mediterranean, by which and his negociating bills of exchange from Holland, he acquired great wealth Besides the islands of North Ronaldshay, Ormsay, &c., and his paternal inheritance in the Orkneys, he possessed many lands and baronies in Mid Lothian, East Lothian, the stewartry of Kirkcudbright, Dumfries-shire, &c., all of which were confirmed to him by no less than eight charters, under the great seal, from Charles the First. The barony of Braid in Mid Lothian, the precept of which is dated in 1631, became one of the chief titles of his family In the beginning of 1638, he joined with the earl (afterwards the marquis) of Montrose and other loyalists, for the national covenant, and in that critical year, and also in 1639, he was elected lord provost of Edinburgh In 1641, when Charles the First intended to visit Scotland, application was made to Sir William (then Mr) Dick for money to defray necessary expenses, and he frankly advanced one hundred thousand merks, for which he obtained security on the king's revenue 9th August of that year With a portion of this sum the arrears due to the Scots army appear to have been paid In the following January he received the honour of knighthood, and subsequently was created a baronet of Nova Scotia. Some time thereafter a bill was drawn upon him by order of parliament for twenty thousand pounds sterling, which he was obliged to pay, receiving as usual government security In 1644 he petitioned the estates for payment of a portion of the large sum owing to him, saying he was willing to take the rest by instalments, when the matter was referred to a committee. In the following March the parliament assigned him £40,000 sterling, owing "of the brotherly assistance by the parliament of England," and ordained him to have real execution upon his bond of two hundred thousand merks. They also gave him the excise of Orkney and Zetland, and also of the tobacco, but no part of that money was ever paid In December of the same year he again petitioned parliament for payment of some portion of it, "for preserving of his credit," &c., but received only empty promises. He was then one of the committee of parliament, and up to 1651 his name appears on the committee of estates, but seeing matters carried to extremities, and obtaining no redress for himself, he soon after withdrew from public affairs. The parliamentary party, treating him as a malignant (as the loyalists were then called), subjected him to heavy fines, and obtained from him at different times the large sum of £64,934 sterling. He and his family were ultimately reduced to very indigent circumstances, and in Cromwell's time he went to London, to endeavour to procure repayment of the sum due to him, but was thrown into prison by order of the Protector, and died at Westminster, 19th December 1655, in want, it is said, of even the commonest necessaries of life At one period he was reputed the wealthiest man in Scotland of his time, and was generally believed by his contemporaries to have discovered the philosopher's stone! [Archæologia Scotica, vol i p 346] In 1656 was published at London a folio pamphlet with the title of 'The lamentable case and distressed estate of the deceased Sir William Dick, containing several copper-plates, one representing Sir William on horseback, attended by guards, as lord provost of Edinburgh, superintending the unloading of one of his rich argosies at Leith, a second exhibiting him as arrested, and in the hands of bailiffs, and a third showing him dead in prison The tract is greatly valued by collectors of rare publications, and in a note to the Heart of Mid Lothian, in which David Deans makes allusion to his "sacks of dollars," Sir Walter Scott mentions that the only copy he ever saw for sale was valued at thirty pounds.

Sir William had five sons and two daughters His eldest son, John whose designation was of Braid, died before his father in 1642, leaving a son, William who, soon after the restoration, made application to parliament for payment of the large sums advanced by his grandfather to government, but without success. From Charles the Second, however, he got a pension of £132 sterling, till satisfaction was made to him, but it was soon discontinued His son William Dick, born in 1679, applied with his mother, Elizabeth Duncan, to parliament, first in the reign of James the Seventh, and afterwards in that of King William, in 1695, for redress, but got none He was a captain in the third regiment of foot guards, and was at the battle of Almanza under the duke of Argyle. Being appointed fort major and deputy-governor of New York, he there acquired a considerable plantation, and assumed the title of baronet as the heir male of his great grandfather Sir William, the first baronet. He died without issue-male in 1733

Sir Andrew Dick, the second son of Sir William, was an advocate and sheriff of Orkney From his father he got the lands of Craighouse and Pleulands, and was knighted by Charles the Second, about January 1663 He lent a hundred thousand merks to the earl of Morton, for which he obtained security upon the Orkneys, then deemed sufficient, but on the reduction of Morton's right, in Charles the Second's time, the security was entirely set aside so that both principal and interest were lost His son Louis Dick, a captain in the army, had a son Alexander, a merchant, whose eldest daughter Janet, married Sir Alexander Dick, the celebrated physician, as after stated Alexander's son Patrick on the death of his cousin Sir William Dick, governor of New York, became heir male of the family, but died without issue

William, the third son was the ancestor of the Dicks of Grange, in the county of Edinburgh Isabel, only child and heiress of William Dick, third baron of Grange, married before 1740 her cousin Sir Andrew Lauder baronet of Fountainhall, grandfather of the late eminent writer, Sir Thomas Dick Lauder, and in consequence succeeded to the estate of Grange (see LAUDER, surname of).

Alexander, the fourth son acquired from his father the estate of Heugh near North Berwick, and was the father of Sir James Dick, the first of Prestonfield

Louis the fifth son obtained from his father in patrimony forty thousand merks, and entering the navy was commander of a frigate in the cousting service His great-grandson, Sir John Dick, was bred a merchant, and went abroad in 1739 After residing for some time in Holland, he was in 1754, by George the Second, appointed British consul in Tuscany, an office afterwards confirmed to him by George the Third, by whom he was made a knight of the Bath. Subsequently he became head auditor and comptroller of the army accounts at London The male line of the four eldest sons of the first Sir William having entirely failed, Sir John became undoubted heir male of Sir William Dick of Braid, his grandfather's grandfather, and on 14th March, 1768, he was, before a respectable jury at Edinburgh, served heir to the title of baronet, which had been dormant since the death of Sir William Dick of Braid, who died in 1733, great-grandson of the first Sir William Sir John died in 1805, without issue. His nearest relations and heirs at law were the Prestonfield family, but, in his old age, he was induced to leave nearly the whole of his large fortune to strangers, to the prejudice of his own connexions

James Dick, the son of Alexander Dick of Heugh, fourth son of the first Sir William, was a merchant in Edinburgh and purchased the lands of Priestfield in Mid Lothian He was created a baronet of Nova Scotia, 2d March 1677, and having also bought the lands of Corstorphine, and several other lands belonging to the Prestons of Craigmillar, he united the latter to his barony of Priestfield and changed the name to Prestonfield In 1687 he greatly improved that place with good grass enclosures, which seem to have been the earliest improved and enclosed lands in the neighbourhood of Edinburgh, and he was one of the first to employ the refuse of the streets of Edinburgh on his fields as manure The same year the principal mansionhouse of Prestonfield was built. Sir James Dick was with the duke of York in 1682 on his voyage from London in the Gloucester man-of-war, when that vessel struck upon a sandbank about twelve leagues from Yarmouth, and was saved in the longboat, while the prince and Mr Churchill, one of the gentlemen of his bedchamber, afterwards the great duke of Marlborough, made their escape in another boat An interesting account of this event, in a letter from Sir James to Mr Patrick Flies, merchant, London, dated Edinburgh, 9th May 1682, is printed in Playfair's British Family Antiquity, (vol viii app pp cxxxvii and cxxxviii note) In the same year he was elected lord provost of Edinburgh and again in 1683 In the former year he presided at a banquet given to the duke of York, along with his duchess, and the princess Anne his daughter afterwards Queen Anne, in the parliament house, which cost the city above fourteen hundred pounds sterling, and at which was present the whole court of Scotland and a numerous train of nobility

In 1682, Sir James was one of the jurymen on the earl of Seaforth's trial By his wife Anne, daughter of William Paterson of Drumure, Fifeshire, he had several children, but they all died young except one daughter, Janet, who married Sir William Cunningham of Caprington baronet Having no surviving male issue he made an entail of his estates in 1699, failing himself and heirs male of his body to the second and younger sons successively of his daughter Janet, by the said Sir William Cunningham, and their issue male, &c He also got a baronet's patent from Queen Anne, dated 22d March 1707, to go with the entail, and in 1710, he made another strict entail to the same series of heirs, obliging them to take the name of Dick, on succeeding to the title and estate of Prestonfield On his death in 1728, he was succeeded by his daughter, Janet, Lady Cunningham and her third but second surviving son William became, in her right, second baronet of Prestonfield, and assumed the name of

Dick, in virtue of the entail made by his grandfather He married Anne, daughter of the Hon Sir James Montgomery of Royston, baronet, one of the lords of session, third son of the first earl of Cromarty This lady appears to have possessed both wit and spirit in a high degree, though they were not always shown in a manner that the more strict notions of decorum of a later age would altogether approve of, as she is noted for having, in her youth, occasionally amused herself with sallying out to the streets, dressed in male attire, in search of adventures, with her maid, also in man's apparel, as her attendant. Some of her poetical lampoons, privately printed by C Kirkpatrick Sharpe, Esq , in a rare little volume, entitled 'A Ballad Book,' are curious specimens in their way of the singular notions of delicacy which prevailed at that period. She died in 1741 and Sir William, her husband, in 1746, without issue, when the estate and title devolved upon his immediate younger brother, Sir Alexander, the celebrated physician, of whom a memoir is given below, in larger type.

Sir Alexander's eldest son, Sir William Dick, the fourth baronet of Prestonfield, born 7th January 1762, early entered the army, and at the age of sixteen, was adjutant in the 1st regiment of foot-guards. Soon after, he became captain in the 10th regiment of foot, but retired from the army, on succeeding to the estate. Subsequently he was appointed major in the Mid-Lothian Fencible cavalry, and died (in the assembly at Durham, at which city he was then on service with his regiment) 19th November 1796. His only son, Sir Alexander Dick, the fifth baronet, died shortly after coming of age, June 2d, 1808, and was succeeded by his uncle, John, the second son of Sir Alexander, the third baronet. Sir John died in December 1812, when his younger brother, Sir Robert Keith Dick, became the seventh baronet. On his death in 1849, he was succeeded by his son, Sir William Hanmer Dick, who obtained the authority of parliament to assume the name of Cuninghame after that of Dick as already mentioned, (see vol. i art. CUNINGHAME, p. 745) The present representative of the family thus possesses the two baronetcies of Prestonfield and Caprington

DICK, SIR ALEXANDER, Baronet, an eminent physician, fourth (but third surviving) son of Sir William Cuninghame of Caprington, Ayrshire, and Janet, daughter and heiress of Sir James Dick, baronet, of Prestonfield, was born at the latter place, October 23d, 1703 While his two elder brothers had the prospect of being provided for, the one as heir to his father and the other to his mother, it was thought necessary that he should learn a profession, and accordingly, having chosen that of medicine, after studying for some time at the university of Edinburgh, he went to Leyden, and became a pupil under the illustrious Boerhaave On August 31, 1725, he obtained the degree of M D , when he published an inaugural dissertation 'De Epilepsia,' and not long after returned to Scotland On the 23d January, 1727, he received a second diploma of M D from the university of St. Andrews, and November 7th following, was admitted a fellow of the Royal College of Physicians of Edinburgh In 1736–7 he made the tour of Europe, accompanied by Allan Ramsay, the painter, son of the author of the Gentle Shepherd, and resided for a considerable time in Italy Of this tour a journal kept by himself has been printed in the Gentleman's Magazine for 1853

On his return to England, Mr Hooke, a gentleman of large fortune in Pembrokeshire, with whom he had formed an intimate friendship, persuaded him to settle as a physician in that county, and he practised with great reputation there for several years as Dr Alexander Cuningham, maintaining all the time a constant correspondence with his friends in Scotland, particularly with Allan Ramsay the poet

In 1746, he succeeded his brother in the title and estates of his mother's family, when he assumed the name of Dick, as already stated, and leaving Pembrokeshire, he fixed his residence at the family seat of Prestonfield on the south side of Edinburgh In 1756, though he had relinquished the active practice of his profession, he was elected president of the Royal college of Physicians, Edinburgh, and for seven years afterwards was re-elected to the same high office He would have been continued the head of that body but declined, lest he should deprive other gentlemen of a dignity to which their merits and professional standing entitled them in rotation He was one of the principal contributors to the fund for erecting the Hall of the Royal College of Physicians in George Street, Edinburgh, (removed in 1845 to Queen Street of that city,) in the library of which his portrait is said to have been placed, the first president on whom that honour had been conferred On applying, however, to the council, for permission to make a drawing of it, for a woodcut for this work, it was found that no such portrait existed, the official answer being that "the picture was not known to be in the college, however, it was agreed that the officer should show four or five pictures in the college to the artist, any of which he might copy if he pleased!"

Sir Alexander Dick was long distinguished as an active and zealous member of the Philosophical Society of Edinburgh, and in the charter of incorporation of the Royal Society of that city, his name is enrolled as one of the first on the list. He was also for several years a manager of the Royal Infirmary of Edinburgh Possessing a high degree of public spirit, he took an active share in promoting every undertaking which he thought would be beneficial either to his native country, or to its metropolis In 1752 he was chosen one of the ten directors of the public works at Edinburgh, and in 1761 he was appointed one of the extraordinary directors of the select society for promoting the reading and speaking of the English language in Scotland He bestowed great attention on the culture and preparation of the true rhubarb plant when first introduced into Great Britain by Dr Mounsey, for which, in 1774, he received the gold prize medal from the London Society for the Encouragement of Arts and Commerce

Sir Alexander was the intimate friend of Dr Samuel Johnson, who, when in Edinburgh with his friend Boswell in 1773, visited him at Prestonfield, and there are several allusions to Johnson's regard for him in Boswell's life of that lexicographer When Johnson published his 'Journey to the Western Islands of Scotland,' in 1775, among others of his Scottish friends to whom he sent a presentation copy, was Sir Alexander Dick In his answer, conveying his thanks and acknowledging receipt, Sir Alexander, referring to the Doctor's remarks as to the then want of trees in Scotland, says, "The truths you have told, and the purity of the language in which they are expressed, as your 'Journey' is universally read, may and already appear to have a very good effect. For a man of my acquaintance tells me that the demand upon him for these articles is doubled"

Sir Alexander died November 10, 1785 aged 82. He was twice married, first in 1736 to his cousin Janet, daughter of Alexander Dick, Esq, merchant in Edinburgh, by whom he had a son who died an infant, and three daughters, and secondly in 1762, to Mary, eldest daughter of David Butler, Esq, county of Pembroke, by whom he had three sons, William, John, and Robert Keith, who all succeeded to the baronetcy and estate of Prestonfield, and three daughters. A memoir of Sir Alexander Dick, which was published soon after his death in the Edinburgh Medical Commentaries, was reprinted for private distribution, in 1849, by his descendant, the late Sir Robert Keith Dick Cuninghame, Baronet.

DICK, JOHN, D D, an eminent minister of the Secession church, the son of the Rev Alexander Dick, minister of the Associate congregation of Seceders in Aberdeen, and a daughter of Capt. Tolmie of that city, was born there October 10, 1764. He early gave indication of superior mental endowments, and while at the grammar school of Aberdeen, he carried off from his youthful compeers several prizes When he had completed his twelfth year he became a student in King's College, Old Aberdeen, having been the successful candidate for one of the bursaries of the college In 1780 he entered the Divinity Hall of the Associate Burghers, under Brown of Haddington, and in 1785 he received his license as preacher from the Associate presbytery of Perth and Dunfermline He soon received calls from Scone, Musselburgh, and Slateford, two miles from Edinburgh, and was ordained minister of the Secession congregation at the latter place, October 26, 1786 During the Old Light controversy, a synod sermon which he preached as moderator, and afterwards published, was made the subject of complaint to the Synod by some of the brethren, who then withdrew from the Secession church In 1801 he removed to Glasgow as colleague to the Rev Alexander Pirie, minister of the Secession congregation Shuttle Street, now Greyfriars, whom he succeeded in 1810 He had twice previously refused a call from the congregation at Aberdeen, to be his father's successor In 1815 he received the degree of D D from the college of Princetown, New Jersey, America In 1820 he was chosen professor of theology to the Associate Synod, and in March 1832 succeeded the earl of Glasgow as president of the Auxiliary Bible Society of Glasgow In the same year he was elected president of the Voluntary Church Association in that city He died somewhat suddenly January 25th, 1833, in the 69th year of his age, and 47th of his ministry On the 23d he had spoken at a public meeting in Glasgow held for the purpose of petitioning the legislature for some enactment concerning the better observance of the Sabbath On the evening of the same day after returning home from a meeting of his session, he complained of earache; but as this was a complaint to which he was subject, it created no alarm He was restless during the night, rose at a late hour next morning, and on the afternoon of the 24th was seized with shivering, when he was obliged to retire to bed. Medical aid was procured, and recourse was had to bleeding, which afforded him a temporary relief But he soon after sunk into a stupor, from which he never recovered The disease was ascertained from a post mortem examination, to have been internal suppuration His remains were interred in the Necropolis of Glasgow, where a most tasteful monument has been erected over his grave At the meeting of the United Synod, in the following April, they entered on their record a well-expressed tribute of respect to his memory Soon after his establishment at Slateford he married Jane, daughter of the Rev George Coventry of Stitchell, by whom he had a family As a theological writer, Dr Dick held a high reputation in the body to which he belonged The following is a list of his works —

The Conduct and Doom of false Teachers, a Sermon from 2 Pet. ii. 1 1788 The publication of this discourse was occasioned by an Essay which Dr M'Gill of Ayr had published on the death of Christ, in which Socinian sentiments were openly maintained

Confessions of Faith shown to be necessary, and the duty of churches with respect to them explained, a Sermon preached at the opening of the Associate Synod in April 1796 from 2 Tim i 28, "Hold fast the form of sound words." This sermon procured for Dr Dick considerable obloquy from a small minority who left the Secession Church about that time.

An Essay on the Inspiration of the Scriptures of the Old and New Testaments Edinb 1800, 12mo. 2d ed. 1804, 8vo. The matter of this work was at first delivered in a series of discourses from the pulpit, but afterwards thrown into a connected form It has gone through various editions, and is regarded as a standard work in divinity

DICK, THOMAS, LL D, author of 'The Christian Philosopher,' see SUPPLEMENT

DICKSON, a border surname, derived from the abbreviate or nurse-name of Dick for Richard, and meaning the son of Richard or Dick. Nisbet says, "They of the surname of Dickson, as descended of one Richard Keith, said to be a son of the family of Keith Marischal, took their name from Richard (called in the south country Dick), and to show themselves descended of Keith, earl Marischal, they carry the chief of Keith." [System of Heraldry, vol i. p. 76.] In Berwickshire there were formerly several families of this name of old standing; such as the Dicksons of Buchtrig; of Belchester; of Newbigging; of Wester Binning; and of Sornbegg. Of the last, Sir Robert Dickson of Sornbegg, subsequently designed of Inveresk, was created a baronet in 1695 but the title soon became extinct. The lands of Chatto and Buchtrig were in the present century purchased by Walter Dickson, seedsman in Edinburgh, and entailed by him.

Some descendants of the Keiths, hereditary marischals, whose assumed name was Dickson, left Scotland at an early date, and became tenants of Furness abbey in Lancashire, where 'William Dycson, George Sandys, and William Dycson," were witnesses to an indenture in 1525 Several of the family had previously fought with the English in the French wars, one of whom acquired the arms "a fleur-de-lys and chief ermine." This bearing was first recorded in 1448, when Sir Nicholas Dixon, baron of the exchequer and rector of Cheshunt, dying, his arms were placed upon his tomb in the chancel of his church In the 15th century John Dixon of Furness Fells married Anne Roos (descended from Robert Lord Roos and the Princess Isabel his wife), whose mother was a Thornborough John's daughter, Margaret, was mother to Archbishop Sandys, by whose influence his cousins, Richard Dixon and John Thornborough, were respectively made bishop of Cork and Clovne, and dean of York From Bishop Dixon descended the knightly family of Dixon of Barretstown Castle, county Kildare, which castle was obtained from the Eustaces by a match with Sir Maurice Eustace, lord chancellor of Ireland This short but brilliant line, famed in the field, the senate, and at the bar, and closely allied by marriage with the O Nials and Annesleys, ended in 1732 in an heiress, married to Sir Kildare Borrowes, (descended maternally from the earls of Cork and Kildare) ancestor of Sir Erasmus Dixon Borrowes of Lauragh Queen's county Bishop Dixon's brother, or cousin, William, who settled in Yorkshire, circa 1560, was ancestor of the Dixons formerly of Beeston Yorkshire, but now of Seaton-Carew, Co Durham, and the mother of the present representative of the family (1860) was of the Macdonalds of Perth

On 21st September 1802 a baronetcy of the United Kingdom was conferred on Admiral Archibald Dickson, second son of Archibald Dickson, Esq of Hardingham, of Norfolk, descended from a Scottish family He died in 1808 His nephew Sir Archibald Collingwood Dickson, 2d baronet, admiral of the Red, died in 1827, aged 55 years. The latter's eldest son, Admiral Sir William Dickson 3d baronet, born in 1798, was a midshipman at the bombardment of Algiers in 1816 Seat in Scotland, Sydenham House, Roxburghshire.

The first of the family of Dickson of Hartree in Lanarkshire was John Dickson, an eminent lawyer of the 17th century, who acquired the lands of Kilbucho, Peebles-shire, from the earl of Morton in 1630, and those of Hartree, in Lanarkshire, from the earl of Traquair in 1633 Admitted advocate 9th June 1649, on 7th of August following he was appointed by the Estates one of the lords of session, taking his seat as Lord Hartree. In Balfour's Annals (vol iv p. 168), under date 22d November 1650, we find it stated that "The committee of Estates ordains Mr Jo. Dicksone, Colonell Leighton, and the king's advocate to examine Mosse, the Kellyache spay, that he may be hanged."

Of the same family was the Rev David Dickson, minister of Newlands, Peebles-shire, and proprietor of the estate of Kilbucho, whose third son, the Rev. David Dickson, at one time minister of Libberton in Lanarkshire, was afterwards the first minister of the chapel of ease, New Street, Canongate, on its erection in 1795, and ultimately of New North church, Edinburgh, and died 3d August 1820 A volume of his Sermons was published in 1817 The eldest s of the latter, the Rev Dr David Dickson, was one of the ministers of St. Cuthbert's or West Kirk parish, Edinburgh, and died 29th July 1842, in the 63d year of his age. He edited an edition of Horsely on the Psalms, a great portion of which was in Hebrew He also published several sermons, preached on public occasions, one of these was on the death of his colleague, the Rev Sir Henry Wellwood Moncreiffe, in 1827, and another on that of Dr Andrew Thomson in 1831

DICKSON, DAVID, an eminent presbyterian divine of the seventeenth century, the only child of John Dickson, a wealthy merchant of Glasgow, was born in the Trongate of that city, in 1583 He was at first designed for the mercantile profession, but his total unfitness for it, and a severe attack of illness by which he was visited when very young, induced his parents to educate him for the church It is said that, previous to his birth, they had resolved to devote him to the ministry, if favoured with a son, and that their doing so at last, was only in fulfilment of their original intention He studied at the university of Glasgow, and on taking his degree of M.A, he was appointed one of the regents or professors of philosophy in that college, as was then the custom in the Scottish universities for graduates destined for the ministry Having been licensed to preach the gospel, he was in 1618, ordained minister of the parish of Irvine in Ayrshire Sometime after he declared against the five articles of Perth as unscriptural, and was in consequence, at the instance of Law, archbishop of Glasgow, summoned to appear before the High Court of Commission at Edinburgh, on the 19th of January 1622 He accordingly appeared, and gave in a paper declining the jurisdiction of the court On several of the bishops entreating him to take it up again, he answered, "I laid it not down for that end, to take it up again" He was sentenced to deprivation of his ministry at Irvine, and ordained to proceed to Turriff in Aberdeenshire within twenty days He continued preaching almost daily till these were expired, and was then about to commence his journey to the north, when at the earnest request of the earl of Eglintoun he was permitted to remain in Ayrshire, and for about two months he preached in the hall and courtyard of Eglintoun castle, weekly, to large congregations of his parishioners. He was then ordered by the archbishop of Glasgow to set out for the place of his banishment, which he did, and during his stay in Turriff, he frequently preached there with the full consent of the minister of that parish In the meantime Lord Eglintoun and other friends made many applications to have him restored to his flock, and the archbishop at length declared his readiness to remove the sentence of banishment, provided he withdrew his declinature, but this he refused to do He was sent for to Glasgow, that his friends might, if possible, prevail upon him to make concessions, but, although in obedience to their wishes he undertook the journey, no entreaties could move him from his purpose, and in consequence he returned to Turriff

In July 1623, he was allowed, without any condition, to return to his charge at Irvine, and remained unmolested till the year 1637, when, for having harboured Mr Robert Blair, and Mr John Livingstone, on their being forced to leave their charges in the north of Ireland by the interference of the Irish bishops, and allowing them to preach for him, he was again cited before the High Commission court, but the influence of the bishops was now much curtailed, and they did not deem it advisable this time to proceed to extremities against him

To the establishment of the second reformation in Scotland, which soon after occurred, Mr Dickson was in a great degree instrumental It was he who prevailed on the presbytery of Irvine to apply, in 1637, for the suspension of the service book, and he was one of those who were deputed to urge upon the ministers and people in and around Aberdeen, to renew the covenant In the memorable year 1638, he was proposed by some persons, previous to the meeting of the General Assembly at Glasgow, to fill the chair on that important occasion, and although the choice fell upon Mr Alexander Henderson, Mr Dickson took an active part in the proceedings In the short campaign of 1639, he acted as chaplain to a regiment of Ayrshire men commanded by the earl of Loudoun, and after the disbanding of the army he was almost unanimously chosen moderator of the subsequent General Assembly which met at Edinburgh in August of that year In the course of this assembly he was invited to accept of a charge in Glasgow; but such was the opposition made to his removal by the earl of Eglintoun and his parishioners at Irvine, that the General Assembly refused to sanction his translation Notwithstanding his popularity and great success as a preacher, he ever maintained a humble and modest deportment, and was once heard to declare that the vintage of Irvine in his time was not equal to the mere gleanings of Ayr in that of Mr Welch

In 1640, he was appointed to the professorship of divinity in the university of Glasgow, instituted in that year In the Assembly of 1643, he was nominated, with Alexander Henderson, the moderator, and David Calderwood, to prepare the draft of the 'Directory for Public Worship' He was also the author, conjunctly with Mr Durham, of 'The Sum of Saving Knowledge' In 1650, he was elected to the divinity chair in the university of Edinburgh, in which his 'Truth's Victory over Error,' was originally delivered by him in Latin to his students, and afterwards translated into English and published, with his name, at Glasgow in 1725

In all the public affairs of his time, and in the keen controversy which was maintained between the Resolutioners and Protesters, he took an active share publishing several pamphlets in favour of the former party At the restoration, for declining to take the oath of supremacy, he was, with many others from their charges, ejected from his chair, and the subsequent proceedings of government in favour of episcopacy appear to have seriously affected his health In December 1662, he was seized with a severe illness, from which he never recovered Mr Livingstone, one of the "outed" ministers, who visited him on his deathbed, has left on record the memorable saying which he uttered in the immediate prospect of death On being asked how he felt, he exclaimed, "I have taken all my good deeds, and all my bad deeds, and have cast them together in a heap before the Lord, and have fled from both to Jesus Christ, and in him I have sweet peace" In the beginning of 1663, feeling death approaching, he summoned his family to his bedside, and addressed a few words to each of them He concluded with solemnly pronouncing the apostolical blessing, after which he lifted up his hand and closed his own eyes. An account of his works, which are marked by great vigour of thought, and simplicity, and clearness of style, will be found in Wodrow's Life of Dickson, prefixed to the latter's 'Truth's Victory over Error' Subjoined is a list of them

DICKSON, Sir David James Hamilton, M D, an eminent physician and medical writer, inspector of fleets and hospitals, was the youngest son of the Rev George Dickson, minister of Bedrule, Roxburghshire, where he was born in 1780 He studied for the medical profession at the university of Edinburgh, and in 1798 became a licentiate of the Royal College of Surgeons of that city In the following year he was appointed a surgeon in the navy, and served in the expeditions to Holland, in 1799, and to Egypt, in 1801 In 1806 he was appointed acting physician and inspector of the fleet and hospitals of the Leeward Islands, and in 1813, superintending physician of the Russian fleet in the Medway For his services in the latter capacity, he received the thanks of his imperial majesty, the emperor of Russia, and was nominated a knight of the order of St Vladimir In 1814 he was appointed physician to the Mediterranean fleet, but changed to the Halifax station In 1816 he became a fellow of the Royal College of Physicians, Edinburgh, and in 1822, a member of the Royal College of Physicians, London In 1824 he was appointed physician to the Royal Naval Hospital at Plymouth, and in 1840 inspector of hospitals. He was physician inspector at the capture of the French and Danish Islands in the West Indies, and in the expedition on the Chesapeake, New Orleans, &c , and for his services he was knighted by King William the Fourth in 1834 He was a Fellow of the Royal Society, Edinburgh, and of the Linnæan Society, &c. He died at Plymouth on the 2d January 1850, in his 70th year

Dingwall, a surname derived from the town of Dingwall in Ross-shire. According to the old Statistical Account of Scotland, the name, formerly Dygnaval, or Dygna vallis took its origin from the richness of the soil of the lower grounds, which form a considerable part of the parish of Dingwall. Some writers with greater probability consider the name to be of Scandinavian origin, and refer it to a word expressive of its being the seat of justice.

One of the original judges of the court of session, on the spiritual side, on its first institution, May 27, 1532, was Sir John Dingwall, provost of Trinity college, Edinburgh, whose residence, Dingwall castle, stood on the ground now occupied by the buildings at the junction of Waterloo Place with Shakspere Square, Edinburgh He had previously been rector of Strabrok and archdeacon of Caithness in 1524, in which year he obtained a charter under the great seal of the mansion, orchard, and garden of Wester Strabrok in Linlithgowshire He died before the 9th July, 1533 He is supposed to be the same "Sir John Dungwell" whom John Knox accuses of having, "according to the charitie of kirkmen," entertained the wife, and wasted the substance of one Alexander Furrour, during his seven years' confinement in the Tower of London [Knox's Hist. p 15] Some severe Latin verses on this judge by Buchanan, are quoted in Haig and Brunton's Senators of the College of Justice.

Dingwall, Lord, a title in the peerage of Scotland, conferred by King James the Sixth on Andrew Keith, son of Robert Keith, abbot of the Cistertian monastery of Deer in Aberdeenshire, second son of William Lord Keith of the Marischal family [see Marischal, earl] Douglas says that this peerage was created 9d August 1587, but Moyes in his 'Memoirs' gives the date 15th March 1583-4, and he appears to be correct, as in the unprinted acts of parliament 1585, is one excepting the Lord Dingwall from the act made anent the revocation of the king's property [Douglas' Peerage, Wood's edit. vol i p. 413, note] His lordship was one of the commissioners sent in 1589 to treat of the marriage between the king and Anne of Denmark He died without issue, having previously resigned his estate and honours in favour of William Keith of Delney, who, thereupon, had a charter of the same, dated at Holyroodhouse, 22d January 1592-3 The title, however, was extinct before 1606, as it does not appear in the decreet of ranking of the peers that year, and Sir Richard Preston was created Lord Dingwall in 1607

This gentleman, first Lord Dingwall of the second creation, appears to have been a younger son of Preston of Whitehill, of the family of Preston of Preston and Craigmillar (see Preston, surname of). He was a great favourite of King James the Sixth, by whom he was knighted, and appointed one of the gentlemen of his bedchamber On the accession of James to the English throne, he attended his majesty to London, and was made one of the knights of the Bath at his coronation, 25th July 1603. In 1607 he had the constabulary of Dingwall bestowed upon him, and was created a peer of Scotland by the title of Lord Dingwall, as already stated, and his peerage confirmed by charter of 8th June 1609, to him and his heirs whatsoever He married (the match being brought about by the king) Lady Elizabeth Butler, only surviving child of Thomas tenth earl of Ormond and Ossory, widow of her cousin-german, Viscount Tulleophelim and on the earl's death in 1614, he took possession of his landed property, in prejudice of the rights of the heir male, Walter Butler, eleventh earl of Ormond, in whose favour a settlement had been made by the late earl. For not submitting to an adverse decision of the king declaring Lord Dingwall entitled to the estate, the earl was committed to the Fleet prison, where he was detained eight years, and only obtained his liberty on his majesty's death. Lord Dingwall had one child, Elizabeth, whom the duke of Buckingham intended for the wife of his nephew, George Fielding, second son of William first earl of Denbigh, and with a view to their marriage, he was created Lord Fielding in the Irish peerage, and Lord Dingwall, Viscount Callan and earl of Desmond in the same peerage, with remainder to his intended son-in-law, George Lord Fielding, 20th November 1622 The match however, was frustrated by the assassination of the duke of Buckingham and the death of Lord Dingwall (earl of Desmond), the latter being drowned on the passage betwixt Dublin and Holyhead, 28th October 1628 The barony of Dingwall devolved on his daughter, and the earldom of Desmond on Lord Fielding, in whose family it still remains.

His daughter, Lady Elizabeth Preston, baroness of Dingwall, born 25th July 1615 married in 1629, when she was little more than fourteen years of age, James, Lord Thurles, (grandson and heir-apparent of Walter, earl of Ormond), afterwards the great duke of Ormond. His Grace died 21st July 1668, and was buried with his duchess (died 21st July 1684) in Westminster Abbey

Their grandson, James, second duke of Ormond, born 29th April 1665, was an eminent military commander, and commander-in-chief of all the British forces at home and abroad He was also for several years lord lieutenant of Ireland H ing preferred a claim to the title of Lord Dingwall in Scotland, the House of Lords, on 2d March 1711 ordered it to be referred to their committee for privileges. He voted as Lord Dingwall at two elections in 1713, though his title was not admitted by the House till 8th July 1714 His Grace was impeached for high treason 21st June 1715, and returning 8th August into France, was forfeited when the title of Baron Dingwall was attainted He died 16th November 1745, in the 71st year of his age without surviving issue

DINWOODIE, or DUNWITHIE, a surname derived from lands of that name in the parish of Applegarth, Dumfriesshire, formerly possessed by a family that continued there a long time. In the Ragman Roll appears the name of Alleyn Dunwithie, supposed by Nisbet to be of the family of that ilk in that county At the beginning of the sixteenth century, the lairds of Dinwoodie seem to have been at feud with the Jardines, and to have suffered much from the violence of their neighbours in those unsettled times. At the Justice-Ayre held at Dumfries in August 1504, John Jardine in Sibbald-beside and Robert Brig living with Alexander Jardine, produced a remission from the king for art and part of the cruel slaughter of Thomas Dunwedy of that ilk, at his place of Dunwedy Only eight years afterwards (about 1512,) "the Laird Dunwiddie was slayne in Edinburgh by two persones, who escheaped by taking the sanctuarie of Holyroodhouse, a sanfgaird much respected in those days." [Anderson's MS Hist. Adv Lib] Sir James Balfour calls him the laird of Drumweiche, and says he was killed "by the Jardans." See 'Pitcairn's Criminal Trials,' under the first-named date, which contains also the following entries — Robert Dunwedy, son of the laird of Dunwedy and Gavin Johnstone were admitted to the king's composition (to satisfy parties) for art and part of the stouthrief of four horses, two candlesticks, and sundry other goods from Bartholomew Glendunwyne, in company with the laird of Johnstone and his accomplices, and Nicholas Dunwedy, in Dunwedy, called 'Gait-fut' (Goat-foot), convicted of resetting Adam Corry, common thief, in his theftuous deeds,—hanged. In 1548, Alexander Dinwoodie of that ilk was forfeited for joining with the English.

DISCHINGTON, (often familiarly contracted into Distin,) a surname well-known in the East Neuk of Fife. In the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries a family of this name held the estate of Ardross in the parish of Elie, now belonging to Sir Wyndham Carmichael Anstruther of Anstruther, baronet. In 1557 Dischington of Ardross was one of the assessors in the Perambulation between the marches of Easter and Wester Kinghorn, and in 1517, Thomas Dischington was captain of the palace of St Andrews. The following couplet is from an old ballad relative to Crail:

> "Was you e'er in Crail town, > Saw you there Clerk Dischington?"

DOIG, DAVID, LL D, a learned philologist, the son of a small farmer in Forfarshire, was born in 1719 His father died while he was yet an infant, and his mother entered into a second marriage His stepfather, however, behaved kindly to him From a defect in his sight, he did not learn to read till his twelfth year but such was his quickness and application that in three years he was successful in a Latin competition for a bursary at St Andrews He was at first intended for the ministry, but certain scruples regarding the Westminster Confession of Faith deterred him from the Church After completing his studies at St

Andrews, where he took the degree of bachelor of arts, he became teacher of Monifieth parish school, and subsequently of that of Kennoway and Falkland. He was afterwards appointed by the magistrates of Stirling rector of the grammar school of that town The university of Glasgow conferred on him the degree of LL D on the same day that he received from St Andrews his diploma as M A Dr Doig was an eminent oriental scholar, being deeply versed in the history, languages, and literature of the East He wrote the dissertations on Mythology, Mysteries, and Philology, for the Encyclopædia Britannica, when that work was under the superintendence of the Rev Dr George Gleig Mr Tytler, in his Life of Lord Kames, gives a short memoir of Dr Doig, who had entered into a controversy with his lordship relative to the opinions propounded by him in his 'Essay on Man,' as to the original savage state of the human race. Two Letters which he addressed to his lordship on the subject were published for the first time in 1792, 12mo To the Transactions of the Royal Society of Edinburgh in 1794, he contributed a Dissertation on the ancient Hellenes Dr Doig died March 16, 1800 A mural tablet, with an appropriate inscription in commemoration of his virtues and learning, was raised by Mr John Ramsay of Ochtertyre The magistrates of Stirling also erected a marble monument to his memory

Don, a surname probably derived from the river of that name, as, according to Camden, "rivers have imposed names to some men" In the Anglo-Saxon, the word Don (English Downe) or Dun, means a down, that is, a large open plain or valley It was the name of a family which formerly possessed the lands of Teith, in the stewartry of Monteith, Perthshire, a descendant of which, Sir Alexander Don of Newton in Berwickshire, was, 2d June 1677, created a baronet of Nova Scotia. He was succeeded by his eldest son Sir James Don His second son was Sir Alexander Don of Rutherford, and his third son Patrick Don of Altonburn.

Sir Alexander Don of Newtondon, fifth baronet, married Lady Henriet Cunningham, sister of the last earl of Glencairn, and had an only son, Alexander, and two daughters, Elizabeth and Mary These young ladies were unfortunately drowned, June 12, 1795, with a companion (Miss Agnes Wilson, second daughter of Dr Wilson, physician in Kelso), while forduing a brook near their father's mansion, which had been considerably swelled by sudden rains. Sir Alexander's son, Sir Alexander, sixth baronet, for some time M P for Roxburghshire, was an intimate friend of Sir Walter Scott. He was twice married, but by his first wife had no issue By his second wife, Grace, eldest daughter of John Stein, Esq, Edinburgh, for several years M P for Bletchingley, he had a son and a daughter, and died in April 1826. She married, 2dly, General Sir James A Hope Wallace, K.C.B Sir Alexander's only son, Sir William Henry Don, 7th baronet, born May 4, 1825, became a cornet 5th dragoon guards in 1844, and was appointed extra aide-de-camp to the lord-lieutenant of Ireland. In 1845 he was made a lieutenant, but retired from the army in Nov of the same year, and became an actor He married 1st, in 1847, Antonia, daughter of M Lebrun of Hamburg, issue, a daughter 2dly, in 1857, eldest daughter of John Sanders, Esq, London. Sir William died at Hobart Town, Tasmania, March 19, 1862, baronetcy inherited by Wauchope of Edmonstone. (See WAUCHOPE.)

Donald, the name of several kings of early Scottish history The first four reigned before the Picts and Scots were united under Kenneth M'Alpin in 843 Donald the Fourth who succeeded in 632, was drowned in Loch Tay, Perthshire, having been there, it is said, "at fishing with his servants."

Donald V, sometimes called Donald I, succeeded his brother Kenneth in 860 The ancient laws of the kingdom were revised and confirmed under his authority, and according to Pinkerton (Enquiry, vol. i p. 178), the Gaël or Dalriads obtained a confirmation of the old laws assigned them by Ed Fin [Chr Pict] The Norwegians having invaded the kingdom Donald fought and defeated them, but is said at last to have fallen by their hands at Forres in 904.

DONALD, king of Scotland, commonly called Donald Bane, the son of Duncan, and brother of Malcolm Canmore, before usurping the throne was styled maormor or earl of Gowrie, and had large possessions in that district, as on the baptism of his nephew Alexander he conferred on him the lands of Liff and Invergowrie [Balfour's Annals, vol i p 6] On the usurpation of the throne by Macbeth, while his elder brother Malcolm fled into Cumberland, Donald took refuge in the Isles, where he seems to have ingratiated himself so well with the people and with the Celtic portion of the inhabitants of Scotland, that after the death of his brother Malcolm Canmore, in 1093, with their assistance he was enabled to take possession of the throne, to the exclusion of the children of the latter He was, however, dethroned in 1094, by Duncan the Second, the elder son of the late king, by Ingiobiorge, widow of Earl Thorfinn, (see vol i page 52, art ALEXANDER I,) but Duncan was himself treacherously slain in 1095, by Malpedir, thane of Moern or Garmoran, a district in northern Inverness-shire The other children of Malcolm by his second wife, Edgar, Alexander, and David, had, meanwhile, found refuge in England, under the protection of their maternal uncle, Edgar Atheling, when Duncan being removed, Donald Bane returned from his exile and reascended the throne, which he was permitted to fill but for a short time, as in the same year an army, composed of English, Anglo-Saxons and Anglo Normans, (many of whom had been expelled by Donald Bane from the country,) led by Edgar Atheling, and accompanied by the young princes his nephews, invaded Scotland, and the usurper Donald, being deserted by those who had twice enabled him to become king, was made prisoner, his eyes put out, and he was consigned for the rest of his life to a dungeon This took place in 1098, when Edgar, fourth son of Malcolm by the second marriage, succeeded to the throne Donald Bane's son, Madach by name, was earl of Athol in the reign of David the First He married Margaret daughter of Haco earl of Orkney Henry the grandson of Madach died in the reign of Alexander the Second, without issue male, and with him Donald Bane's descendants in the male line failed See vol i p 162, Art Athol.

DONALDSON, Walter, a learned professor of the seventeenth century, was a native of Aberdeen He was in the retinue of Bishop Cunningham of Aberdeen, and Peter Junius, grand almoner of Scotland, when sent on an embassy from King James the Sixth to the court of Denmark and the princes of Germany Subsequently he returned to the continent, and delivered a course of lectures on moral philosophy at Heidelberg One of his students having taken notes of these lectures, published them, and several editions of the work were printed both in Germany and Great Britain, under the title of Synopsis moralis Philosophiæ Donaldson was afterwards professor of philosophy and the Greek language, and principal of the university of Sedan, where he remained for sixteen years He was then invited to open a college at Charenton, but the proposed establishment was objected to as illegal, and was never commenced [Bayle's Dict vol iv p 626] His works are

DONALDSON, John, an eminent but eccentric painter, the son of a glover in Edinburgh, was born there in 1737 He early exhibited an extraordinary talent for drawing, and we are told that before he was twelve years of age he was enabled to contribute to his own support by drawing miniatures in India ink. Removing to London, while yet young, he for some time prosecuted his profession as a miniature painter with remarkable success, both in enamel and water colours His celebrated historical picture, 'The Tent of Darius,' which was purchased by the earl of Buchan, gained him the prize from the Society of Arts He also received prizes from the same society for two paintings in enamel, representing 'The Death of Dido,' and 'The Story of Hero and Leander' He occasionally also amused himself with the point, and etched several plates of beggars after Rembrandt Having, however, become disgusted with his profession, from mistaken notions of philanthropy, he occupied himself almost exclusively in proposing fanciful projects for the improvement of the condition of the human race, in consequence of which his business forsook him, and he was reduced to great misery He died in the utmost indigence, October 11, 1801, leaving a large quantity of manuscripts in an unfinished state His only acknowledged works are, 'An Essay on the Elements of Beauty,' Edin 1780, 8vo, and a volume of poems Mr Edwards, in his Anecdotes of Painters, ascribes to Donaldson a pamphlet published anonymously, under the title of 'Critical Observations and Remarks upon the Public Buildings of London'

DONALDSON, James, a printer of Edinburgh, bequeathed the greater part of his estate, exceeding £200,000, for the endowment and erection of an hospital in that city, for the maintenance of three hundred poor boys and girls He died in October 1830 Donaldson's Hospital, which occupies a commanding position at the west end of Edinburgh, is a spacious quadrangular structure, in the Elizabethan style, from a design by W H Playfair It was completed and opened in the end of 1850

DONALDSON, Joseph, author of the 'Eventful Life of a Soldier,' and 'Scenes and Sketches of a Soldier's Life in Ireland,' was born in Glasgow towards the end of the last century, but the exact date of his birth is not stated Having gone over to Paris in 1830, he took an active part in the Revolution of July, and died October 5th of that year, in consequence of disease brought on by his exertions and fatigue on that occasion

DOUGAL, a surname derived from Dhu-gal, the Gaelic for dark complexioned stranger, this being the name given to the son of the famous Somerled, lord of the Isles, who flourished in the twelfth century, and the patronymic of his descendants, the clan M'Dugal.

DOUGALL, JOHN, a learned miscellaneous writer, was a native of Kirkaldy, where his father was the master of the grammar school He studied for some time at the university of Edinburgh, applying himself particularly to classical literature, to mathematics, and to the acquirement of the modern languages of Europe He was afterwards employed as tutor and travelling companion, in which capacity he made the tour of Europe Subsequently he became private secretary to General Melville Ultimately he settled in London as an author by profession, and translator of works from the French and Italian languages He died in 1822, in great indigence He was the author of

He also contributed to various scientific and literary works, and for some years he was employed, under the patronage of the late duke of York, in preparing a new translation of Cæsar's Commentaries, with Notes and Illustrations, which, however, he did not live to complete.

DOUGLAS, the name of an ancient and once very powerful family in Scotland, long the rival of royalty Its origin is entirely unknown Hume of Godscroft, in his 'History of the Douglasses,' says, "We do not know them in the fountain, but in the stream; not in the root, but in the stem, for we know not who was the first mean man that did raise himself above the vulgar" The traditionary account, a mere family fable, which he gives of their origin, is, that in the 8th century, during the reign of Solvathius, king of Scots, one Donald Bane, of the Western Isles, made an irruption into the Scottish territory, and put to the rout the forces collected to repel his invasion An unknown warrior, with his friends and followers, came seasonably to their aid and in the conflict which ensued Donald was defeated and slain When the king inquired at his attendants to whom he owed his deliverance, the stranger was pointed out to him by one of them, with the Gaelic words, "Sholto Dhu-glas,"—'Behold the dark man" The king is said to have rewarded him with a large tract of land in Lanarkshire, which, with the river by which it is traversed, was called Douglas after him

George Chalmers, (Caledonia, vol i p. 579) derives the origin of the name from Douglas water, tracing it to the Celtic words "Dhu-glas," the dark stream. He states, but without any warrant, that the founder of the family was a Fleming named Theobald, who came to Scotland about 1150, and as a vassal of Arnald, abbot of Kelso, received from him a grant of some lands on Douglas water Wyntoun (Chron. b. viii c. 7) says that of the beginning of the Murray and the Douglas, he can affirm nothing for certain; nevertheless as both bear in their arms the same stars set in the same manner, it seems likely that they have come of the same kin, either by lineal descent or by collateral branch

The first of the name on record is William of Dufglas, who, between 1175 and 1199 witnessed a charter by Joceline, bishop of Glasgow, to the monks of Kelso, (see Origines Parochiales Scotiæ under parish of Douglas, vol i p. 155). He was either the brother or brother-in-law of Sir Freskin de Kerdale in Moray, and had six sons. 1 Sir Erkenbald, or Archibald, who succeeded him 2 Brice, prior of Lesmahago, and in 1203 bishop of Moray 3 Fretheskin parson of Douglas, afterwards apparently dean of Moray 4. Hugh, canon and probably archdeacon of Moray 5 Alexander, sheriff of Elgin 6 Henry canon of Moray

Sir William of Dufglas, the third of the family and apparently the son of Sir Archibald, was a witness to charters in 1240, and with Sir Andrew of Dufglas, probably his brother (progenitor of the Douglases of Dalkeith, earls of Morton) in 1248 He died in 1276 He had two sons, Hugh, who contributed to the defeat of the Danes at Largs in 1263, and succeeded his father in 1276, but dying without issue before 1288, he was succeeded by his brother William, surnamed the Hardy, from his valour and his deeds. In July 1291 he swore fealty to Edward the First in the chapel of Thurston. He afterwards attacked the English, and in 1296 was governor of the castle of Berwick, when the town was besieged by Edward and taken After the garrison had capitulated and been allowed to march out with military honours, Douglas was detained a prisoner in one of the towers of the castle called Hog's Tower, and the same year he renewed his oath of fidelity to Edward, at Edinburgh In May 1297, however, he joined Sir William Wallace, for which his estate was invaded with fire and sword by Robert Bruce, earl of Carrick, and his wife and children carried off In the subsequent July he again made submission to Edward, when he was sent to England and died in the castle of York in 1302

His eldest son was the celebrated Sir James Douglas, styled "the Good Sir James," the first really great man of the family, of whom a memoir follows in larger type. He left two natural sons, Sir William Douglas, styled the Knight of Liddesdale, and Archibald Douglas, lord of Galloway, called 'the Grim," of whom afterwards.

The knight of Liddesdale, the elder of the two, from his bravery was called the Knight of Chivalry After the death of Robert Bruce, he supported the cause of his son, King David the Second, and was present at the attack on Annan in December 1332, when Edward Baliol was put to flight. Being appointed warden of the west marches he was overpowered and taken prisoner by Sir Anthony de Lucy in the following March near Lochmaben, and did not recover his liberty till April 1335 On his return home he performed the most gallant feats, expelling the English from the whole of Teviotdale excepting the castle of Roxburgh He afterwards defeated, at Kilblane, the titular earl of Athol. (See vol i p. 162, art. ATHOL.) Not long after this, he was sent ambassador to France to inform David the Second, then residing at the French court, of the state of the realm. He afterwards sullied his fame by the cruel murder of Alexander Ramsay of Dalhousie in 1342, who had in a gallant manner taken the castle of Roxburgh from the English, Douglas himself having failed to do so. [See RAMSAY of Dalhousie.] At the intercession of Robert Stewart, Douglas was pardoned by the king, and he was invested with the important charge of sheriff of Teviotdale and keeper of Roxburgh castle. He accompanied King David to the battle of Durham, 20th October 1346, and was taken prisoner along with him. After an imprisonment of six years, he obtained his liberty upon dishonourable terms, as by an indenture which he entered into with Edward the Third, 17th July 1352, he engaged to serve that monarch against all parties whatsoever, and allow free passage to the English through his lands into Scotland, but was killed, in August 1353, as he was hunting in Ettrick forest, by his father's nephew, and his own godson, Sir William Douglas, the first earl of Douglas, in revenge for the death of Ramsay He left no issue.

The good Sir James was succeeded by his next brother, Hugh, who seems to have laboured under some corporeal or mental defect, as his name never appears in history

Archibald Douglas, youngest brother of Sir James, succeeded to the regency of Scotland in the infancy of David II, on the regent Sir Andrew Murray of Bothwell being led into captivity He was killed at Halidon Hill, July 22, 1333

His son, William de Douglas, was created earl of Douglas by David II in 1357 Before this period the chiefs of the family were styled lords of Douglas. The first earl was taken prisoner with David II at the battle of Durham, but soon ransomed He recovered Douglasdale from the English, and also expelled them from Ettrick forest and Tweeddale, and part of Teviotdale On the accession of Robert II he was a claimant for the crown He afterwards went to France, and was wounded at the battle of Poictiers, September 19, 1356. He commanded the Scots troops that defeated Musgrave, the governor of Berwick, near Melrose, in 1378 Two years afterwards he entered England with an army, and after burning Penrith, returned home laden with spoil He died in 1384 He was thrice married By his first wife, Lady Margaret Mar, sister and heiress of Thomas, 13th earl of Mar, he had a son, James, 2d earl of Douglas and Mar, and a daughter, Isabel, who inherited the earldom of Mar, on the death of her brother By his second wife he had no issue. By his third wife, Lady Margaret Stewart, Countess of Angus, relict of 13th earl of Mar, he had a son, George earl of Angus

James Douglas, second earl of that distinguished name, succeeded to the title in 1384, and, after many valorous exploits, was killed at the battle of Otterburn, July 21, 1388 His last words were, "I die, like my forefathers, in a field of battle, and not on a bed of sickness. Conceal my death, defend my standard, and avenge my fall It is an old prophecy, that a dead Douglas shall gain a field, and I hope it will be accomplished this night." In Pinkerton's History of Scotland will be found an interesting account of this battle, the subject of various poems and songs. He had two natural sons. The eldest, William de Douglas, was the ancestor of the ducal house of Queensberry, and from Archibald the second son, a valiant knight, the Douglases of Cavers are descended.

Archibald Douglas, lord of Galloway, styled the Grim, third earl of Douglas, an illegitimate son of the good Sir James Douglas succeeded his cousin James, slain at Otterburn in 1388. He is said to have surpassed all the Scotsmen of his age in wisdom, prowess and hardy enterprise, in the extent of his acquisitions, and in wealth In 1356 he accompanied William earl of Douglas to France, and was made prisoner at the battle of Poictiers, September 19th of that year, fighting on the side of the French against the English, but made his escape, by the presence of mind of Sir William Ramsay of Colluthie, who treated him as a lacquey having on the armour of his master slain in the battle, and offered a ransom of forty shillings for the pretended serving man, which was accepted, and he was ordered off to the field to search for his master's body Previous to returning to Scotland he remained some time at Bordeaux, and was the progenitor of several families of the same name in France. He is frequently mentioned by Froissart and other historians of that period. He and his son-in-law, the duke of Rothesay, successfully defended the castle of Edinburgh against Henry the Fourth of England in August 1400 He died in 1401

Sir William Douglas, Lord of Nithsdale, usually called "The Black Douglas," was the illegitimate son of the preceding He was a renowned warrior, and married Egidia, daughter of Robert the Second His name was a terror to the English, and after a life of bold and successful warfare, in 1389, with a train of Scottish knights, he went to Germany, and under Waldenrodt, Grand-master of the Teutonic Order, defended Dantzic, or Danesvick, against the pagans of Prussia, who besieged it under Uduslaus Ingello Douglas and his knights made a furious sally, cut the besiegers to pieces, and cleared the district, for which he was created prince of Danesvick, duke of Spruce, and admiral of the fleet. Thenceforth all Scotsmen were declared freemen of Dantzic, and in token thereof, the arms of the nation, with those of Douglas, were placed over the great gate, where they remained until it was rebuilt in 1711 A part of the suburbs is still named Little Scotland, and near it was the bridge where Douglas was basely murdered by the contrivance of the English Lord Clifford and a band of assassins in 1390

Archibald Douglas, fourth earl of Douglas, eldest son of Archibald, third earl, married Margaret, daughter of Robert the Third He was concerned with the duke of Albany in the imprisonment of his brother-in-law the duke of Rothesay and a remission under the great seal was granted to them 20th May 1402, on account of his death, which was stated to have happened through divine providence (See vol i p 85, Art. ALBANY) At the battle of Homildon, 14th September 1402, Douglas, who commanded the Scots, lost an eye, and was taken prisoner by Percy, the famous Hotspur He afterwards joined Percy and his father, the earl of Northumberland in their rebellion against King Henry, and proceeded with Hotspur towards Wales to assist Owen Glendower The king met the insurgents at Shrewsbury, and in the battle which ensued, July 21, 1403, Percy was killed, and his army totally defeated. Douglas, whose prowess called forth the praise of his opponents, was taken prisoner, and in 1407 on recovering his liberty he returned to Scotland After a variety of exploits against the English with a number of his followers, he went over to France in 1423, and being slain at the battle of Verneuil, in Normandy, in 1424, was buried in the church of Tours. He was created duke of Touraine by Charles the Seventh of France, and had the popular name of Tyne-man, on account of his losing most of the battles in which he engaged

Archibald Douglas, fifth earl of Douglas, and second duke of Touraine, only son of the preceding accompanied the earl of Buchan into France in 1420, at which time he bore the title of the earl of Wigton He distinguished himself at the battle of Beaugé in 1421, and had the county of Longueville conferred on him by Charles the Seventh. He was one of the ambassadors to England to adjust the ransom of James the First, and returned to Scotland with his sovereign He was arrested with the duke of Albany in March 1425, but was soon liberated, and sat as one of the jury on the trial of the latter. In May 1431 he was again imprisoned; but, at the urgent request of the queen and the nobility, was released in the following September. In 1437, on the death of James the First, he was elected one of the council of regency, and, in 1438, held the office of lieutenant-general of the kingdom, in which capacity he summoned a parliament. He died at Restalrig, June 26, 1439.

William Douglas, sixth earl of Douglas, succeeded his father Archibald, the fifth earl, in 1439, when he was little more than fourteen years of age. His immense estates in Scotland, and his foreign wealth and influence as duke of Touraine, rendered him by far the most formidable baron in the kingdom, and as he acted more like an independent prince than a subject, the Chancellor Crichton resolved to cut him off, with his brother. A parliament being assembled at Edinburgh, after the second reconciliation of Livingston and Crichton, the young earl was by specious pretexts induced to enter the capital, for the purpose of being present at it, and afterwards with his only brother David, and Malcolm Fleming of Cumbernauld, his counsellor and friend, attended a magnificent feast given by the sovereign in the castle of Edinburgh. The entertainment was prolonged with unusual pomp, and every delicacy was spread upon the table, when suddenly a band of armed men, at a given signal, rushed upon them from an inner room, bound their hands, and after a brief and hurried trial for treason, they were led forth to instant execution. Malcolm Fleming, their companion, shared the same fate. This happened Nov. 24, 1440.

James, seventh earl, called James the Gross, a prudent and peaceable man, the second son of the third earl, succeeded his grand-nephew. He was warden of the marches, and sat as one of the jury on the trial of Murdoch duke of Albany in 1425. In 1437 he had been created earl of Avondale, and died 24th March 1443. He is said to have been married to Lady Beatrix Stewart, fifth daughter of Robert duke of Albany, regent of Scotland, but by her had no issue. By his second wife, Lady Beatrix Sinclair, daughter of Henry earl of Orkney, he had with other children, William eighth earl, and James, ninth earl of Douglas, Archibald earl of Moray, Hugh earl of Ormond, (see these titles), and Sir John Douglas, lord of Balveny, forfeited in 1455.

William, the eighth earl, succeeded his father, James the Gross, in 1443, and, in 1444, married his cousin, Lady Margaret Douglas, the Fair Maid of Galloway, whose vast possessions restored the house of Douglas to all its former power, wealth, and grandeur. By his respectful submission he gained the affections of the young king, James the Second, who was weary of the control of Crichton and Livingston, and at a parliament held at Stirling in 1445, the chancellor and his colleague were, by the earl's artifices, formally declared rebels, and their estates forfeited. About 1446 Douglas was created lieutenant-general of the kingdom, when he became all-powerful in Scotland. In 1448 he obtained a victory over the English at the battle of Sark, and ravaged their country as far as Newcastle. James soon began to discover that he had advanced the earl too high, and, after the marriage of the king in 1449, his influence gradually declined. Disgusted at the loss of his power, and wishing to display his pomp in foreign countries, the earl proceeded, in 1450, to the Jubilee of Rome, with a retinue of six knights, fourteen gentlemen and eighty attendants. In his absence his vassals behaved so turbulently that the castle of Douglas was demolished by the king's orders. On his return to Scotland, he sent a submissive message to the king, and seemed at first to resume his former ascendancy over James' mind. But the enmity between him and Crichton, who had been restored to his former post of chancellor, still existed. Douglas attempted to assassinate Crichton, and hanged John Herries in contempt of the king's authority. Proceeding in his treasonable course, he entered into a formidable league with the earls of Crawford and Ross, and other nobles, for mutual defence and protection, and beheaded M'Lellan of Bombie for refusing to join in the confederacy. Such acts as these roused the indignation of James, who at length resolved upon endeavouring to rid himself of a subject so powerful. Accordingly, on the 13th February 1452 Douglas was prevailed upon to visit the court at the castle of Stirling, having obtained a safe conduct under the great seal. After supper, the king, taking him apart, informed him that he had heard of his league with Crawford and Ross, and desired him to dissolve such an illegal engagement. Douglas haughtily refused, when James, exclaiming with an oath, "If you will not break this league, I shall," drew his dagger, and plunged it into the earl's bosom. Sir Patrick Gray then struck the earl with a battle-axe, and others rushing in, Douglas fell by a multitude of daggers.

James, the ninth and last earl of Douglas, succeeded his brother, and immediately took up arms with the allies of his house to avenge his death. In 1454, James levied an army, and, after having ravaged the lands of the rebel earl, laid siege to his castle of Abercorn, to relieve which Douglas collected a large force, most of them borderers, and encamped on the south side of the Carron, on his march to Abercorn. The army of Douglas was far superior to the king's, both in number and in valour, and a single battle must, in all probability, have decided whether the house of Stewart or that of Douglas was henceforth to possess the throne of Scotland, but while his troops impatiently expected the signal to engage, the earl ordered them to retire to their camp. James, Lord Hamilton of Cadzow, who was with Douglas, impatient at his not giving battle to the royal army, urged an immediate attack, when the earl haughtily replied, "If you are tired, you may depart when you please," and Hamilton immediately went over with all his vassals to the king. The other chiefs followed his example, and next morning, the proud and potent Douglas trembled when instead of forty thousand men that he had commanded the day before, he beheld only a silent and deserted camp! On this unexpected change he fled into Annandale, where he lurked till spring 1455. On the 1st of May in that year, his three brothers, the earls of Moray and Ormond, and Lord Balveny, were defeated at Arkinholme, by a body of the king's forces. Moray was slain, and Ormond being taken prisoner, was executed for treason, while Douglas himself was forfeited, and, with his brother Balveny forced to take refuge in England. Assisted by Percy, earl of Northumberland, he soon after made an attempt on the east borders, but was defeated in the Merse by the earl of Angus. For nearly thirty years after this period, he remained an exile in England. In his old age he longed once more to see his native country, and vowed that upon St. Magdalene's day 1484 he would deposit his offering upon the high altar at Lochmaben. With five hundred horse and some infantry, he and the banished duke of Albany entered Scotland, July 22, and advanced to Lochmaben. The neighbouring chieftains assembled with their followers to oppose his progress, and he was finally defeated at Barnswark in Dumfries-shire. The aged earl was taken prisoner by a son of Kirkpatrick of Closeburn, one of his own vassals. A grant of lands had been offered for his person. "Carry me to the king," said Douglas to his captor, "thou art well entitled to profit by my misfortune, for thou wast true to me whilst I was true to myself!" The young man wept, and offered to fly with the earl to England, but Doug las, weary of exile, refused his proffered liberty, and only requested that Kirkpatrick would not deliver him to the king till he had secured his own reward. When he was conveyed to the king, either from shame or scorn, he turned his back on the son of James the Second, the destroyer of his house. The king contented himself with confining him to monastic seclusion in the abbey of Lindores in Fife, while the earl muttered, "He who may no better be, must be a monk" In this retreat, after four years of penitence and peace, he died April 15, 1488.

The title of earl of Douglas, of this the first creation of the Douglas family, existed for ninety-eight years, giving an average of eleven years to each possessor During this time the house of Douglas rose to a degree of power scarcely inferior to that of royalty itself, and as an old historian remarks, it became a saying that "nae man was safe in the country, unless he were either a Douglas or a Douglas man" The earl, when he went from home, was accompanied with a train of two thousand men, he kept a sort of court, and even created knights. The greatness of the family, indeed, attained to such a pitch that it matched eleven times with the royal house of Scotland, and once, under the Angus branch, with that of England

After the forfeiture of the earls of Douglas in 1455, their estates reverted to the Crown, but were shortly afterwards bestowed on the 4th earl of Angus, head of a junior branch of the old family, descended from George Douglas, the only son of William, the first earl of Douglas, by his third wife, Margaret, countess of Angus.

The Angus branch assisted in the destruction of the parent house, and it became a saying, in allusion to the complexion of the two races, that "the red Douglas had put down the black"—the house of Liddesdale being characterised as the black Douglas and that of Angus as the red

George Douglas, the first earl of Angus, obtained a grant of that earldom in 1389, on his mother's resignation of it in parliament. He married in 1397 Mary Stewart, second daughter of King Robert the Third Taken prisoner with his cousin the earl of Douglas, at the battle of Homildon in 1402, he died the same year in England of the plague

His eldest son, William, the second earl, was one of the negotiators for the release of King James the First in 1423, which was accomplished in the succeeding year He was one of those arrested with Murdoch, duke of Albany, in March 1425, but soon obtained his release, and sat on the trial of that nobleman for treason, in the following May, when the latter was convicted and executed In 1430 he was sent ambassador to England In 1433 he was appointed warden of the middle marches. In September 1435 he defeated Sir Robert Ogle at Piperdean and died in 1437

His only son, James, third earl, died without issue by his wife, Johanna Stewart, third daughter of King James the First, and was succeeded by his uncle, George, second son of the first earl

George, fourth earl, was, in 1449 appointed warden of the middle marches, and, in 1451, was sent as ambassador to England. He had the chief command of the king's forces against his kinsman the earl of Douglas in 1454, and on the forfeiture of the latter he obtained a grant of the whole lands and lordship of Douglas. He was standing next to James the Second when he was killed at the siege of Roxburgh in August 1460, and was wounded by a splinter of the cannon In 1462 King Edward the Fourth advanced with a numerous army against Alnwick, when the earl of Angus, and Breze, high-steward of Normandy marched with a considerable force and gallantly relieved a French garrison which was then in the town. He died on 14th November of that year

His eldest son, Archibald, fifth earl, was born in 1453, and succeeded his father when he was only nine years of age He was usually called the great earl, and Archibald Bell the-Cat, from the following circumstance:—In July 1482, when James the Third was preparing to invade England with an army, a number of the Scots nobility met together in a secret council, in the church of Lauder, for the purpose of concerting measures for ridding the country of the favourites of the king. In the course of the conference Lord Gray took occasion to introduce the apologue of the mice consulting upon the means of deliverance from their tyrannical enemy the cat, and agreeing that a bell should be suspended from her neck to notify her approach, but the question was, what mouse had courage sufficient to fasten the bell? Angus immediately exclaimed, "I shall bell the cat," and accordingly Cochrane, the most obnoxious of the favourites, was seized by the earl on his entrance into the church, and he and the others were hanged over the bridge at Lauder In 1488 Angus joined in the combination against King James the Third which terminated in the murder of that monarch on his flight from the field of Sanchieburn He was in high favour with James the Fourth, who continued him in the wardenship of the eastern marches He was also sworn a privy councillor and in 1493, appointed lord high chancellor of Scotland, which office he resigned in 1498. He accompanied the latter monarch to the fatal field of Flodden, and endeavoured to dissuade him from hazarding a battle. James answered—"Angus, if you are afraid, you may go home" The earl, feeling the affront deeply, at once quitted the field, but enjoined his two eldest sons, George, Master of Angus, and Sir William Douglas of Glenbervie, with all his followers, to abide the event, and these knights, with two hundred gentlemen of their name, were among the slain, September 9, 1513 The earl retired to the priory of Whithorn, in Galloway where he died in 1514 By his first wife, Elizabeth only daughter of Robert Lord Boyd, high chamberlain of Scotland, he had three sons and three daughters, and by his second wife, Catherine, daughter of Sir William Stirling of Keir, he had one daughter and one son Gavin the third son, was the celebrated bishop of Dunkeld and poet, of whom a memoir is subsequently given, in larger type

Sir Archibald Douglas of Kilspindie, the fourth and youngest son, was a great favourite of James the Fifth when a child, and was called by him his "Gray-steel" He was appointed high treasurer of Scotland 29th October 1526, when his nephew the earl of Angus had obtained the supreme power in the government, but was, with the rest of the Douglases, attainted and forfeited in parliament, 5th September 1528, on which he retired to England. At length, weary of exile he ventured back to Scotland, and cast himself in the king's way, on his return from hunting in the park at Stirling On seeing him at a distance, James said to one of his courtiers, "yonder is my Gray-steel, Archibald of Kilspindie, if he be alive." The courtier answered that it could not be he as he durst not come into the king's presence. On the king's approach, he threw himself on his knees and implored forgiveness, promising from thenceforth to abstain from meddling in public affairs, and to lead a quiet and private life. The king passed on without vouchsafing a reply, and rode briskly up the hill towards the castle. Kilspindie kept pace with his horse, in the vain endeavour to catch a glance from the implacable monarch Exhausted with fatigue he sat down on a stone without the castle-gate, and asked for a drink of water, which from fear of the king's displeasure, was refused by the royal attendants. On being informed of this, James reproved them very sharply for their discourtesy, and said that if he had not sworn an oath that no Douglas should ever again serve him, he would have received him into his favour. He then sent word to Kilspindie to go to Leith, and wait his farther pleasure; consequently he commanded him to retire to France, where he died soon after. James' conduct on this occasion was blamed even by his stern and unrelenting uncle, Henry the Eighth, who, on being told of it, uttered the familiar saying that "a king's face should give grace." Kilspindie's forfeiture was rescinded 15th March 1512–3, when his son and heir, Archibald Douglas of Kilspindie, was restored to his estates, and was afterwards twice lord provost of Edinburgh.

George Master of Angus, who fell at Flodden, as above stated, by his wife, Elizabeth second daughter of John first lord Drummond had three sons and six daughters. His eldest son, Archibald, succeeded as sixth earl of Angus, of him and of Sir George, the second son, styled of Pittendreich, afterwards. William, the third son, was prior of Coldingham in 1510, abbot of Holyroodhouse in 1522, and died in 1528. Jean or Janet, the second daughter, was the unfortunate Lady Glammis, who was burnt at the stake on the Castlehill of Edinburgh 17th July 1537 on the charge of conspiring the death of the king by poison and also for having treasonably assisted her brothers, Archibald earl of Angus and Sir George Douglas of Pittendreich, after they had been declared traitors and rebels. A previous indictment against her, for poisoning her husband John, sixth Lord Glammis, and for which she was summoned to stand her trial at the justice-ayre of Forfar, 31st January 1532, appears, from want of evidence, to have fallen to the ground. Mr Pitcairn has entered fully into the charges against this ill-fated lady, and endeavours to show that she fell a victim to the implacable hatred of James the Fifth against the whole race of the Douglases. (See Pitcairn's Criminal Trials, vol. i. part i.) Mr Tytler on the contrary, thinks that there can be no doubt of her guilt (Hist. of Scotland, vol. v. p. 265 and Note ii. in Appendix to that volume.) She was long popularly believed to have been burnt for witchcraft.

Archibald, the sixth earl, succeeded his grandfather in 1514, and August 6th the same year, married Margaret of England, queen dowager of James the Fourth, within eleven months after the fatal field of Flodden. At this period he was described by Dacre, the English ambassador in Scotland, as "childish, young and attended by no wise councillors," but, Mr Tytler adds, his person and countenance were beautiful, his accomplishments showy and attractive, whilst his power, as the head of the house of Douglas, was equal, if not superior, to that of any baron in the kingdom. In 1515 in consequence of the firm and decided measures adopted by the regent duke of Albany to obtain possession of the royal children, and to suppress an internal rebellion threatened by the English faction, at the head of which were Angus, the queen-mother and Lord Home, he retired with the queen to England, where she bore a daughter, the Lady Margaret Douglas, the future mother of the unfortunate Lord Darnley. While in England, Angus, Home, and Arran, entered into a private bond by which they engaged for themselves, their vassals and supporters, to resist the regent and endeavour to obtain possession of their infant sovereign. From this league, however, Arran was the first to withdraw. Finding himself neglected by his brother-in-law, Henry the Eighth, Angus became reconciled to the regent, and leaving the queen dangerously ill at Morpeth, returned to Scotland in 1516. In the following June, on the departure of Albany for France, Angus was nominated one of the council of regency, and soon gained a powerful ascendency in the kingdom. On the queen's return to Scotland, she proposed, in the absence of the duke of Albany, that her husband, Angus, should be appointed regent, but without success. Enraged at the disappointment, the earl's violence and turbulence knew no bounds, and his inconstancy to the queen soon led that princess to express her determination to sue for a divorce. In 1520 the earl of Arran with many of the western nobility assembled at Edinburgh, resolved to apprehend Angus, and on the 20th April a bloody conflict, known in local annals by the name of "Cleanse the Causeway," took place on the High Street of that city between the rival factions, in which Angus slew Sir Patrick Hamilton, Arran's brother, with his own hand, and the party of Arran, after a fierce resistance, were entirely routed. In 1521, on the return of Albany, Angus fled to England, and was subsequently exiled to France. In 1524 he secretly removed to the English court, and soon after returned to Scotland, greatly improved in experience, talent, and political skill. He had entered into a secret treaty with Henry the Eighth to support the English interests, but failed to effect a reconciliation with his wife. Early in the morning of the 24th November of the same year, at the head of an armed force, he took possession of the capital, and being joined by the Chancellor Bethune, speedily acquired the chief direction of the government, with possession of the person of the young king, then in his fourteenth year. In March 1525 he was divorced from Queen Margaret. In 1526 he obtained a remission for himself and his friends for all crimes and treasons committed by them for the previous nineteen years. Having prevailed upon Bethune to resign the great seal, he was himself appointed lord chancellor. At this time all the offices of state were filled either by a Douglas or by a creature of that house, and Angus defeated two attempts which were made to rescue the king from the durance in which he was held by him, the one by Scott of Buccleuch near Melrose, and the other by the earl of Lennox at Linlithgow, in which the latter nobleman was killed. At length, in July 1528, King James escaped out of his hands, and in the disguise of a yeoman of the guard, rode during night from Falkland palace to Stirling. Angus and his brother and uncle were immediately declared rebels and traitors, and after being deprived of their offices, sentence of forfeiture was passed against them. Angus retired to the borders, and the king unsuccessfully attempted to reduce the earl's castle of Douglas. The royal forces were subsequently totally dispersed at Coldingham. James was also obliged to raise the siege of Tantallon, and on his retreat his train of artillery was attacked and captured, after an obstinate action, by Angus in person. It was on this occasion that the king declared with an oath, that while he lived no Douglas should find a resting place in Scotland. Angus subsequently took refuge in England, was admitted into the privy council of Henry the Eighth, and in 1532, received from that monarch a pension of one thousand merks. At this time he disgraced his name by making several hostile incursions across the Borders against his own countrymen. On the death of James, he returned to Scotland, and in 1543 his attainder was repealed. In June 1544 when a number of the nobility signed an agreement to support the queen mother as regent, he was appointed lieutenant-general of the kingdom. He behaved with great courage against the English at the battle of Ancrum Moor, in 1545, in which Sir Ralph Evers and Sir Bryan Latou, and several gentlemen of distinction, were slain on the English side. The earl had been greatly exasperated against the English, both on account of his lands having been ravaged by them, and also because they had defaced the tombs of his ancestors in Melrose abbey. Just as the battle was about to begin, a heron, disturbed by the troops, sprung from an adjacent marsh, and soared away over the heads of the combatants. "Oh," said Angus, "that I had here my white goss-hawk; we should then all yoke at once" The regent Arran complimented the earl for his distinguished conduct in this battle, and also his brother, Sir George Douglas, declaring in presence of the army that their actions had entirely removed all suspicions of their favouring the English interest. Henry the Eighth, enraged at this defeat, bitterly inveighed against Angus, accusing him of ingratitude, and vowed to be revenged When this was told to the earl, "What," said he "is our brother-in-law offended because, like a good Scotsman, I have avenged upon Ralph Evers the defaced tombs of my ancestors? they were better men than he, and I ought to have done no less, and will he take my life for that? Little knows King Henry the skirts of Kernetable, I can keep myself there against all his English host." At the battle of Pinkie, so disastrous to his countrymen, September 10, 1547, he commanded the van of the Scottish army He died at the castle of Tantallon in 1556 Previous to his marriage with the queen dowager, he had been married to Lady Margaret Hepburn, second daughter of the first earl of Bothwell, who died in childbed in 1513 He subsequently married in 1543, Margaret, daughter of the fifth Lord Maxwell, by whom he had a son, James, who predeceased him

Sir George Douglas of Pittendriech, younger brother of the preceding, was master of the royal household, and in September 1526, had the charge of the young king, when his brother hastened forward from Edinburgh, to encounter the force under the earl of Lennox at Linlithgow bridge, on that nobleman's unsuccessful attempt to rescue the monarch from the Douglases. James, who secretly favoured Lennox's enterprise, advanced slowly and unwillingly, when Douglas, incensed at the delay, seizing his horse's bridle, passionately exclaimed, "Think not that in any event you shall escape us, for even were our enemies to gain the day, rather than surrender your person, we should tear you in pieces,'—a threat which was never forgiven by the king He was forfeited, along with his brother and uncle, 5th September 1528, when he took refuge in England In 1542, he and the earl his brother, at the head of a large body of their retainers, joined an English force which made a hostile incursion across the borders into Scotland, but was defeated at Hadden-rig by the earl of Huntly and Lord Home. After the death of James the Fifth, the forfeiture of the Douglases was rescinded by parliament, 15th March 1542–3, and Sir George, on his return to Scotland, was appointed a member of the privy council of the regent Arran He had been intrusted by Henry the Eighth with the principal share in negotiating the proposed marriage of the young queen Mary with Henry's son, Prince Edward, and made several journeys into England on that account in 1543. His talents, says Tytler, for the management of political affairs were superior to those of his brother, the earl, over whose mind he possessed great influence, and in his correspondence with Henry he expresses himself with great warmth of devotion to the English monarch who, in his designs upon Scotland was very much guided by the information transmitted to him and his ministers by Sir George The treaties of peace and marriage were finally arranged at Greenwich on the 1st July 1543. In all the intrigues of the period he acted a prominent part, and when Angus and the other lords of the English faction, to escape the sentence of forfeiture to which their repeated treasons had exposed them transmitted to the governor Arran a bond of adherence to the government, Sir George was one of the pledges that it would be faithfully kept, but was soon liberated. He and his brother subsequently joined the party of Cardinal Bethune, and their names appear among those of the Scots nobility who signed the agreement in June 1544, to support the authority of the queen-mother as regent of Scotland against the earl of Arran. In a parliament held at Edinburgh in the beginning of December of the same year, he and the earl were absolved from the charge of treason, and declared innocent of the crimes which had been alleged against them In 1545 he joined the earl of Cassillis and other noblemen in the conspiracy (mentioned by Mr Tytler for the first time by any historian) which, on the suggestion of Henry the Eighth, they had entered into for the assassination of Cardinal Bethune, and had an interview with one Thomas Forster the English envoy, on the subject, but the project seems early to have been abandoned on their part. In August 1545 he was with the Scots army that invaded England, the vanguard of which was commanded by the earl of Angus, but retreated without effecting anything of consequence, "through the deceit," as an ancient Chronicle relates, "of George Douglas and the vanguard." In the memorable year 1546, after hearing George Wishart preach at Inveresk, he said publicly, "I know that my lord governor and my lord cardinal will hear that I have been at this sermon Say unto them, I will avow it, and not only maintain the doctrine that I have heard, but also the person that teacheth, to the uttermost of my power" After the assassination of Cardinal Bethune, he and his brother the earl of Angus were the first to vote that the castle of St. Andrews, in which those engaged in that act had taken refuge, should be besieged He is said by Douglas in his Peerage to have been killed at the battle of Pinkie, 10th September 1547, but there is no evidence for this statement, and Godscroft says expressly that having been one of those "appointed to rule about among the soldiers, to encourage them and keep order, it was so much the easier for him to flee" He appears as one of the extraordinary lords of session in the sitting of that court of the 1st April 1549 He died before his brother, though the date of his death is not mentioned by the family historian By his wife, Elizabeth, daughter and heiress of David Douglas of Pittendriech, he had David, seventh earl of Angus, James earl of Morton, regent of Scotland, of whom a memoir is given below in larger type, and two daughters.

David, seventh earl, was of an inactive and sickly constitution He succeeded his uncle in 1556 and died in 1558 He married Margaret, daughter of Sir John Hamilton of Clydesdale natural brother of the regent duke of Chatelherault, and had by her a son, Archibald, eighth earl, and two daughters.

Archibald, eighth earl, was only two years of age when he succeeded to the titles and estates of his family, and was brought up with his uncle, the earl of Morton, who was his tutor and guardian He carried the crown at the meeting of the first parliament of King James the Sixth, 15th December 1567 On account of his virtuous and amiable disposition he was styled the good earl Being one of the wardens of the marches, he executed that office for several years with great reputation After the execution of Morton, in 1581, he retired to England and was received with kindness by Queen Elizabeth While in London, he contracted a friendship with Sir Philip Sidney In 1582, after the raid of Ruthven, he obtained leave to return home, when he joined the faction of the noblemen concerned in that enterprize. In the following year, James, having emancipated himself from their power required them to surrender themselves by proclamation, but Angus was the only one who obeyed. In 1584, with the earl of Mar and Lord Glammis, he seized the castle of Stirling, and published a manifesto, declaring that they were in arms for the purpose of removing from the king's presence Captain James Stewart, created earl of Arran, the unworthy favourite of James, but on his majesty's advance against them with an army, they fled into England. In the parliament that met 22d August of the same year, Angus was attainted and his estates forfeited. In the following year, he returned to Scotland with the other banished lords, and expelled Arran from the court, obtaining a pardon for themselves and the revocation of their forfeiture. Towards the close of his life he was offered the office of chancellor of Scotland, but did not accept of it. He died in 1588. He was thrice married, and had a daughter, Lady Elizabeth Douglas, who died young

His heir-male, Sir William Douglas of Glenbervie, succeeded as ninth earl. He was the son of Sir Archibald Douglas of Glenbervie, grandson of the fifth earl The earldom was claimed by James the Sixth, who brought a suit against Sir William for reducing the charters connected with the title, but on 7th March 1588–9, a decision was given in favour of the latter The ninth earl died in July 1591, in the 59th year of his age By his wife, daughter of Sir Robert Graham of Morphie, he had six sons and four daughters. His second son, Sir Robert, was the first baronet of the Glenbervie family —See afterwards.

William, his eldest son, tenth earl, was well versed in the antiquities and history of his country, and wrote a chronicle of the Douglases. Becoming a Roman Catholic, he, in 1592, engaged with the earls of Errol and Huntly in the treasonable plot of obtaining the king of Spain's assistance for the re-establishment of popery in Scotland, and on the 1st of the following January he was seized and committed to the castle of Edinburgh On the 15th of February, however, he made his escape, and joined the other two earls in the north. On the 11th October, they came suddenly into the king's presence, and offered to submit themselves to trial. On the 26th November, it was determined that they and their associates should be exempted from all farther inquiry or prosecution on account of their correspondence with Spain, and that before the 1st of February 1594, they should either submit to the church, and renounce popery, or remove out of the kingdom. They refused to accede to these conditions, and continued their treasonable negotiations. After the battle of Glenlivet, 3d October of the same year, in which, however, he was not present, Angus retired to the continent, and spent the remainder of his life in acts of devotion He died at Paris 3d March 1611 in the 57th year of his age, and was buried in the church of St Germain de Prez, where a magnificent monument was erected to his memory, the inscription on which is printed at length in the Scots Magazine for 1767 By his countess, Elizabeth, eldest daughter of Lawrence, fourth Lord Oliphant, he had three sons and two daughters, James, the second son, was the first Lord Mordington, see that title.

His eldest son, William, eleventh earl of Angus and first marquis of Douglas, like his father, was a Roman Catholic, and a faithful adherent of the king during the civil wars. He maintained to its fullest extent the old princely hospitality and grandeur of the family at Douglas castle, where he chiefly resided. The king constituted him his lieutenant on the borders, and created him marquis of Douglas, 17th June 1633. He joined the marquis of Montrose after his victory at Kilsyth in August 1645, escaped from the rout at the battle of Philiphaugh, 13th September of that year, and soon after made terms with the ruling powers. He was fined one thousand pounds sterling by Cromwell's act of grace and pardon. He died 19th February 1660 He was twice married, first to the Hon. Margaret Hamilton, only daughter of Claud Lord Paisley, sister of James, first earl of Abercorn, and secondly to Lady Mary Gordon, third daughter of George first marquis of Huntly

Archibald, his eldest son, by his first marriage, styled earl of Angus, was appointed a privy councillor, and on 9th February 1639, was constituted an extraordinary lord of session He was a member of the committee of war in 1644, and subsequent years, and also of the committee of estates, and in 1650, obtained the command of a regiment of horse raised in the county of Haddington, for the defence of the country He officiated as lord high chamberlain at the coronation of King Charles the Second, on January 1st, 1651, and on 3d April following was created by that monarch earl of Ormond (see that title). He was fined one thousand pounds sterling by Cromwell's act of grace and pardon, 1654, and died at Edinburgh January 15th, 1655, before his father His eldest son succeeded as second marquis of Douglas.

William, his eldest son by his second marriage, became earl of Selkirk, and through his marriage with Anne duchess of Hamilton, third duke of Hamilton in 1660 See these titles.

George, his second son by the same marriage, was in 1675 created earl of Dumbarton. See DUMBARTON earl of James, second marquis of Douglas, born in 1646, succeeded his grandfather in 1660, and was a privy councillor to King Charles the Second and James the Second. He died 25th February 1700, in the 54th year of his age. His eldest son, James, earl of Angus, born in 1671, in 1689 raised for the service of the nation, in one day, a regiment of eighteen hundred men, now called the 26th foot or Cameronians, of which he was appointed colonel, 19th April of that year After much active service he fell at the battle of Steinkirk 3d August 1692, in the 21st year of his age, unmarried His half brother, William, also bore the title of earl of Angus, but died an infant in 1694. Archibald, the third son of the second marquis, succeeded as third marquis.

Archibald, third marquis of Douglas, born in 1694, succeeded in 1700, and in consideration of his illustrious descent, and the services of his ancestors, was created duke of Douglas while yet a minor, in 1703. In the rebellion of 1715, he adhered to the government, and fought as a volunteer at the battle of Sheriffmuir On the conclusion of the treaty of union between England and Scotland in 1707, his grace's tutors entered a protest on his behalf and that of his heirs and successors, to the effect that the said treaty should not in any way prejudice the rights and privileges belonging to them, as granted to their ancestors for their loyalty and great and faithful services, of leading the van of the army of Scotland in the day of battle, carrying the crown of that kingdom in processions, and giving the first vote in all parliaments, councils, and conventions, in Scotland, &c. It is in accordance with one of these rights that the duke of Hamilton, as chief of the house of Douglas, carries the crown of Scotland when necessary in all state processions in Scotland, and not because he is the next heir to the crown itself, after the present royal family, as is popularly but erroneously believed The duke of Douglas died, childless, at Queensberry house, Edinburgh, in 1761, when the ducal title became extinct.

The titles of marquis of Douglas, earl of Angus, and several others, devolved, through heirs-male, to the duke of Hamilton, on account of his descent from the first marquis of Douglas, and the eldest son of that ducal house is now styled marquis of Douglas and Clydesdale.

Lady Jane Douglas, the sister of the duke, secretly married, in 1748, when her ladyship was forty-eight years of age, Mr Stewart, afterwards Sir John Stewart, baronet, of Grandtully, in Perthshire. They resided abroad, chiefly in France, from 1746 till the end of December 1749 Of this marriage, it was asserted that twin sons were born in the house of a Madame le Brun, in Paris, 10 July 1748, when her ladyship was in her fifty-first year The youngest of these children Sholto Thomas Stewart, died in infancy The other, Archibald Stewart, on the death of the last duke of Douglas, without issue, was served nearest lawful heir to his grace, September 8, 1761, but the guardians of the duke of Hamilton, then a minor, who had succeeded as marquis of Douglas, disputed his return, on the ground of his birth being surreptitious. The Court of Session in Scotland decided in favour of the duke of Hamilton, but on appeal to the House of Lords, its decision was reversed 17 February 1769, and Mr Stewart, being thus declared entitled to the estates, assumed the name of Douglas, and in 1790 was raised to the peerage by the title of Lord Douglas of Douglas. He died 26th Dec. 1827 He was twice married By his first wife, he had 2 sons and 1 daughter and by his second wife 3 sons and 3 daughters. His eldest son, Archibald, 2d Lord Douglas, died, unmarried in January 1844, and was succeeded by his brother, Charles, 3d lord, who died Sept. 10, 1848 His half-brother, the Rev James Douglas, appointed in 1819 rector of Marsh Gibbon, Buckinghamshire, and in 1825, of Broughton, Northamptonshire, was the 4th and last Lord Douglas Born July 9, 1787, he married in 1813 the 2d daughter of the Hon General James Murray, and died, without issue, April 9, 1857, when the title became extinct. The estates devolved on his half sister, Jane Margaret, Lady Montague, widow of the 2d Lord Montague, and on her death in 1856 were inherited by her daughter the countess of Home

Douglas Castle, in the parish of Douglas, Lanarkshire, was the object of many a fierce conflict between the English and its proper lords. In 1760, it was accidentally destroyed by fire, but the last duke of Douglas ordered another to be built on a scale of magnificence corresponding to his high rank and extensive possessions. It was to consist of two spacious wings, but the duke's death soon after prevented more than one being finished The ruins of the old castle are very inconsiderable consisting of but one ruined tower, standing at a short distance from the modern mansion The preface to 'Castle Dangerous, the last novel written by Sir Walter Scott, contains an interesting passage relative to his visit to Castle Douglas, the last place to which he made a pilgrimage in Scotland, previous to his departure for the continent in his vain search of health

The Douglases of Drumlanrig, marquises and dukes of Queensberry are descended from William, son of James, second earl of Douglas. [See QUEENSBERRY, marquis of, and BUCCLEUCH duke of]

Other branches of the Douglas family enjoyed for a time the titles of earl of Athole, and earl of Buchan, also that of Forfar, the latter merged in the dukedom of Douglas, on the death of the second earl in 1715, and became extinct in 1761, and earl of Solway, merged in the dukedom of Queensberry in 1711, extinct in 1778 See these titles.

The Douglases of Glenbervie were descended from the Hon Sir William Douglas, second son of Archibald, fifth earl of Angus, commonly called "the great earl" He obtained from his father the lands of Braidwood in Lanarkshire, about the year 1510, and by his marriage with Elisabeth, daughter and heiress of Sir John Auchinleck of Auchinleck in Ayrshire, he acquired the lands and barony of Glenbervie in Kincardineshire His only son, Sir Archibald Douglas, was knighted by King James the Fifth.

The son of the latter, Sir William Douglas of Glenbervie, knight, (afterwards ninth earl of Angus, as above mentioned) was a steady friend of Queen Mary He accompanied her majesty in her expedition to the north against the earl of Huntly, and behaved with great bravery at the fight of Corrichie, in 1562 He was succeeded in the estate of Glenbervie by his second son the Hon Sir Robert Douglas, whose eldest son, Sir William, was by Charles the First created one of the original baronets of Nova Scotia, 30th May 1625, with a grant of sixteen hundred acres of land in that colony Sir Robert's only son, Sir William, second baronet, married Anne, daughter and heiress of James Douglas of Stonypath and Ardit in Fife with whom he got a great accession to his estate. He died in the reign of Charles the Second His only son, Sir Robert, third baronet, commanded the Scots royals at the battle of Steinkirk in 1692, where he fell, and having no male issue, the title devolved upon his cousin, Robert Douglas of Ardit (grandson of the Rev Dr George Douglas, rector of Stepney,) who was the second son of Sir Robert Douglas, brother of the tenth earl of Angus. Sir Robert died in 1750 His eldest son Sir William Douglas, fifth baronet, a lawyer of great eminence and learning, was in 1726, chosen provost of the city of St. Andrews, and was annually re-elected for nineteen years. He married Elizabeth, daughter of John Douglas of Garvald, and died without issue in July 1764, when the title devolved upon his brother, Sir Robert Douglas, editor of the Peerage of Scotland, of whom a notice is given at page 59

The baronetage of Glenbervie lapsed on the death of his only son Sir Alexander a physician of eminence Sir Robert's only daughter married Kenneth a younger son of Donald Mackenzie of Kilcoy, and their eldest son Kenneth Mackenzie, a general in the army, who assumed the name of Douglas, was created a baronet in 1831 He died 22d November 1843, and his eldest son, Sir Robert Andrews Douglas, 2d baronet, a major in the army was succeeded on his death 1st March 1843 by his eldest son Sir Robert Andrews Mackenzie Douglas of Glenbervie (born 19th July 1837)

The Douglases of Carr in Perthshire, are cadets of the Morton family, being lineally descended from James, sixth earl of Morton, of the Lochleven branch (See MORTON, earl of) To this family belonged Admiral Sir Charles Douglas, created a baronet 23d January 1777, of whom a memoir is given below His eldest son, Sir William Henry, vice admiral of the Blue, second baronet, died unmarried, 24th May 1809, when the title devolved upon his brother, Lieutenant-general Sir Howard Douglas, G C B, G C M G, K C S, and F R S, born 1 July 1776 married in July 1799 Anne, eldest daughter of James Dundas, a scion of the house of Dundas of Dundas, issue, six sons and four daughters. Sir Howard was groom of the bedchamber to the late duke of Gloucester, served in Portugal and Spain in 1808–9; was present at Corunna, and served at Walcheren, served again in Spain in 1811–12 and received the cross of Charles the Third He was governor of New Brunswick from 1823 to 1829, and lord high commissioner of the Ionian Islands from 1835 to 1840 From 1842 to 1847, he represented Liverpool in parliament became a general in the army and colonel in the 15th foot in 1851 He is the author of "An Essay on the principles and construction of military bridges," and of a treatise on naval gunnery

A baronetcy is also possessed by the family of Douglas of Springwoodpark, Roxburghshire, conferred, June 27, 1786, on Sir James Douglas, a naval officer of eminence, who was knighted, in consideration of bearing home the despatch announcing the surrender of Quebec in 1759, and was created a baronet for his subsequent professional achievements. In 1761 he commanded a fleet in the Leeward Islands, took Dominica, and had a broad pendant at the siege of Martinique in the same year On his death in 1787, he was succeeded by his eldest son Sir George, who died June 4th 1821. His son Sir John James, third baronet, married, in 1822, Hannah Charlotte, only daughter and heiress of Henry Scott, Esq of Belford, Roxburghshire, and assumed, in consequence, by sign manual, the surname and arms of Scott, in addition to those of Douglas. Sir John was Captain in the 15th hussars, and served at Waterloo, for which he received a medal He died 23d January 1836. His son, Sir George Henry Scott-Douglas, 4th baronet, born at Edinburgh 19th June 1825, captain 84th foot, 1850, retired 1851; married the eldest daughter of Francisco di Pina, Esq of Gibraltar, with issue

DOUGLAS, Sir James, a renowned warrior, the companion in arms of King Robert Bruce, was the eldest son of William Lord of Douglas, the companion of Wallace, who died a prisoner in England in 1312 The young Sir James had taken refuge in Paris, where he lived for three years, but on his father's death he returned to Scotland, and was appointed page in the household of Lamberton, bishop of St Andrews On the murder of Comyn and the raising of the standard of national independence, Douglas, who was then in his 18th year, resolved to join his fortunes to those of Bruce His great estates had been conferred by the English king on Lord Clifford, one of his barons, and he was determined to wrest them from him, if possible, by force of arms Accordingly seeking his patron, the Bishop, he informed him of his resolution to join Robert the Bruce The interview is thus described by Barbour —

"Father," said Douglas, addressing Lamberton, "thou hast seen how these English have spoiled me of my paternal property Thou hast heard, too, how the earl of Carrick has openly asserted his claim to the crown, whilst these strangers are leagued against him, and have determined to avenge the slaughter of Comyn, and disinherit him as they have done me Therefore, since these things are so, I have resolved with your good leave, to join my fortunes to Bruce, and share with him both weal and woe, nor do I despair, through his help, to gain my lands, in spite of Clifford and all his kin"

"Grateful should I be to God, my sweet son, that thou wert there!" replied the bishop, "yet were I now openly to give thee the means of joining him, it would work my ruin Go, then, secretly, and take from my stable my own horse Should the groom make any resistance, spare not a blow to quell it. This will exculpate me, and thou mayest then obey thy will"

Douglas faithfully followed these directions He went to the stable, and seized the bishop's horse, striking the groom, who attempted to stop him, with his dagger, and, mounting in haste, rode towards a place which he expected Bruce to pass on his way to Sconè to be crowned This was at a spot called Errickstane The royal retinue of knights and attendants soon approached, when the young Douglas threw himself from his horse, and kneeling proffered Bruce his homage and his services The king raising him up, and fondly embracing him, gladly received him into his service, and at once gave him a command in his small army, expressing his confidence that he would bear himself worthy of his brave ancestry

During the whole of the struggles of that eventful period, Douglas continued to be one of the most attached and courageous of Bruce's adherents, and from the battle of Methven to the 'crowning victory' of Bannockburn, he signalized himself by his enterprise, his valour, his chivalrous spirit, and his unswerving patriotism He reduced to Bruce's authority the forests of Selkirk and Jedburgh, after he had recovered his own castle of Douglas from the English On Palm Sunday, 19th March, 1307, he surprised the English garrison which had possession of it, and not being able at that time to keep it himself, after removing such things as were most easily carried away, gold, silver, and apparel, with ammunition and armour, whereof he had greatest need, he caused all the meal and meat, corn and other grain, which had been collected by the English, to be laid together in one heap, the heads of the barrels, hogsheads, and puncheons of ale and wine, to be struck out, and the liquor mixed with the stores, he then slew all his prisoners, and flung the dead bodies among the heap, which his men called, in derision of the English, "the Douglas Larder" He next ordered dead horses to be thrown into the well, to render it useless to the enemy, after which he set fire to the castle, and nothing was left standing but the scorched walls This stronghold being rebuilt by the English, it was twice thereafter retaken by the Douglas, who had made a vow that he would be revenged on any one who should dare to take possession of it, hence it was generally called, both by English and Scotch, the Perilous Castle of Douglas In March 1318 he took the castle of Roxburgh by stratagem, which, with his other exploits, increased the terror with which his name was regarded by the English, who styled him "the Black Douglas," while in Scottish history he is known by the name of "the good Sir James Douglas" At the battle of Bannockburn, 23d June, 1314, he commanded the centre division of the Scottish van Previous to the battle, perceiving Randolph hard pressed in endeavouring to intercept a body of English cavalry which were trying to get into Stirling, Douglas requested the king's permission to go to his succour, but was refused, on which he replied, 'My heart will not suffer me to stand by and see Randolph perish, and therefore, with your leave, I must go and aid him" The king unwillingly consented, and Douglas rode off to the assistance of his friend, but while approaching the place of combat, he perceived that the English were falling into disorder, whereupon he halted his men, saying, "Randolph has gained the day, let us not diminish his glory by sharing it" After the victory, Douglas, with sixty horsemen, pursued the English king on the spur as far as Dunbar, whence Edward escaped in a fishing skiff to England The same year Douglas entered England with Edward Bruce, and returned to Scotland, loaded with plunder Being appointed by Bruce warden of the middle marches, he distinguished himself in various encounters on the Borders, and in different inroads into England In 1312 he invaded the counties of Northumberland and Durham, and in 1327, with Randolph, led an army, consisting of twenty thousand light-armed cavalry, as far as Biland in Yorkshire, and for more than a month employed them in ravaging the whole northern districts of that kingdom While on this expedition he penetrated during the night into the midst of the English camp, forced his way to the pavilion of the king himself, and very nearly took him prisoner. Their retreat on this occasion, before a superior English force under the young king, Edward III, was conducted with consummate skill On the death of Robert the Bruce, Douglas, as his oldest and most esteemed companion in arms, was commissioned to carry his heart to the holy sepulchre at Jerusalem Accordingly, attended by a splendid retinue, he sailed from Scotland in June 1330 On reaching Sluys in Flanders, he learnt that Alphonso, the young king of Leon and Castile, was then engaged in a war with Osmyn the Moorish king of Granada, and with the intention of fighting against the infidels, he and the knights and esquires by whom he was accompanied joined Alphonso's army On the 25th August 1330, they came in sight of the enemy near Tebas, a castle on the frontiers of Andalusia, when the Moors were defeated with great slaughter, but Douglas giving way to his impetuous valour, pursued them too eagerly, and in attempting to rejoin the main force, he perceived Sir Walter St Clair of Roslin surrounded by a body of Moors who had suddenly rallied With the few followers he had with him he turned hastily to his rescue, but was soon nearly overpowered by the numbers who pressed upon him Taking from his neck the silver casquet which contained the embalmed heart of Bruce, he threw it before him among the thickest of the enemy, saying, "Now pass thou onward before us, gallant heart, as thou wert wont Douglas will follow thee, or die!" The brave and "Good Sir James Douglas," with the greater part of those who fought with him, were slain, and his body with the casquet containing the heart of Bruce, found upon the field, were conveyed together to Scotland The heart of Bruce was deposited at Melrose, although his body was interred in the royal tomb at Dunfermline and the remains of Sir James were buried in the sepulchre of his fathers at Douglas, where his son Archibald erected a monument to his memory

naries that marked the restoration of letters in Scotland at the commencement of the sixteenth century," was the third son of the fifth earl of Angus, (nicknamed Bell-the-Cat,) by Elizabeth Boyd, only daughter of Robert Lord Boyd, high chamberlain of Scotland He was born at Brechin in 1474 After completing his education at the university of Paris, he was in 1496 appointed rector of Hawick, and in 1509, on the recommendation of the king, nominated provost of the collegiate church of St Giles, in Edinburgh Before this period he had composed 'The Palace of Honour,' an apologue for the conduct of a king, in which, under the similitude of a vision, he depicts the vanity and inconstancy of all worldly glory He had also completed a translation of Ovid's 'Remedy of Love,' which is now lost Subsequently, at the request of Henry, first Lord Sinclair, he translated into the Scottish vernacular the Æneid of Virgil, with the Supplementary book of Maphæus Vigius, which he undertook about 1512, and is said to have finished in sixteen months To each book is prefixed an original poem, or "particular prologue" of his own, and the translation is executed with great spirit and unusual elegance for the period In 1513, three weeks after the fatal battle of Flodden, he was admitted a burgess of Edinburgh, of which city his father had been provost

In 1514, the queen-regent, who had married his nephew, the young earl of Angus, appointed Douglas abbot of Aberbrothwick and in a letter addressed to Pope Leo the Tenth, after extolling him as second to none in learning and virtue, earnestly requested that he might be confirmed in that abbacy, till his singular merit should be rewarded by some more ample endowment Soon after she conferred on him the archbishopric of St Andrews, when he took possession of the archiepiscopal palace, but John Hepburn, prior of St. Andrews, having prevailed on the canons to elect him to the see, laid siege to the fortress, and after some resistance, expelled Douglas's servants The earl of Angus, with a party of two hundred horse, made an unsuccessful attempt to regain the castle, and his uncle, who does not appear to have countenanced this proceeding, and indeed was always averse to violent measures, relinquished the archbishopric in favour of Andrew Forman, bishop of Moray, and archbishop of Bourges in France, a busy and ambitious churchman, who had obtained a bull from the Pope At the same time he was deprived of the abbacy of Aberbrothwick, which was transferred to James Bethune, archbishop of Glasgow Early in 1515, the queen nominated him bishop of Dunkeld, and by the interposition of her brother Henry the Eighth, obtained a papal bull in his favour, but the duke of Albany, who, in this year, was declared regent, to prevent him from possessing the see, accused him of contravening the laws of the realm in procuring bulls from Rome, and sentence of banishment was pronounced against him, which was subsequently altered to imprisonment He was first committed to the custody of his former rival Hepburn, and confined in the castle of St Andrews He was afterwards removed to the castle of Edinburgh, and subsequently to that of Dunbar, whence he was again conducted to Edinburgh On a reconciliation taking place between the queen and the duke, he obtained his liberty, after a confinement of upwards of a year, and was consecrated at Glasgow by Archbishop Bethune

During his imprisonment, Andrew Stewart, brother of the earl of Athol, had been elected postulate bishop by the chapter, and his retainers had taken possession of the episcopal palace On Douglas' arrival at Dunkeld, the pope's bull was proclaimed with the usual solemnities at the high altar, and the bishop was obliged to take up his residence at the house of the dean, where he was splendidly entertained, and where also, as the steeple of the cathedral was also garrisoned by Stewart's adherents, he was next day under the necessity of performing divine service and administering the customary oaths to his canons In the afternoon of the same day, while holding a consultation, the intelligence was received that Stewart had arrived in person to support his claim by arms, and at the same instant a volley of cannon shot was discharged from the palace and the cathedral Douglas' friends lost no time in assembling an armed force from the country, and on Stewart's retiring into the neighbouring woods, those who held possession of the palace and cathedral were summoned to surrender, on pain of excommunication On their refusal James Carmichael, with a detachment of the bishop's adherents, obtained admittance into the cathedral, partly by force and partly by stratagem, and the holders of the palace, intimidated by this occurrence, requested a truce for a few hours, and ultimately, through the interference of the regent, Douglas gained possession without the effusion of blood The regent Albany being appealed to by both parties at Edinburgh, gave his sanction to the claim of Douglas, while Stewart was allowed to retain the revenues of the see which he had already collected, and obtained, besides two of the best benefices, Alyth and Cargyle, in the diocese The following is a view of Dunkeld Cathedral

In 1517, Bishop Douglas, with Patrick Panter, attended the duke of Albany to France, for the renewal of the ancient league with that country, and the negociation being concluded, he returned before them to Scotland In the following year he appears to have visited England, as in the Cotton Library is an original letter signed by the earl of Angus and others, recommending him to King Henry as a proper agent for adjusting certain articles in contemplation between them In the dispute which took place between the earls of Arran and Angus in April 1520, which led to the bloody street conflict of "Cleanse the Causeway," he acted the part of a mediator, though unsuccessfully, with the Arran faction, and his conduct on that occasion has been already described in the article, Archbishop Bethune, who owed his life to his timely interference [See vol i pp 288, 289] In the following year, on the return of Albany to Scotland, and the prosecution of Angus and his principal adherents, Bishop Douglas took refuge in England, and from Henry the Eighth received a liberal pension At London he formed a friendship with Polydore Virgil, who was then engaged in composing a history of England, and he presented to him a brief commentary of the Scottish annals, in which he pursued the fabulous line of our ancestry from Athens to Scotland In his absence a process was instituted in Scotland against him, and an unjust sentence of proscription issued in the name of the king and the three estates He had been cited to appear at Rome, and intended to obey the pontifical mandate, but was seized with the plague, and dying at London in 1522, was interred in the Savoy church He excels as an allegorical and descriptive poet

His allegorical Poem, called King Hart, was published for the first time, from an original MS by Mr Pinkerton 1786

DOUGLAS, James fourth earl of Morton, for some time regent of Scotland, was the second son of Sir George Douglas of Pittendreich, younger brother of Archibald sixth earl of Angus Having married Lady Elizabeth Douglas, daughter of James, third earl of Morton who had no male issue, he obtained through her right, on her father's death, his title and estates, to which he succeeded in 1553, previous to which event he was styled the master of Morton He early favoured the cause of the Reformation, and was one of the original lords of the congregation in 1557, although at first he did not take a prominent part in their proceedings He was, however, one of the commissioners for the settlement of affairs at Upsettlington, May 31, 1559 After the return of Queen Mary in 1561, he was sworn a privy councillor, and January 7, 1563, was appointed lord high chancellor of Scotland, in room of the forfeited earl of Huntly, who had been the head of the popish party At the solicitation of Darnley, he was induced to join in the conspiracy against Rizzio, and in consequence of his share in that dark transaction, was obliged, with his associates, to fly to England Through the interest of the earl of Bothwell, however, he soon obtained his pardon, and returned to Scotland He was aware of the design formed for the murder of Darnley, but refused to be a party in the plot He was, however, one of those who subscribed the famous bond to protect Bothwell against the charge of being concerned in the murder, and to assist him in his project of being married to the queen When that event took place, Morton, with others of the nobles, entered into a confederacy for the protection of the infant prince and the protestant liberties of the kingdom, and was present with the confederated lords at Pinkie-Field, when Bothwell took his last farewell of the unfortunate queen He was the same year restored to the office of high chancellor for life, and was also constituted high admiral for Scotland, and sheriff of the county of Edinburgh in the room of Bothwell At the battle of Langside, Morton was one of the principal commanders He was a chief actor in all the transactions which took place in Scotland during that unhappy period, when a civil war raged between the protestant or king's party and the adherents of the queen

On the death of the earl of Mar, in October 1572, Morton was elected regent, being the fourth within five years. His rapacity and avarice soon rendered his administration odious, and his conduct towards some of the nobles caused them to league together for his destruction The young king, James the Sixth, at Stirling had procured an interview with Argyle and Atholl, two of Morton's enemies, and he determined to take the government into his own hands. Foreseeing the storm that was gathering, Morton, on September 12, 1577, tendered his resignation, and obtained a pardon for all his past offences He then retired to Lochleven, but even in this retreat, which the people called "the Lion's Den," his wealth and abilities rendered him formidable Having, by means of the earl of Mar, obtained possession of the castle and garrison of Stirling, and the person of the king, he soon recovered all the authority he possessed during his regency He now proceeded rigorously against his enemies, the Hamiltons and others, but in the midst of his measures of revenge and punishment, he was himself accused by Captain Stewart, a favourite of the king, (created earl of Arran) of being accessory to the murder of his majesty's father, and brought to trial at Edinburgh, June 1, 1581 The whole proceedings against him seem to have been violent, irregular, and oppressive The jury was composed of his avowed enemies, and he was found guilty of concealing, and of being art and part in the conspiracy against the life of Darnley The first part of the verdict did not surprise him, but he twice repeated the words "art and part," with some vehemence adding, "God knows it is not so!" He was beheaded next day by an instrument called "the Maiden," which he had himself introduced into Scotland In his 'Confession,' being the substance of a conference held the same morning with John Durie and Walter Balcanquhal, ministers, he admitted that on his return from England after the murder of Rizzio, Bothwell had informed him of the conspiracy against Darnley, which the queen, as he told him, knew of and approved, but that he had no hand in it And as to revealing the plot, "to whom," said he, "should I have revealed it? To the Queen? She was the doer of it I was mindit indeed to the king's father, but that I durst not for my life, for I knew him to be sic a barn, that there was nothing told him but he would reveal it to her again And howbeit they have condemned me of art and part, foreknowledge and concealing of the king's murder, yet, as I shall answer to God, I never had art or part, red or counsel, in that matter I foreknew, indeed, and concealed it, because I durst not reveal it to any creature for my life" When his keepers told him that the guards were in attendance and all in readiness, he replied, "I thank my God, I am ready likewise" On the scaffold his behaviour was calm, and his countenance and voice unaltered, and after some time spent in devotion, he suffered death with the intrepidity which became the name of Douglas His head was placed on the public jail of Edinburgh, and his body, after lying till sunset on the scaffold, covered with a beggarly cloak, was carried by common porters to the usual burying-place of criminals Having no issue, the regent made an entail of the earldom in favour of his nephew the eighth earl of Angus, and, after him, in case he died without issue, in favour of William Douglas of Lochleven, who became the seventh earl of Morton Subjoined is his portrait

DOUGLAS, Robert, an eminent Presbyterian clergyman of the seventeenth century, was in early life chaplain to the Scots Auxiliaries in the service of Gustavus Adolphus, in the Thirty Years War, and became a great favourite with that monarch He is said to have been a grandson of Mary, Queen of Scots, through a child borne by her to George Douglas of Lochleven, but of this there is no proof On leaving the army, Gustavus said of him that he scarce ever knew a person of his qualifications for wisdom "Mr Douglas," he said, "might have been counsellor to any prince in Europe, for prudence and knowledge, he might be moderator to a general assembly; and even for military skill I could very freely trust my army to his conduct" In corroboration of this, it is related that in one of Gustavus' battles, he was standing at some distance on a rising ground, and when both wings were engaged, he observed some mismanagement in the left wing that was like to prove fatal, and he either went or sent to acquaint the commanding officer, and it was remedied, in consequence of which they gained the battle While in the army, having no other book beside him, he committed nearly the whole of the Bible to memory In 1641 he was one of the ministers of Edinburgh, and frequently preached before parliament Wodrow styles him "a great state preacher, one of the greatest we ever had in Scotland" On January 6, 1649, he was one of the six ministers called in to assist the committee of despatch of parliament in drawing up instructions for their commissioners in London to endeavour to prevent the proceedings against the king [Balfour's Annals, vol iii p 385] He was moderator of the General Assembly which met in July 1649 and possessed great influence and authority among the clergy In August 1650 he was one of the commissioners sent by the church of Dunfermline to solicit from Charles the Second his subscription to a declaration of his sentiments, which he refused to give At the coronation of Charles at Scone January 1, 1651, Douglas officiated, and his sermon on the occasion was printed He was afterwards, with other members of the church commission, sent prisoner to London by Cromwell, but soon released In 1659, when General Monk left Scotland, he and the other leaders of the Resolutioners sent Mr James Sharp to London with him, to attend to the interests of the Presbyterian church The correspondence of the latter with Mr Douglas is inserted in Wodrow's 'History of the Sufferings of the Church of Scotland' While Sharp violated the trust reposed in him, and was appointed primate of Scotland, Douglas indignantly refused the high episcopal preferment that was offered to him, to accede to the introduction of prelacy. He is said, by Kirkton, the church historian, to have said to Sharp, on parting, "James, I see you will engage. I perceive you are clear You will be made archbishop of St Andrews. Take it, and the curse of God with it" So saying, he clapped him on the shoulder, and shut the door upon him He afterwards resigned his charge at Edinburgh, and in 1669 was admitted by the privy council, as an indulged minister, to the parish of Pencaitland in East Lothian The date of his death is unknown He had a son, Alexander, who was minister of Logie and one of the correspondents of Wodrow, to whose manuscript Analecta we are chiefly indebted for all that is known concerning his father

DOUGLAS, JAMES, M D, a skilful anatomist and accomplished medical writer, was born in Scotland about 1675 On completing his education, he proceeded to London, where he became eminent as a lecturer on anatomy and surgery After publishing various medical works, he directed his attention particularly to the difficult and painful operation of lithotomy, and brought out in 1726, 'A History of the lateral Operation for Stone,' republished with an Appendix in 1733 He was subsequently appointed physician to the king, who granted him a yearly pension of five hundred guineas His high reputation was considerably increased by his exposure of the deception of a female adventurer named Maria Tofts, who pretended that in occasional accouchements to which she was subject, she brought forth rabbits, and thus imposed on the credulity of many persons A full description of the fraud he published in an advertisement in Mainwaring's Journal As lecturer on anatomy, he took for his assistant the afterwards celebrated Dr William Hunter, who found in him both a patron and a benefactor He also studied successfully the interesting subject of botanical science, and published several works on the subject. He died in 1742 He had collected, at a great expense, all the editions of Horace published from 1476 to 1739

DOUGLAS, JOHN, D D, a learned prelate and critic, the son of Archibald Douglas, a respectable merchant, was born in Pittenweem, Fifeshire, July 14, 1721 His father was the son of the youngest brother of John Douglas, Esq of Tilwhilly in Kincardineshire After some preliminary education at the grammar school of Dunbar, he was in 1736 sent to St Mary's College, Oxford, being entered as a commoner In 1738 he was elected to an exhibition on Bishop Warner's foundation in Baliol College, and in 1741 he took his bachelor's degree After visiting France and Flanders, he returned to the university, and in 1743 he was ordained deacon In 1744 he was appointed chaplain to the third foot guards, and was for some time with the regiment in Flanders, and at the battle of Fontenoy was engaged carrying orders from General Campbell to a detachment of English troops In September 1745, he returned to England, with that portion of the army which was ordered home on the breaking out of the rebellion, and having no longer any connexion with the guards, he returned to college, where he was elected one of the exhibitioners on Mr Snell's foundation. In 1747 he became curate of Tilehurst, near Reading, and afterwards of Dunstew, in Oxfordshire Soon after he was selected by the earl of Bath to accompany his son, Lord Pulteney, as travelling tutor to the Continent. On his return to England in 1749, the earl presented him to the free chapel of Eaton-Constantine, and the donative of Uppington, in Shropshire. In 1750 he preferred him to the vicarage of High Ercal, in Shropshire, and continued a steady patron and friend to him throughout life He only resided occasionally on his livings, at the desire of Lord Bath, he took a house contiguous to Bath house in London, where he passed the winter months In the summer he generally accompanied his lordship in his country excursions, and in his visits to the nobility In the Easter term of 1758 he took his doctor's degree, and was presented by Lord Bath to the living of Kenley in Shropshire He had ere this devoted himself to writing various political and controversial pamphlets In 1761 he was appointed one of his majesty's chaplains, and in 1762 was made canon of Windsor, which benefice he exchanged with Dr Barrington, in 1776, for a residentiary canonry of St Paul's In 1764 Lord Bath died, and left him his library, but his lordship's relative, General Pulteney, not wishing it to be removed from the family, gave him a thousand pounds for it On the general's death, it was again bequeathed to him, and he again relinquished it to Sir William Pulteney for the same sum Besides superintending the publication of Lord Clarendon's Letters and Diary, and assisting Lord Hardwicke and Sir John Dalrymple in arranging their manuscripts for the press, at the request of Lord Sandwich, first lord of the admiralty, he prepared for publication the journal of Captain Cook's voyages In 1778 he was elected a fellow of the Royal and Antiquarian Societies In September 1787 he was made bishop of Carlisle, and in 1788 dean of Windsor In 1792 he was translated to the see of Salisbury He was a member of the Literary Club founded by Dr Johnson, and is frequently mentioned in Boswell's Life of the latter His death took place on 18th May 1807 His literary labours may be summed up in the following list of the publications in which he was engaged

Being printed on a sheet of paper, it was pasted on the walls in every part of London, and distributed among the members as they entered the house.

In 1763, he superintended the publication of Henry earl of Clarendon's Diary and Letters, and wrote the Preface prefixed to these papers.

During 1766, 1767, and 1768, he wrote several political papers printed in the Public Advertiser, and all the Letters which appeared in that Paper in 1770 and 1771, under the signatures of Tacitus and Manlius, were written by him

In 1776 and 1777 he was employed in preparing Captain Cook's Journal for publication In 1781, he prepared for publication the Journal of Cook's third and last voyage, and supplied the Introduction and Notes.

In 1777, he assisted Lord Hardwicke in arranging and publishing his Miscellaneous Papers, which came out in the following year

DOUGLAS, Sir Charles, Bart, a distinguished naval officer, a native of Scotland, and a descendant of the sixth earl of Morton, was originally in the Dutch service, and it was with difficulty that he was enabled to obtain rank in the British navy In the Seven Years' War, which commenced in 1756, he was gradually promoted till he became post-captain In 1763 he went to St. Petersburgh In 1775, on the war with America breaking out, he had a broad pendant given him, and commanded the squadron employed in the Gulf of St. Lawrence His services on this station obtained for him the most flattering honours on his return to England, and he was created a baronet, 23d January 1777, for having, at the head of his squadron, the previous year, forced a passage up the river St. Lawrence, and relieved Quebec, then closely invested by the Americans. Soon after he obtained the command of the Duke, of 98 guns Sir Charles cultivated on shipboard a natural genius for mechanics, for which he was remarkable, and at his suggestion, the substitution of locks for matches in naval gunnery was universally adopted throughout the British navy He was appointed, November 24, 1781, captain of the fleet to Sir George Rodney, then about to proceed on his second expedition to the West Indies Sir George's flag being hoisted in the Formidable, Sir Charles assumed the command of that vessel, and, sailing from Torbay, January 15, 1782, they engaged and signally defeated the French fleet on the ensuing 12th of April, the Formidable, followed by the Namur, the Canada, and the rest of the ships astern, having broken through the enemy's line. The merit of this skilful manœuvre, which till then was unknown in naval warfare, has been claimed for his father, since his death, by Sir Howard Douglas, son of Sir Charles, but Mr Clerk of Eldin seems to have originally suggested the idea. Sir Charles was afterwards intrusted with the command of the Nova Scotia station, which he soon resigned During the preparations for war in 1787, he was promoted to the rank of rear-admiral, and in 1788 was re-appointed to the Nova Scotia station He died suddenly at Edinburgh of apoplexy 10th March 1789 He was so perfect a linguist that he could speak six European languages correctly He married, first, a Dutch lady of rank, who died in 1769, and secondly, Sarah, daughter of John Wood, Esq, and had three sons and two daughters

DOUGLAS, Sylvester, Lord Glenbervie, eldest son of John Douglas of Fechil in Aberdeenshire, descended from Sir Archibald Douglas of Glenbervie, grandson of the fifth earl of Angus, was born May 24, 1743 He was educated for the medical profession, which he forsook for the law, and attained to great eminence at the English bar In September 1789 he married the eldest daughter of Lord North, the prime minister, afterwards earl of Guildford. His first political situation was that of secretary to the lord lieutenant of Ireland, and in 1793 he was elected M.P. for St. Canice in that kingdom In 1795 he was chosen M.P in the parliament of Great Britain for Fowey in Cornwall, and the same year constituted one of the commissioners for the affairs of India, an office which he held till 1806 In 1796 he was chosen for Midhurst In 1797 he became one of the lords of the treasury, and in November 1800 was appointed governor of the Cape of Good Hope. On 29th December of that year he was created a peer of Ireland, under the title of Lord Glenbervie of Kincardine, and did not go out to the Cape, having relinquished the governorship in February 1801, when he was nominated joint paymaster-general of the forces in the room of Mr Canning In 1803 he was appointed surveyor-general of the woods and forests, which office he resigned in 1806, but resumed it in 1807 He died May 2, 1823 At his death, (his son, the Hon Frederick Sylvester North Douglas, having died before him,) the title became extinct His works are

DOUGLAS, Sir Robert, Bart of Glenbervie, succeeded his brother, Sir William Douglas, in 1764 (see page 49) He was the author of 'The Peerage of Scotland,' historical and genealogical, illustrated with plates Edinburgh, 1764, folio The second edition, revised and corrected, and with a Continuation by the late John Philip Wood, Esq , appeared in 1814, in 2 vols folio Sir Robert also compiled the Baronetage of Scotland, containing an Historical and Genealogical Account of the Gentry of that Kingdom, published at Edinburgh in 1798 He was thrice married, but had issue only by his second wife, Margaret, eldest daughter of Sir James MacDonald of MacDonald, baronet, viz , Alexander, a physician of eminence, who succeeded him, and Janet, married to Kenneth, a younger son of Donald MacKenzie, Esq of Kilcoy.

DOUGLAS, William, an eminent miniature painter, a lineal descendant of the Glenbervie family, was born in Fifeshire, April 14, 1780 He received a useful education, and was well acquainted with both the dead and living languages. From his infancy he displayed a taste for the fine arts While yet a mere child, he would leave his play-fellows to their sports, to watch the effects of light and shade, and, creeping along the furrows of the fields, study the perspective of the ridges This enabled him to excel as a landscape painter, and gave great beauty to his miniatures He and Mr John Burnet, the celebrated engraver, were fellow-apprentices to the late Mr Robert Scott of Edinburgh Having adopted the profession of a miniature painter, he was liberally patronized by many of the nobility and gentry both of Scotland and England, and his works will be found in some of the finest collections in this country He was, in particular, employed by the Buccleuch family, and July 9, 1817, was appointed miniature painter for Scotland to the late lamented Princess Charlotte and Prince Leopold, afterwards king of the Belgians He possessed genius, fancy, taste, delicacy, and that rarer gift, combination, in a very high degree, and his enthusiasm for his art could only be surpassed by his excellence His private virtues and social worth were acknowledged by all who had the privilege of his acquaintance In his domestic relations, he was an affectionate husband, a good father, and a warm-hearted and faithful friend His constant engagements prevented him from contributing to the Edinburgh exhibitions, but his works frequently graced the walls of the Royal Academy at Somerset House Mr Combe, the phrenologist, had a cast taken from his head while in life, and mentions, in one of his works, that the organs of his cranium were well developed for his profession In a note attached to Mr David Mallock's poem on 'The Immortality of the Soul,' that gentleman thus speaks of him —"The author would take this opportunity of stating, that if he has been at all successful in depicting any of the bolder features of nature, this he in a great measure owes to the conversation of his respected friend, William Douglas, Esq, Edinburgh, who was no less a true poet than an eminent artist" Mr Douglas died at his house, Hart Street, Edinburgh, January 30, 1832 He left a widow, a son, and two daughters

DOUGLAS, DAVID, an eminent botanist and enterprising traveller, whose name is associated with all the rare and beautiful plants introduced in his time from North West America, was born at Scone, near Perth, in 1799 While yet a boy, he was employed in the gardens of the earl of Mansfield, at that time under the superintendence of Mr Beattie, to whom he was bound apprentice for seven years About 1817 he removed to Valleyfield, the seat of Sir Robert Preston, Bart, and about 1819 obtained admission to the Botanic Garden at Glasgow, where his fondness for plants attracted the notice of Dr, afterwards Sir W J Hooker, professor of botany, whom he accompanied in his excursions through the western Highlands, and assisted in collecting materials for the 'Flora Scotica,' with which that gentleman was then engaged Dr Hooker recommended him to the Horticultural Society of London as a botanical collector, and in 1823 he was despatched to the United States, where he procured many fine plants and greatly increased the Society's collection of fruit trees He returned in the autumn of the same year, and in July 1824 he was sent to explore the botanical riches of the country adjoining the Columbia river, and southwards towards California On his arrival there in the succeeding April, he at once commenced his researches, and, from time to time, transmitted home vast collections of seeds, along with dried specimens, beautifully preserved, which became part of the Herbarium in the garden of the society at Chiswick. Of the genus Pinus he discovered several species, some of which attained to an enormous size, and to him botanists are indebted for the elegant Clarkia, the different species of Pentstemons, Lupines, Œnotheras, Ribeses, and a host of other ornamental plants

He returned to England in September 1827, and was shortly afterwards elected a fellow of the Linnæan, Geological, and Zoological Societies, to each of which he contributed several papers, since published in their 'Transactions.' About the beginning of October 1829, Mr. Douglas again sailed for the Columbia river, where he arrived June 3, 1830 After re-visiting North California, he made an excursion to the Sandwich islands. He died July 12, 1834, at the age of thirty-six, in the island of Hawaii, on the road to Hido, having fallen into a pit made by the natives for catching wild bulls, and, one of the latter being in it at the time, it is supposed that his death was caused by wounds inflicted on him by the captured bullock.

DRUMMOND, a surname derived originally from the parish of Drymen, in what is now the western district of Stirlingshire. The Gaelic name is Druiman, signifying a ridge, or high ground. One of the Scottish clans, which, like the Gordons, resided on the borders of the Highlands rather than in the Highlands themselves, possessed this surname, and their particular clan badge, anciently worn as the distinguishing mark of the chief, was the holly

The origin of the Drummonds is traditionally traced to a nobleman of Hungary, named Maurice, who is said to have accompanied Edgar Atheling and his two sisters to Scotland, in 1068, when they fled to avoid the hostility of William the Conqueror The vessel which contained the royal fugitives was piloted by this Maurice, but was cast, by stress of weather, on the coast of Fife They were received with royal munificence by Malcolm Canmore, who married Margaret the elder of the two princesses, and conferred on the Hungarian Maurice large possessions, particularly Drymen or Drummond in Stirlingshire, from whence his descendants took their surname This Maurice was the progenitor of the earls of Perth [See PERTH, earl of] He was by Malcolm Canmore appointed seneschal or steward of Lennox.

An ancestor of the noble family of Perth thus fancifully interprets the origin of the name Drum in Gaelic signifies a height, and onde a wave, the name being given to Maurice the Hungarian to express how gallantly he had conducted through the swelling waves the ship in which prince Edgar and his two sisters had embarked for Hungary, when they were driven out of their course, on the Scottish coast There are other conjectural derivations of the name, but the territorial definition above-mentioned appears to be the correct one.

The chief of the family at the epoch of their first appearing in written records was Malcolm Beg, (or the little) chamberlain on the estate of Levenax, and the fifth from the Hungarian Maurice, who married Ada, daughter of Malduin, third earl of Levenax. by Beatrix, daughter of Walter lord high steward of Scotland, and died before 1260

Two of his grandsons are recorded as having sworn fealty to Edward the First.

The name of one of them, Gilbert de Dromund, "del County de Dunbretan," appears in Prynne's copy of the Ragman Roll He was Drummond of Balquapple in Perthshire and had a son Malcolm de Drummond, who also swore fealty to Edward in 1296, and was father of Bryce Drummond killed in 1330 by the Monteiths.

The other, the elder brother of Gilbert, named Sir John de

Drummond, took the oath to Edward, by an obvious compulsion, as he was the same year carried prisoner to England, and confined in the castle of Wisbeach, but was released in 1297, on condition of serving Edward against the French He married his relation, a daughter of Walter Stewart, earl of Menteith, and countess in her own right.

His eldest son, Sir Malcolm de Drummond, attached himself firmly to the cause of Bruce, and about the time of his father's death, he was taken prisoner by Sir John Segrave, an English knight, "on hearing which "good news" Edward, on 25th August 1301, offered oblations at the shrine of St. Mungo, in the cathedral church of Glasgow King Robert, after the battle of Bannockburn, bestowed upon him certain lands in Perthshire. Sir Robert Douglas thinks that the caltrops (or three-spiked pieces of iron, with the motto, "Gang warily") in the armorial bearings of the Drummonds, afford a presumption that Sir Malcolm had been active in the use of these formidable, and on that occasion very destructive weapons. In the parliament held by Bruce in 1315 at Ayr, he sat as one of the great barons of the kingdom He married a daughter of Sir Patrick Graham of Kincardine, elder brother of Sir John Graham, and ancestor of the family of Montrose. He had a son, Sir Malcolm Drummond, who died about 1346. The latter had three sons, John, Maurice, and Walter The two former married heiresses.

Maurice's lady was sole heiress of Concraig and of the stewardship of Strathearn, to both of which he succeeded.

The wife of John, the eldest son, was Mary, eldest daughter and co-heiress of Sir William de Montefex, with whom he got the lands of Auchterarder, Kincardine in Monteith, Cargill, and Stobhall in Perthshire He had four sons, Sir Malcolm and Sir John, who both succeeded to the possessions of the family, William, who married Elizabeth one of the daughters and co-heiresses of Airth of Airth, with whom he got the lands of Carnock, and from him the Drummonds of Carnock, Meidhope, Hawthornden, and other families of the name are descended, and Dougal, bishop of Dunblane about 1398, and three daughters, namely,

Anabella, married, in 1357, John, earl of Carrick, high steward of Scotland, afterwards King Robert the Third, and thus became queen of Scotland, and the mother of David, duke of Rothesay, starved to death in the palace of Falkland, in 1402, and of James the First, as well as of three daughters, Margaret, married to Sir Colin Campbell of Lochow, Jean, to Stewart of Donally, and Mary, to Macdonald of the Isles.

A portrait of Queen Annabella is given in the second volume of Pinkerton's Scottish Gallery, taken from a drawing in colours by Johnson, after Jamieson, in the collection at Taymouth Pinkerton thinks it probable that Jamieson had some archetype from her tomb at Dunfermline, or some old limning. A woodcut of it is given on next column

From the weakness and lameness of her husband, Queen Annabella had considerable influence, and supported the whole dignity of the court. Her letters to Richard the Second of England have been printed in the Appendix to volume I. of the History of Scotland, under the Stuarts. London, 1797, 4to. Fordun states that Annabella, and Traill, bishop of St. Andrews, managed with eminent prudence the affairs of the kingdom, appeasing discords among the nobles, and receiving foreigners with hospitality and munificence, so that on their death it was a common saying that the glory of Scotland was departed. They both died in 1401

In May 1360, in consequence of a feud which had long subsisted between the Drummonds and the Menteiths of Rusky, a compact was entered into at a meeting on the banks of the Forth, in presence of the two justiciaries of Scotland, and others to whom the matter had been referred by command of David the Second, by which Sir John Drummond resigned certain lands in the Lennox, and shortly after, the residence of the family seems to have been transferred from Drymen in Stirlingshire, where they had chiefly lived for about two hundred years, to Stobhall, in Perthshire, which had some years before come into their possession by marriage.

Sir Malcolm Drummond, the eldest son, had four hundred francs for his share of the forty thousand sent from France, to be distributed among the principal men in Scotland in 1385, being designed in the acquittance "Matorme de Dromod" He was at the battle of Otterbourne in 1388, when his brother-in-law, James, second earl of Douglas and Mar, was killed, on which event he succeeded to the earldom of Mar in right of his wife, Lady Isabel Douglas, only daughter of William, first earl of Douglas Wyntoun calls him—

> "Schyre Malcolm of Drummond, lord of Mar,
> A manfull knycht, baith wise and war"

That is, wary From King Robert the Third he received a charter, in which the king styles him his "beloved brother," of a pension of £20 furth of Inverness, in satisfaction of the third part of the ransom (which exceeded six hundred pounds) of Sir Randolph Percy, brother of Hotspur who appears to have been made prisoner by his assistance at the above-named battle. His death was a violent one, having been seized by a band of ruffians and imprisoned till he died "of his hard captivity" This happened before 27th May, 1403, as on that date his countess granted a charter in her widowhood Subsequent transactions may help to explain the causes of his fate, as well as create suspicion as to the actual perpetrators. Not long after his death, Alexander Stewart, a natural son of "the Wolf of Badenoch," a bandit and robber by profession, having cast his eyes on the lands of the earldom, stormed the countess' castle of Kildrummie, and either by violence or persuasion obtained her in marriage. Fearing, however, that for this bold act he might be called in question, he, on 19th September 1404, presented himself at the castle gate, and surrendered the castle and all within it to the countess, delivering at the same time the keys into her hands, whereupon she, of her own free will, openly and publicly chose him for her husband, when he assumed the title of earl of Mar, and took possession accordingly [See MAR, earl of.]

As Sir Malcolm Drummond had died without issue, his brother John, succeeded him. He held the office of justiciary of Scotland, and had a safe-conduct into England to meet his nephew King James the First at Durham, 18th December 1423. He died in 1428. By his wife, Elizabeth Sinclair, daughter of Henry, earl of Orkney, he had several sons, the youngest of whom, John, left Scotland about 1418, and settling in the island of Madeira, prospered there. He was known by the name of John Escorto, supposed to be a corruption of Escocio, the Portuguese word for a Scotsman. Several letters that afterwards passed betwixt his descendants and the Drummond family in Scotland are inserted in Viscount Strathallan's Genealogy of the House of Drummond, 1681 One of these descendants, Manual Alphonso Ferriara Drummond, during the minority of James the Fifth, sent from Portugal a message by a gentleman named Thomas Drummond, then on his travels, requesting an account of the family from which he was descended, "with a testificate of their gentility and the coat of arms pertaining to the name." and stating that the number of descendants of John Escorto in the Portuguese dominions was no less than two hundred In reply to this request, David Lord Drummond, who was then a minor, obtained from the council of Scotland "a noble testimony under the great seal of the kingdome, wherein the descent of the Drummonds from that first Hungarian admiral to Queen Margaret is largely attested,"—the attesters being, with the Archbishop of St. Andrews and the bishops of Aberdeen and Dunblane, a number of the principal peers, knights, and barons of Scotland A short time after, namely, in 1558, the same David Lord Drummond signed a bond, wherein he acknowledged relationship with the Campbells, who consider the Drummonds merely a branch or offshoot from their tribe, being descended, they say, from one Duncan Drummach, a brother of Ewen Campbell, first knight of Lochawe. The connexion could only have been by marriage, and does not seem to have been otherwise recognised by the head of the Campbell clan, as the earl of Argyle of the time was among the attesters of the above "noble testimony"

John's eldest son, Sir Walter Drummond, was knighted by King James the Second, and died in 1455. He had three sons Sir Malcolm, his successor, John, dean of Dunblane, and Walter of Ledcrieff, ancestor of the Drummonds of Blair-Drummond, (now the Home Drummonds, Henry Home, the celebrated Lord Kames, having married Agatha, daughter of James Drummond of Blair-Drummond, and successor in the estate to her nephew in 1766); of Gairdrum, of Newton, and other families of the name. We have already (at vol. i. p. 321, art. BLAIR) referred to a feud between the Drummonds and the Blairs, which led to George Drummond, (who had purchased the estate of Blair), with his son, William, being set upon by more than twenty persons, and slain in cold blood, as they were leaving the kirk of Blair in Perthshire, on Sunday, 3d June 1554. In this outrage no less than eight persons of the name of Blair, including the laird of Arbblair, were engaged. One son, George Drummond, luckily survived to continue the family of Blair-Drummond.

The eldest son of the main trunk, that is, the Cargill and Stobhall family, Sir Malcolm by name, had great possessions in the counties of Dumbarton, Perth, and Stirling, and died in 1470. By his wife Marion, daughter of Murray of Tullibardine, he had six sons. His eldest son, Sir John, was first Lord Drummond; Walter, the second son, designed of Deanston, after being rector of St. Andrews, became chancellor of Dunkeld, and afterwards dean of Dunblane, and at last was appointed by James the Fourth clerk register of Scotland James, the third son, and Thomas, the fourth, were the ancestors of several of the landed families of Scotland of the name of Drummond.

Sir John, the eldest son, was a personage of considerable importance in the reigns of James the Third and Fourth, having been concerned in most of the public transactions of that period. He sat in parliament 6th May 1471, under the designation of dominus de Stobhall In 1488, he was one of the ambassadors to treat with the English, to whom a safe conduct was granted 29th November of that year, again on 6th August following, to treat of the marriage of James, prince of Scotland, and Anne de la Pole, niece of Richard the Third He was a commissioner for settling border differences, nominated by the treaty of Nottingham, 22d September 1484, and on the 29th of the subsequent November, he had another safe-conduct into England, subsequently he had three others. He was created a peer by the title of Lord Drummond, 29th January 1487–8. Soon after he joined the party against King James the Third, and sat in the first parliament of King James the Fourth, 6th October 1488. In the following year he suppressed the insurrection of the earl of Lennox, whom he surprised and defeated at Tillymoss. He was a privy-councillor to James the Fourth, justiciary of Scotland, and constable of the castle of Stirling Although he wrote a paper of 'Counsel and Advice,' for the benefit of those who should come after him, in which occurs one wise maxim, namely, "In all our doings discretion is to be observed, otherwise nothing can be done aright," yet, upon one memorable occasion he seems to have forgot this prudent rule, as well as the family motto "gang warily," as on 16th July 1515, he was committed a close prisoner to Blackness castle, by order of the regent duke of Albany, for having struck the lion herald on the breast, when he brought a message to the queen-dowager from the lords of Albany's party The queen, on his behalf, stated that the herald had behaved with insolence, and he was released from prison, 22d November 1516. He died in 1519 His name frequently occurs in the great seal register

By his wife, Lady Elizabeth Lindsay, daughter of David, duke of Montrose, the first Lord Drummond, had three sons, and six daughters, the eldest of whom, Margaret, was mistress to James the Fourth Malcolm, the eldest son, predeceased his father William, the second son, styled master of Drummond, suffered on the scaffold. In the year 1490, having been informed that a party of the Murrays, with whom the Drummonds were at feud, were levying teinds (for George Murray, abbot of Inchaffray) on his lands in the parish of Monyvaird, along with Duncan Campbell of Dunstaffnage, and a large body of followers, he hastened to oppose them. The Murrays took refuge in the church of Monyvaird, and the master and his party were retreating, when a shot from the church killed one of the Dunstaffnage men, on which the Highlanders returned and set fire to the building. Being roofed with heather, it was soon consumed, and according to the complaint of the abbot, nineteen of the Murrays were burnt to death. James the Fourth punished the ringleaders with death. The master of Drummond being apprehended and sent prisoner to Stirling, was tried, convicted, and speedily executed. His mother vainly begged his life on her knees, and his sister, Margaret, the mistress of the king, also in vain pleaded in his behalf. Those were ruthless times. From 1488 to 1502, the royal treasurer's books contain entries of gifts of jewellery, dresses, and money to "Mistress Margret Drummond," who seems to have lived openly with the king, and he was so much attached to her that he would not marry while she lived. She was poisoned in 1502, along with her two youngest sisters, Euphemia Lady Fleming, and Sybilla, who accidentally joined her at her last fatal repast. One of the last entries regarding her in the treasurer's books records a payment to the priests of Edinburgh for a "Sanle-mess for Mergratt, £5." They were buried in a vault, covered with three fair blue marble stones in the middle of the choir of the cathedral of Dunblane, and James soon after married the princess Margaret of England. Sir John, the third son of the first Lord Drummond, got from his father the lands of Innerpeffry, and had two sons, John Drummond of Innerpeffry, and Henry, ancestor of the Drummonds of Riccartoun. John, the eldest son, married his cousin, Margaret Stewart, natural daughter of King James the Fourth, widow of John Lord Gordon, eldest son of the third earl of Huntly. This lady was legitimated by letters patent under the great seal, 1st February 1558-9.

William, the unfortunate master of Drummond, had two sons, Walter, and Andrew, ancestor of the Drummonds of Bellyclone. Walter died in 1518, before his grandfather. By Lady Elizabeth Graham, daughter of the first earl of Montrose, he had a son, David, second Lord Drummond, who was served heir to his great-grandfather, John, first lord, 17th February 1520. His name frequently occurs in the great seal register between the years 1537 and 1571. He joined the association in behalf of Queen Mary at Hamilton 8th May 1568, and died in 1571. On coming of age he had married Margaret Stewart, daughter of Alexander, bishop of Moray, son of Alexander duke of Albany, and by her he had a daughter, Sybilla, married to Sir Gilbert Ogilvy of Ogilvy. By a second marriage to Lilias, daughter of Lord Ruthven, he had two sons and five daughters. Jean, the eldest, married the fourth earl of Montrose, high chancellor; Anne, the second, the seventh earl of Mar, high treasurer; Lilias, the third, the master of Crawford; Catherine, the fourth, the earl of Tullebardine; and Mary, the youngest, Sir James Stirling of Keir. By marriages into the best families the Drummonds very much increased the power, influence, and possessions of their house. Of his two sons, Patrick, the elder, was third Lord Drummond; James, the younger, created, 31st January 1609, Lord Maderty, was ancestor of the viscounts of Strathallan. [See STRATHALLAN, Viscount of.]

Patrick, third Lord Drummond, embraced the reformed religion, and spent some time in France. He died before 1600. He was twice married, and by his first wife, Elizabeth, daughter of David Lindsay of Edzell, eventually earl of Crawford, he had two sons and five daughters. The eldest daughter, Catharine, married the master of Rothes; the second, Lilias, became countess of Dunfermline; and the third, Jane, countess of Roxburghe; the fourth, Elizabeth, married the fifth lord Elphinstone; and the youngest, Anne, Barclay of Towie. The third daughter, Lady Roxburghe, a lady of great beauty, had the honour of being celebrated by the poet Daniel, and she was held in so high estimation for her abilities and virtue as to be selected by James the Sixth as the governess of his children. She died in October 1643. Her funeral was appointed for a grand gathering of the royalists to massacre the Covenanters, but they found their numbers too inconsiderable for the attempt. The following is her fac simile, taken from the Gentleman's Magazine for February 1799, and said there to be the signature of Jane, duchess (that is countess) of Roxburghe. It is appended to a receipt, dated 10th May 1617, for £500, part of the sum of three thousand pounds, of his majesty's free and princely gift to her, in consideration of long and faithful service done to the queen, as one of the ladies of the bedchamber to her majesty.

The elder son, James, fourth Lord Drummond, passed a considerable portion of his youth in France, and after James the Sixth's accession to the English throne, he attended the earl of Nottingham on an embassy to the Spanish court. On his return he was created earl of Perth, 4th March 1605. John, the younger son, succeeded his brother in 1611, as second earl of Perth. [See PERTH, earl of.]

The Hon. John Drummond, second son of James, third earl of Perth, was created in 1685 viscount, and in 1686 earl of Melfort, [See MELFORT, earl of] and his representative Captain George Drummond, duc de Melfort, and Count de Lussan in France, whose claim to the earldom of Perth in the Scottish peerage was established by the House of Lords, June, 1853, is the chief of the clan Drummond, which, more than any other, signalized itself by its fidelity to the lost cause of the Stuarts.

The family of Drummond of Hawthornden, in Mid Lothian, are cadets of the Perth Drummonds. In the latter part of the fourteenth century, William Drummond, a younger son of the family, and brother to Annabella, the queen of Robert the Third, married Elizabeth, daughter and one of the co-heiresses of William Airth of Airth, and with her acquired the barony of Carnock in Stirlingshire. The Carnock estate was sold by Sir John Drummond, the last of the elder branch of that line, to Sir Thomas Nicholson. Sir John fell in the battle of Alford in 1645, fighting under the celebrated marquis of Montrose. The barony of Hawthornden was purchased by John, afterwards Sir John Drummond, second son of Sir Robert Drummond of Carnock, and he became the founder of the Hawthornden family. In the year 1388 Hawthornden belonged to the Abernethys, by whom it was sold to the family of Douglas, and by them disponed to Drummond of Carnock. The families of Abernethy and Drummond became united by the marriage of Bishop Abernethy and Barbara Drummond, only daughter and heiress of William Drummond, Esq. of Hawthornden.

Of William Drummond, the celebrated poet, the most remarkable of the family of Hawthornden, a memoir is given below in larger type.

The estate afterwards came into possession of John Forbes, Esq. commander R.N., nephew of the said Bishop Abernethy-Drummond. He married Mary, daughter of Dr Ogilvie, M.D. of Murtle, a lineal descendant of Sir John Drummond, the first of Hawthornden, and heiress by special settlement of her cousin, the abovenamed Mrs. Barbara Drummond, who died in 1789, upon which Mr Forbes assumed the additional surname and arms of Drummond. His only surviving daughter, Margaret Anne Forbes Drummond, married in 1810, Francis Walker, writer to the signet, eldest son of James Walker, Esq. of Dalry, in Mid Lothian, and he also assumed the surname and arms of Drummond. Mr Forbes Drummond was created a baronet 27th February 1828, with remainder to his son-in-law, and died 28th May 1829 Sir Francis Walker Drummond, second baronet, born in 1781, died 29th February 1844, and was succeeded by his eldest son, Sir James Walker Drummond, formerly a captain in the Grenadier guards, retired in 1844 Married, with issue.

The Drummonds of Stanmore, in the county of Middlesex, are descended from Andrew Drummond, brother of the fourth viscount of Strathallan, and founder of the well-known banking house of Drummond and Co. of London, who purchased the estate of Stanmore in 1729 His great-grandson, George Harley Drummond of Stanmore, born 23d November 1783, married Margaret, daughter of Alexander Munro, Esq of Glasgow, with issue, is M P for Surrey (1858.)

The Drummonds of Cadlands, Hampshire, are a branch of the same family

The Drummonds of Concraig descended from the above-mentioned Sir Maurice Drummond, (who married the heiress of Concraig,) second son of Sir Malcolm Drummond, tenth seneschal of Lennox, and are now represented by Drummond of the Boyce, Gloucestershire, a modern cadet of the Drummonds of Megginch castle Perthshire. Allusion has already been made to the feud between the Drummonds and the Murrays, to which the unfortunate master of Drummond, eldest surviving son of the first Lord Drummond, fell a victim on the scaffold It originated in the following circumstance In the year 1391, Sir Alexander Moray of Ogilface (or Ogilvie) and Abercairney had accidentally killed a gentleman named William Spalding, for which he was summoned to take his trial before Sir John Drummond, third knight of Concraig justiciary coroner and seneschal or steward of Strathearn, in a justice court held at Foulis in Perthshire; and on pleading the privilege of being of the kin of Macduff earl of Fife, (see MACDUFF) the matter was referred to Lord Brechin, the lord-justice-general That functionary decreed that the law of clan Macduff should not protect Sir Alexander from the jurisdiction of his ordinary justice From that jurisdiction Alexander and his friends and successors, used every effort to be freed, but the family of Concraig as zealously endeavoured to hold them to it, until, upon a new occasion, in the reign of James the Third, a liberation was granted to some of the Murrays, and secured to their posterity In the meantime, Patrick Graham, having through marriage with the heiress, become earl of Strathearn, Sir Alexander Moray and his friends prevailed upon him to deprive Sir John Drummond, although he was his brother in-law, of his office and at the head of a large retinue, he proceeded from Methven, his place of residence, with the determination of dispersing Sir John's court then sitting at the Skeall of Crieff On receiving notice of his approach, Sir John hastened with his attendants to meet him, and the earl was killed at the first encounter Sir John immediately fled to Ireland, where it is said he died The feuds that arose out of this unlucky event forced the Drummonds of Concraig to maintain so many followers, that they were obliged from the expense to part with many of their lands. The barony of Concraig was purchased from them by Sir John Drummond of Cargill and Stobhall, and the dignities of seneschal or steward of Strathearn, justiciary-coroner of the whole district, and ranger of the forest, (which heritable offices had been conferred on the Concraig Drummonds by King David the Second,) were conveyed by Maurice Keir-Drummond, sixth baron of Concraig (who had married a daughter of Sir Andrew Moray of Ogilvie and Abercairney) to the first Lord Drummond.

John Drummond, second son of Sir John Drummond, third knight of Concraig, was ancestor of the Drummonds of Lennoch, in Strathearn, whose representative in 1640, John Drummond, eighth baron of Lennoch, purchased from Sir John Hay, ancestor of the earl of Kinnoul, the barony of Megginch in Perthshire. Admiral Sir Adam Drummond of Megginch castle, K.C.H, the thirteenth of Lennoch and sixth of Megginch castle, died in 1849 Born in 1770, he married in 1801, Lady Charlotte Murray, eldest daughter of John, fourth duke of Athole, and widow of Sir John Menzies, baronet, and had issue. His eldest son succeeded him His brother, Sir Gordon Drummond, G.C.B. (created in 1817), a general in the army (1825), died in 1854

DRUMMOND, WILLIAM, of Hawthornden, an elegant and ingenious poet, the son of Sir John Drummond of Hawthornden gentleman usher to King James the Sixth, was born there, December 13, 1585 He was educated at the university of Edinburgh, after which he spent four years at Bourges in France, studying the civil law, being intended by his father for the bar On his father's death he returned to Scotland in 1610, and retiring to his romantic seat of Hawthornden, in the parish of Lasswade, Mid Lothian, and in the immediate neighbourhood of Roslin castle, devoted himself to the perusal of the ancient classics and the cultivation of poetry A dangerous illness fostered a melancholy and devout turn of mind, and his first productions were 'The Cypress Grove,' in prose, containing reflections upon death, and 'Flowers of Zion, or Spiritual Poems,' published at Edinburgh in 1616 The death of a young lady, a daughter of Cunninghame of Barnes, to whom he was about to be married, overwhelmed him with grief, and to divert his thoughts from brooding on his loss, he again proceeded to the continent, where he remained for eight years, residing chiefly at Paris and Rome During his travels he made a collection of the best ancient and modern books, which, on his return, he presented to the college of Edinburgh The political and religious dissensions of the times induced him to retire to the seat of his brother-in-law, Sir John Scot of Scotstarvet, in Fife, during his stay with whom he wrote his 'History of the Five Jameses, Kings of Scotland,' a highly monarchical work, which was not published till after his death In his 45th year he married Elizabeth Logan, who bore so strong a resemblance to the former object of his love that she at once gained his affections She was the grand-daughter of Sir Robert Logan of Restalrig, and by her he had several children He died December 4, 1649, in his 64th year, his death being said to have been hastened by grief for the untimely fate of Charles the First Among his intimate friends and correspondents were, the earl of Stirling, Michael Drayton, and Ben Jonson, the latter of whom walked all the way to Hawthornden to pay him a visit, in the winter of 1618–19 Drummond has been much blamed for having kept notes of the cursory opinions thrown out in conversation with him by his guest, and for having chronicled some of his personal failings, but besides being merely private memoranda, never intended for publication, and never published by himself, a consideration which ought to acquit him of anything mean or unworthy in the matter, these notes are valuable as preserving characteristic traits of Ben Jonson, which have partly been confirmed from other sources Modern literature is absolutely flooded with the reminiscences,' 'diaries,' 'journals,' 'correspondence,' &c., of great and little poets, orators, and statesmen, and no one now thinks of reprehending a system which threatens to put an end to all friendly confidence and to all social and familiar intercourse in literary society Besides his History he wrote several political tracts, all strongly in favour of royalty It is principally as a poet, however, that Drummond is now remembered His poems, though occasionally tinged with the conceits of the Italian school, possess a harmony and sweetness unequalled by those of any poet of his time, his sonnets are particularly distinguished for tenderness and delicacy His works are·

DRUMMOND, George, a benevolent and public-spirited citizen of Edinburgh, the son of George Drummond of Newton, was descended from the old and knightly house of Stobhall, through a younger son of the cadet branch of Newton of Blair, and was born June 27, 1687. He received his education at Edinburgh, and was early distinguished for his proficiency in the science of calculation When only eighteen years of age he was employed by the committee of the Scots parliament to give his assistance in arranging the national accounts previous to the Union, and, in 1707, on the establishment of the excise, he was appointed accountant-general In 1715, when the earl of Mar raised the standard of rebellion, he was the first to give notice to government of that nobleman's proceedings, being one of the very few gentlemen of his Jacobite clan who appeared in arms for the reigning dynasty Collecting a company of volunteers, he joined the royal forces, and fought at Sheriffmuir The earliest notice of Argyle's victory was despatched by him to the magistrates of Edinburgh, in a letter written on horseback on the field of battle In the same year he was promoted to a seat at the board of excise, and, in April 1717, was appointed one of the commissioners of the board of customs In 1725 he was elected lord provost of Edinburgh, an office which he filled six times with uniform popularity and credit In 1727 he was named one of the commissioners and trustees for improving the fisheries and manufactures of Scotland, and, in October 1737, was created one of the commissioners of excise, an office which he held till his death To his public spirit and patriotic zeal the city of Edinburgh is indebted for many of its improvements. He was the principal agent in the erection of the Royal Infirmary, and, by his exertions, a charter was procured in August 1736, the foundation-stone being laid August 2, 1738 In 1745, upon the approach of the rebels, Mr Drummond again joined the army, and was present at the battle of Prestonpans. In September 1753, as Grand Master of the Freemasons in Scotland, he laid the foundation of the Royal Exchange In 1755 he was appointed one of the trustees of the forfeited estates, and elected a manager of the Select Society for the encouragement of Arts and Sciences in Scotland. In October 1768, during his sixth provostship, he laid the foundation-stone of the North Bridge, which connects the New Town of Edinburgh with the Old. He died November 4, 1766, in the 80th year of his age, while filling the office of lord provost, and was buried in the Canongate churchyard, being honoured with a public funeral To Provost Drummond Dr. Robertson, the historian, owed his appointment as principal of the university of Edinburgh, which was also indebted to him for the institution of five new professorships A few years after his death, a bust of him, by Nollekens, was erected in their public hall by the managers of the Royal Infirmary, bearing the following inscription from the pen of Principal Robertson "George Drummond, to whom this country is indebted for all the benefit which it derives from the Royal Infirmary" Drummond Street, the street at the back of the Infirmary, takes its name from him, as does also Drummond Place, in the new town, his villa of Drummond Lodge having stood almost in the centre of that modern square His brother, Alexander, who was some time British consul at Aleppo, was the author of 'Travels through different Cities of Germany, Italy, Greece, and several parts of Asia, as far as the banks of the Euphrates' London, 1754 The provost's daughter was married to the Rev John Jardine, D D, one of the ministers of the Tron Church, Edinburgh, and was the mother of Sir Henry Jardine, at one period king's remembrancer in Exchequer for Scotland, who died 11th August 1851

DRUMMOND, Robert Hay, a distinguished prelate of the Church of England, the second son of George Henry, seventh earl of Kinnoul, by Lady Abigail Harley, second daughter of Robert, earl of Oxford, lord high treasurer of England, was born in London November 10, 1711 After being educated at Westminster school, he was admitted a student of Christ church, Oxford, and having taken his degree, he accompanied his cousin, the duke of Leeds, on a tour to the continent. In 1735 he returned to college, and soon after entered into holy orders, when he was presented by the Oxford family to the rectory of Bothall in Northumberland In 1737, on the recommendation of Queen Caroline, he was appointed chaplain in ordinary to the king, George the Second In 1739, he assumed the name of Drummond, as heir of entail of his great-grandfather, William, first viscount of Strathallan, by whom the estates of Cromlix and Innerpeffrey were settled on the second branch of the Kinnoul family In 1743 he attended the king when his majesty joined the army on the continent, and on 7th July of that year, he preached the thanksgiving sermon before him at Hanover after the victory at Dettingen On his return to England, he was installed prebendary of Westminster, and in 1745, was admitted B D and D.D. In 1748 he was consecrated bishop of St Asaph In 1753, in an examination before the privy council, he made so eloquent a defence of the political conduct of his friends, Mr Stone and Mr Murray, (afterwards Lord Chief Justice Mansfield) that the king, on reading the examination, is said to have exclaimed, "That is indeed a man to make a friend of!" In May 1761, he was translated to the see of Salisbury, and in the same year he preached the coronation sermon of George the Third In the following November he was enthroned Archbishop of York, and soon after was sworn a privy councillor and appointed high almoner He died at his palace of Bishopthorpe December 10, 1776, in the 66th year of his age, leaving the character of an amiable man and highly estimable prelate He had married on 31st January 1748, the daughter and heiress of Peter Auriol, merchant in London, by whom he had a daughter, Abigail, who died young, and is commemorated in one of the epitaphs of Mason the poet, and six sons, the eldest of whom, Robert Auriol, became ninth earl of Kinnoul The youngest, the Rev George William Hay Drummond, prebendary of York, and author of a volume of poems entitled 'Verses Social and Domestic,' (Edin 1802) was editor of his father's sermons, six in number, which, with a letter on Theological Study, appeared in one volume 8vo in 1803, with a life prefixed He was unfortunately drowned off Bideford, while proceeding from Devonshire to Scotland, in 1807

DRUMMOND, William Abernethy, D D, bishop of Edinburgh, was descended from the family of Abernethy of Saltoun, in Banffshire, and on his marriage with the heiress of Hawthornden, in the county of Edinburgh, he assumed the name of Drummond in addition to his own He at first studied medicine, but was subsequently, for many years, minister of an episcopalian church in Edinburgh Having paid his respects to Prince Charles Edward, when he held his court at Holyroodhouse, he was afterwards exposed to much annoyance and danger on that account, and was even glad to avail himself of his medical degree, and wear for some years the usual professional costume of the Edinburgh physicians of that period He was consecrated bishop of Brechin at Peterhead, September 26, 1787, and a few months afterwards, was elected to the see of Edinburgh, in which charge he continued till 1805, when, on the union of the two classes of Episcopalians, he resigned in favour of Dr Sandford He retained, however, his pastoral connection with the clergy in the diocese of Glasgow till his death, which took place August 27, 1809 Keith says his intemperate manner defeated in most cases the benevolence of his intentions, and only irritated those whom he had wished to convince [Scottish Bishops, App p 545] He wrote several small tracts, and was a good deal engaged in theological controversy both with Protestants and Roman Catholics

DRUMMOND, Sir William, an eminent scholar and antiquary, belonged to a family settled at Logie-Almond in Perthshire, where he possessed an estate The date of his birth is not known, nor the circumstances of his early life At the close of 1795, he was returned to parliament on a vacancy in the representation of the borough of St Mawes, Cornwall, and in the two following parliaments, which met in 1796 and 1801, he sat for Lostwithiel At the time of his second election he had been appointed envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary at the court of Naples, and soon after he was sent to Constantinople as ambassador to the Sultan In 1801 he was invested with the Turkish order of the Crescent, which was confirmed by royal license inserted in the London Gazette September 8, 1803 In 1808, while residing as envoy at the court of Palermo, he embarked in a scheme with the duke of Orleans (subsequently king of the French) to secure the regency of Spain to Prince Leopold of Sicily, a project which failed at the very outset, and for his share in which he has been severely censured in Napier's History of the Peninsular War [vol. i p 177] In his latter years, for the benefit of his health, which required a warmer climate than that of England, he resided almost constantly on the continent, chiefly at Naples, and he died at Rome March 29, 1828 He was a member of the privy council, and a fellow of the royal societies of London and Edinburgh Of modest, retiring, and unobtrusive manners, he was a close and assiduous student, and published various works, principally in the department of antiquities, an account of which, with a memoir, is given in the Encyclopedia Britannica, seventh edition, but his reputation as a scholar and antiquary will chiefly rest on his 'Origin of several Empires, States, and Cities,' mentioned afterwards The following is a list of his writings

A Review of the Government of Sparta and Athens. London, 1794, large 8vo.

The Satires of Persius, translated. London, 1798. This work appeared about the same time as Mr Gifford's version of the same poet, and in freedom and fidelity was thought to be equal to it.

Academical questions. London, 1805, 4to A metaphysical work; to which he intended a subsequent volume to complete its design, but it never appeared.

Herculanenses, or Archæological and Philological Dissertations concerning a Manuscript found among the Ruins of Herculaneum London, 1810, 4to. Published in conjunction with Robert Walpole, Esq

An Essay on a Punic Inscription found in the Island of Malta. London, 1811, royal 4to.

Odin, a Poem Part I London, 1818, 4to. The object of this unfinished poem, which soon fell into oblivion, was to embody in verse some of the more striking features of the Scandinavian mythology

Origines, or Remarks on the Origin of several Empires, States, and Cities. London, 3 vols. 8vo. The first volume, embracing the origin of the Babylonian, the Assyrian, and the Iranian Empires, appeared in 1824; the second, which is wholly devoted to the subject of Egypt, including the modern discoveries in hieroglyphics, came out in 1825, and the third, which treats of the Phœnicians and Arabia, was published in 1826.

In 1811, he had printed for private circulation, but not published, a sort of philological treatise entitled 'Œdipus Judaicus,' designed to show that some of the narratives in the Old Testament are merely allegorical, and a copy of it having fallen into the hands of the Rev Dr George Doyley, that gentleman published an answer under the title of "Letters to the Right Hon. Sir William Drummond, in defence of particular passages of the Old Testament, against his late work entitled 'Œdipus Judaicus.' The work was also attacked in the Edinburgh Review

He was also an occasional contributor to the Classical Journal, in which his papers on subjects of antiquity, particularly the zodiac of Dendérah, attracted the general admiration of the learned of his time.

DRUMMOND, Thomas, the inventor of the brilliant "light" that bears his name, was born in Edinburgh in October 1797 He was the second of three sons, and after his father's death, which happened whilst he was yet an infant, his mother removed to Musselburgh, where she resided for many years He received his education at the High School of his native city, and at this time formed an acquaintance with Professors Playfair, Leslie, and Brewster, and also with Professors Wallace and Jardine, whose pupil he more especially was. In February 1813, he was appointed to a cadetship at Woolwich, where he soon became distinguished for his mathematical abilities. So rapid was his progress that at Christmas of the same year he entered the second academy, having commenced at the sixth His friend and master at Woolwich, Professor Barlow, thus sketched his mathematical character at this period "Mr Drummond, by his amiable disposition, soon gained the esteem of the masters under whom he was instructed, with the mathematical masters in particular his reputation stood very high, not so much for the rapidity of his conception as for his steady perseverance, and for the original and independent views he took of the different subjects that were placed before him There were among his fellow-students some who comprehended an investigation quicker than Drummond, but there was no one who ultimately understood all the bearings of it so well While a cadet in a junior academy, not being satisfied with a rather difficult demonstration in the conic sections, he supplied one himself on an entirely original principle, which at the time was published in Leybourne's 'Mathematical Repository,' and was subsequently taken to replace that given in Dr Hutton's 'Course of Mathematics,' to which he had objected This apparently trifling event gave an increased stimulus to his exertions, and may perhaps be considered the foundation-stone of his future scientific fame After leaving the academy he still continued his intercourse with his mathematical masters, with whom he formed a friendship which only terminated in his much lamented death."

During his preliminary and practical instruction in the special duties of the engineer department, his talent for mechanical combinations became conspicuous, and he also largely devoted his attention to the acquisition of military knowledge, Jomini and Bousmard being his favourite authors After serving for a short time at Plymouth, he went to Chatham, and during this period he obtained leave of absence for the purpose of visiting the army of occupation in France, and attending one of the great reviews.

After his Chatham course was completed he was stationed at Edinburgh, where his duties were of an ordinary character, relating merely to the charge and repair of public works, but he eagerly availed himself of the opportunity afforded him of pursuing the higher mathematical studies at the college and classes, and among the scientific society for which his native city was at that period distinguished His prospects of promotion at this time were, however, so disheartening that he seriously meditated leaving the army for the English bar, and with this view had actually entered his name at Lincoln's Inn

In the autumn of 1819 he fortunately became acquainted with Colonel Colby, when that officer was passing through Edinburgh, on his return from the trigonometrical operations in the Scottish Highlands, and in the course of the following year, an offer from him to take part in the trigonometrical survey was gladly accepted He had now the advantage of a residence during each winter in London, and besides devoting himself more closely to the study of the higher branches of mathematics, he began the study of chemistry, in which he was destined to achieve his greatest and most enduring triumph He attended the lectures of Professors Brande and Faraday, and soon made his new knowledge available to the duties on which he was employed The writer of a memoir of Captain Drummond in the Penny Cyclopedia (supplement), to which this sketch of him is largely indebted, thus describes the useful and important invention known by the name of "Drummond's light" "The incandescence of lime," he says, "having been spoken of in one of the lectures, the idea struck him that it could be employed to advantage as a substitute for argand lamps in the reflectors used on the survey for rendering visible distant stations, because, in addition to greater intensity, it afforded the advantage of concentrating the light as nearly as possible into the focal point of the parabolic mirror, by which the whole light would be available for reflecting in a pencil of parallel rays, whereas of the argand lamp only the small portion of rays near the focus was so reflected On this subject his first chemical experiments were formed On the way from the lecture he purchased a blowpipe, charcoal, &c, and that very evening set to work. At this period (1824), a committee of the House of Commons recommended that the survey of Ireland should be begun, and that Colonel Colby should make arrangements for carrying it on For this survey instruments of improved construction were required Among others, a means of rendering visible distant stations was desirable The recent experience of the Western Islands had shown the probability that in a climate so misty as Ireland the difficulty of distant observations would be greatly increased, and Colonel Colby at once saw the important results which might follow such an improvement of the lamp as that which Drummond had devised Under his judicious advice the experiments were prosecuted, and were rapidly attended with success Their progress and results are detailed by the author in the 'Philosophical Transactions' for 1826, as well as the first application of the lamp to actual use in Ireland When a station, Slieve Snaught in Donegal, had long in vain been looked for from Davis mountain, near Belfast, the distance being sixty-six miles, and passing across the haze of Lough Neagh, Mr Drummond took the lamp and a small party to Slieve Snaught, and by calculation succeeded so well in directing the axis of the reflector to the instrument that the light was seen, and its first appearance will long be remembered by those who witnessed it The night was dark and cloudless, the mountain and the camp were covered with snow, and a cold wind made the duty of observing no enviable task The light was to be exhibited at a given hour, and to guide the observer, one of the lamps formerly used, an argand in a light-house reflector, was placed on the tower of Randalstown church, which happened to be nearly in the line at fifteen miles The time approached and passed, and the observer had quitted the telescope, when the sentry cried, 'The light!' and the light indeed burst into view, a steady blaze of surpassing splendour, which completely effaced the much nearer guiding beacon" Mr Drummond's original heliostat was not completed till 1825 Various improvements were afterwards made on it He also directed his attention to the improvement of the barometer, and made a syphon with his own hands, which performed remarkably well Indeed, at this period, so active was his mind and so constant his application that, we are told, scarcely an instrument existed that he did not examine and consider, with a view to render it useful for the purposes of the survey

Owing to a severe illness, brought on by his close application to his duties, Mr Drummond was compelled to leave Ireland, and return for a time to Edinburgh He had taken much pains to perfect his light, and with the view of adapting it to lighthouses, the corporation of Trinity house placed at his disposal a small lighthouse at Purfleet, and the experiments he made, with their success, are detailed in the 'Philosophical Transactions' for 1830 His attention, however, was soon directed away from it, and it has never yet been applied to them His name had been recommended by Mr Bellenden Ker, who was employed in the preparation of the details of the Reform Bill, to Lord Brougham, then lord chancellor, as a person eminently qualified to superintend the laborious operations necessary to perfecting the schedules, and he was at once appointed to this commission These schedules were based upon the calculations made by him relative to the boundaries of the old and new boroughs He was at this time but a lieutenant of the engineers, but his talents and scientific attainments were well known After the passing of the Reform Bill (in 1832) he returned to his duties on the survey in Ireland, but was soon appointed private secretary to Lord Althorp (afterwards earl Spencer), then chancellor of the exchequer On the dissolution of the Reform ministry, he obtained, through the influence of Lord Brougham, a pension of three hundred pounds a-year

In 1835 he was appointed under secretary for Ireland. He was at the head of the commission on Irish railways, and distinguished himself greatly in the report on the same. One striking remark of his, that "property has its duties as well as its rights," has been often quoted He died April 15, 1840, and soon after his death there was a subscription for a statue of him, executed at Rome, to be placed at Dublin Both Lord Spencer and Lord John Russell have borne ample testimony to his attainments and estimable qualities, the latter in the House of Commons

DRYSDALE, a surname originating from Dryfesdale, a parish in the district of Annandale, Dumfries-shire, which is popularly pronounced Drysdale. The name Dryfesdale is derived from the river Dryfe, and was at one time applied to the entire district through which that stream flows. It is now limited to the parish.

DRYSDALE, JOHN, D D, an eminent preacher, third son of the Rev John Drysdale, of Kirkaldy, was born in that town April 29, 1718, and received the rudiments of his education at the parish school of his native place under David Miller, who had also the honour of teaching Dr Adam Smith and James Oswald of Dunnikier In 1732 he removed to the university of Edinburgh, where he studied divinity, and, in 1740, was licensed to preach After being for several years employed as assistant minister in the College church of Edinburgh, he was in 1748, by the interest of the earl of Hopetoun, presented by the Crown to the living of Kirkliston, Linlithgowshire, and, in 1763, was translated to Lady Yester's church, Edinburgh In August 1765 the degree of D D was conferred on him by the Marischal university of Aberdeen, and the following year he was translated to the collegiate charge of the Tron church, Edinburgh He was afterwards appointed one of his Majesty's chaplains for Scotland, with one-third of the emoluments of the deanery of the chapel royal In 1773 and 1784 he was elected moderator of the General Assembly He had always supported what was called the moderate party in the church, and at the meeting of the Assembly in May 1788, he was chosen principal clerk of assembly, but was unable, from declining health, to perform the duties He died soon after, on June 16, 1788 After his death two volumes of his sermons were published by his son-in-law, Professor Dalzell

DUDGEON, William, a minor song-writer, was born at Tyninghame village, East Lothian, about the year 1758 His father, Mr John Dudgeon, occupied a farm there, on the property of the earl of Haddington His mother, whose maiden name was Ainslie, was the aunt of Mr. Robert Ainslie, writer to the signet, the friend of Burns. Along with John Rennie, the celebrated civil engineer, he was taught by a Mr Gibson, mathematical teacher, Dunbar, afterwards of Perth, who considered Rennie and Dudgeon the two best scholars he ever had Having been bred to agricultural pursuits, his father placed him in an extensive farm in the neighbourhood of Dunse, upon a lease of thirty years To this farm, a large portion of which was in a state of nature, he gave the name of Primrose Hill, and he lived to improve it in a high degree He was the author of the song, 'The maid that tends the goats,' which at one period was very popular He wrote various other pieces, although it is not known that any of them were ever printed He also excelled as a painter and musician Mr Dudgeon died 28th October 1813, and lies buried in the churchyard of Prestonkirk Burns, the poet, when on his Border tour in May 1787, in company with his friend Mr Ainslie, above mentioned, visited Berrywell, near Dunse, the residence of the father of Mr Ainslie, who was land steward to Lord Douglas in Berwickshire Here the subject of this notice was introduced to Burns, who made the following observation in his journal —"Mr Dudgeon, a poet at times—a worthy remarkable character—natural penetration—a great deal of information, some genius, and extreme modesty"

Duff, a surname adopted from the Celtic, in which language the word means black. Sibbald, in his History of Fife, says, "that as Niger and Rufus were names of families amongst the Romans, from the colour and complexion of men, so it seems Duff was, from the swarthy and black colour of those of the tribe," or clan of Macduff

It is the family name of the earl of Fife, in the Peerage of Ireland, descended from that Duncan Macduff, Thane of Fife, who overthrew Macbeth, and gave such effectual aid to Malcolm Canmore in obtaining possession of the throne. See Fife, earl of, and Macduff

It is also the patronymic of a family which enjoys the dignity and title of a baronet, conferred, in 1813, on Sir James Duff, who for a series of years filled the office of British consul at the port of Cadiz, and whose nephew, Sir William Gordon, on succeeding to the title in 1815, assumed the name and arms of Duff, in addition to his own Their seats are Kinstair in Ayrshire, and Crombie in Banffshire. See Gordon, surname of.

DUFF, king of Scotland, son of Malcolm the First, succeeded Indulph in 961 The name was Odo, according to Pinkerton By the Celtic part of his subjects he was surnamed Duff, or the Black. His reign was constantly disturbed by Culen, the son of Indulph, whom he vanquished in a war on Drumcrup, (perhaps Duncrub in Perthshire is meant, now the seat of Lord Rollo) After a short reign of about four years, he was slain in Forres, about 965 He is said to have been murdered by a band of assassins, who broke into his chamber by night In Buchanan's History of Scotland it is stated that they were hired by Donald, governor of the castle of Forres, that after the murder they "carried him out so cunningly a back way, that not so much as a drop of blood appeared," and that the assassins were afterwards sent out of the way by Donald, to avoid any of them being present, lest blood should issue from the corpse Pitcairn, who styles him King Duffus, cites this as the earliest recorded notice in British history of the superstitious custom of touching the dead body of a murdered person, as a proof of guilt. [Criminal Trials, vol iii p 191]

Duffus, Baron, a title (dormant) in the Scottish peerage, held by a branch of the noble family of Sutherland, descended from Nichol, 2d son of Kenneth, third earl of Sutherland, who fell at the battle of Halidonhill in 1333 By his marriage with Mary, daughter and heir of Reginald de Cheyne, he got the barony of Duffus, (a contraction of Duffhouse or Dovehouse,) in the county of Elgin and, in consequence, he added the arms of Cheyne to his paternal coat of Sutherland He had two sons, John, who died without issue, and Henry, who succeeded his father Henry's son, Alexander, the third laird of Duffus of this family, married Morella, daughter and heir of Chisholme of Chisholme, (in Roxburghshire) with whom he got the barony of Quarrelwood in the county of Nairn, and thereupon added to his armorial bearing a boar's head, erased, being part of the arms of Chisholm. He had two sons and a daughter Alexander, the elder son, had a daughter, Christian, married to William Oliphant of Berrindale, William, the second son, inherited his mother's lands of Quarrelwood, and had a son, William, who, on the death of his uncle, Alexander, took possession of the barony of Duffus, and the other lands of the family, on the pretence of his cousin Christian being illegitimate After protracted proceedings both in Scotland and at Rome, the matter was at length adjusted, and he had a charter of the barony of Duffus, 18th June 1507 He was killed at Thurso by the clan Gunn in 1529 In Sir R Gordon's History of the Family of Sutherland, (p 102) is the following entry relating to this event "The same yeir of God, (1529,) Andrew Stuart, bishop of Catteynes, upon some conceaved displeasure which he had receaved moved the clan Gun to kill the laird of Duffus in the town of Thurso, in Catteynes. Upon this accident the haill dyocie of Catteynes was in a tumult. The earle of Sutherland did assist the bishop of Catteynes against his adversaries, by reason of allyance contracted betwixt the houses of Huntley, Sutherland, and Atholl," &c. On September 3, 1590, Mr Thomas Stewart, treasurer of Caithness, Mr Andrew Peter, vicar of Wick, and seven other churchmen, found the earl of Athol caution to take their trial at the justice-aire of Inverness, for the slaughter of the laird of Duffus and others, slain at the same time.

His descendant, Alexander Sutherland, tenth laird and first Lord Duffus, succeeded his father, when a minor, in 1626. He was one of the Committee of Estates, 20th March, 1647, and one of the colonels for arming the kingdom, 15th February 1649 By Charles the Second he was created a peer of Scotland, 8th December 1650, under the title of Lord Duffus. In the following year he was governor of Perth, when that city was invested by Cromwell, and to avoid a general assault he was compelled to surrender In 1654, he was fined fifteen hundred pounds by Cromwell's act of grace and pardon He died 31st August 1674. He was married four times, but had only issue (a son and two daughters) by his third wife, Lady Margaret Stewart, second daughter of the fifth earl of Moray

His only son, James, second Lord Duffus, was admitted a member of the privy council, 4th May 1686. In 1688 he killed Ross of Kindace in a sudden quarrel, wherein he received great provocation. He died in 1705. By his wife, Lady Margaret Mackenzie, eldest daughter of the third earl of Seaforth, he had, with a daughter, four sons Kenneth, third lord Duffus, the Hon James Sutherland, who married Elizabeth, daughter and heiress of Sir William Dunbar of Hempriggs, Caithness-shire, relict of Sir Robert Gordon of Gordons town, on which he changed his name to Dunbar, and was created a baronet, 10th December 1706, the Hon William Sutherland of Roscommon who engaged in the rebellion of 1715, and was forfeited by act of parliament, and the Hon John

Kenneth, third Lord Duffus, took the oaths and his seat in parliament, 28th October 1706, and afforded his cordial support to the treaty of Union He was a captain in the royal navy, and commanded a frigate of 46 guns, in which, 29th June 1711, he engaged eight French privateers, and after a desperate resistance of some hours, was taken prisoner, severely wounded, having no less than five balls in his body He joined in the rebellion of 1715, and was in consequence among those who were attainted Having married a Swedish lady (Charlotte Christina, daughter of Eric de Slobblade, governor of Gottenburgh) he proceeded to Sweden, and on receiving information of his attainder, he gave intimation to the British minister at Stockholm of his intention to return to England to surrender himself He set out immediately but on his way was arrested by the British resident at Hamburgh, and detained in close custody till the time limited for surrendering had elapsed. He was sent to London, and committed prisoner to the Tower, but in 1717 was set at liberty, without being brought to trial He afterwards entered the Russian naval service, in which he was a flag-officer and died before 1734.

His only son Eric Sutherland, (born in August 1710) in 1734 presented a petition to the king claiming the dignity of baron Duffus, but the House of Lords, to whom it was referred, found that he had no right to it. He had an ensigncy in the army in 1731, and was promoted to a company in 1739, and died at Skibo, 28th August 1768. He married his cousin Elizabeth, third daughter of Sir James Dunbar of Hempriggs, baronet, and had two sons: James, his heir, and Axley, who died unmarried. Elizabeth, the eldest daughter, married first, Mr St. Clair; 2dly, 5th December 1772, the Rev James Rudd, B.A., rector of Newton-Kyme and Full-Sutton, Yorkshire, and had two sons, the Rev Eric Rudd, of Thorne near Doncaster, who claims the title of Lord Duffus, as nephew and heir-general of James, fifth lord, though sixth in succession, and James Sutherland, Charlotte, the second daughter, married Sir John Sinclair of Mey, and was mother of the twelfth earl of Caithness, and Anne, the youngest, became the wife of the Hon. George Mackay of Skibo, and was mother of Eric, seventh Lord Reay

The elder son, James Sutherland, born 8th June 1747, was an officer in the army He was restored to the honours of his family, by act of parliament, 26th May 1826. He died unmarried 30th January 1827, when the title was assumed by his cousin Sir Benjamin Dunbar of Hempriggs, born 28th April 1761 He married, in 1785, Janet, eldest daughter of George Mackay, Esq of Bighouse, and had two sons and two daughters. He died in May 1843

His elder son, Sir George Sutherland Dunbar, of Hempriggs, born in 1799, by right 6th baron, does not assume the title of Lord Duffus, using only that of baronet. Heir-presumptive, his brother, Hon Robert. born in 1801, who is a deputy-lieutenant of Caithness.

In Aubrey's Memoirs (page 200) occurs the account of a curious family tradition of the house of Duffus, which has been handed down from father to son, but which of course has no more foundation than any other story in 'Folk-lore' or fairy superstition It relates that as one of the lairds of Duffus was walking in the fields near his own house in Morayshire, he was suddenly carried away, and next day was found in the cellar of the king of France at Paris, with a silver cup in his hand. On being brought into the king's presence, and questioned as to who he was and whence he came, he told his name, his country, and his place of residence, and said that on the preceding day, being in the fields, he heard the noise of a whirlwind, and of voices crying "horse and hattock," (the word the Fairies are said to use when they remove from any place) whereupon he cried "horse and hattock!" also, and was immediately caught up and transported through the air, by the furies, to that place, where, after he had drank heartily, he fell asleep, and before he awoke, the rest of the company were gone, and left him in the posture in which he was found It is said that the king gave him the cup which he had in his hand, and dismissed him This story was communicated to Aubrey by one Stewart (who seems thoroughly to have believed it), tutor to the eldest son of James second Lord Duffus, and that nobleman being referred to on the subject, answered that there was such a tradition in the family but he thought it fabulous. There was, however, an old silver cup in possession of the lords Duffus, which was called "the fairy cup," but it had nothing engraven on it except the arms of the family and defeated the earl of Argyle's invasion, 16th June 1685. He had a grant of the barony of Salton, forfeited by Andrew Fletcher, of which he had a charter, 16th January 1686. On the revival of the order of the Thistle in 1687, he was elected one of the knights companions thereof. At the revolution he accompanied King James on his retirement to France, and was appointed one of his lords of the bedchamber at St. Germains, where he died in 1692. By his countess, a sister of the duchess of Northumberland, he had a son, George, who succeeded him.

DUMBARTON, Earl of, a title (now extinct) in the peerage of Scotland, conferred in 1675, on Lord George Douglas, third son of the first marquis of Douglas. In his younger years Lord George was page of honour to Louis the Fourteenth, king of France, and subsequently became an officer in the French army, and distinguishing himself by his valour, attained the rank of major-general. After the treaty of Nimeguen in 1678, he was recalled to England by Charles the Second, who created him earl of Dumbarton, (by patent, dated 9th March 1675) with limitation to the heirs-male of his body On the accession of King James the Seventh he was appointed commander-in-chief of the forces in Scotland.

George, second earl of Dumbarton, had the commission of lieutenant-colonel of a regiment of foot in the British service, in 1715, and in the following year was appointed ambassador to Russia. The date of his death is not known, and leaving no issue, the title became extinct.

In the defender's proof in the Douglas cause, is a letter from the second and last earl of Dumbarton to Lady Jane Douglas, dated Douay in France, 7th January 1749, concluding, "As for me, I live quietly here, with a gentleman that boards me and my servant; and I strive to make a shift with my poor fortune."

DUMFRIES, Earl of, a title in the peerage of Scotland, now merged in that of the marquis of Bute, conferred in 1633, on William, seventh Lord Crichton of Sanquhar, [see SANQUHAR, lord,] who was created viscount of Ayr, by patent, 2d February 1622, and earl of Dumfries, viscount of Ayr and Lord Crichton of Sanquhar and Cumnock, 12th June 1633. He had a charter of the earldom of Menteith, 20th December the same year. He married Euphemie, daughter of James Seton of Touch, and had by her three sons and two daughters.

His eldest son, William, second earl, was a privy-councillor to King Charles the Second, and died in 1691. By his countess, Penelope, daughter of Sir Robert Swift, of the county of York, he had two sons and three daughters. His two sons having died before him, he obtained a new patent of the earldom of Dumfries, to his grandson, William Lord Crichton, after himself and the heirs male of his body, and failing him, to the four sisters of the latter, namely, Penelope, Margaret, Mary, and Elizabeth respectively, and failing them, and the heirs of their bodies, to the nearest heirs of the said earl whatsoever. William Lord Crichton, here mentioned, was the son of Charles Lord Crichton, second son of the second earl, (his elder brother, Robert, having died very young,) by his wife, the Hon. Sarah Dalrymple, third daughter of the first viscount Stair. He succeeded as third earl, and died on the last day of February 1694, unmarried.

His eldest sister, Penelope, became countess of Dumfries in her own right, in virtue of the patent of 1690. She married, 26th February 1698, her cousin, the Hon. William Dalrymple of Glenmure, second son of the first earl of Stair, and died at Clackmannan 6th March 1742, having issue, William earl of Dumfries and Stair, Hon. John Dalrymple, a captain of dragoons, who died unmarried 23d February 1742, James, third earl of Stair, (see STAIR, earl of,) three other sons and two daughters, the elder of whom, Lady Elizabeth Crichton Dalrymple, married John Macdowall of Freugh in the county of Wigton, and had by him Patrick, fifth earl of Dumfries, four other sons, and two daughters.

William, fourth earl of Dumfries, had a cornet's commission in his uncle, the earl of Stair's regiment, the 6th dragoons, in 1721, in which regiment and the third foot guards he served for twenty-six years. In 1742 he succeeded his mother as earl of Dumfries, and was aide-de-camp to the earl of Stair, at the battle of Dettingen, 26th June 1743. He was appointed captain-lieutenant in the third regiment of footguards in 1744, and on the abolition of heritable jurisdictions in 1747 he got for the sheriffship of Clackmannan two thousand pounds, and for the regality of Cumnock and Glenmure four hundred pounds. In 1752 he was invested with the order of the Thistle, and in 1760 succeeded his brother James, as fourth earl of Stair, and was thenceforward styled earl of Dumfries and Stair. He died at Dumfries-house, Ayrshire, 27th July 1768, without surviving issue, having been twice married, and was succeeded in the title of Dumfries by his nephew, Patrick Macdowall of Freugh, and in that of Stair by his cousin, John Dalrymple.

Patrick Macdowall of Freugh, fifth earl, born 15th October 1726, was an officer in the army. He was chosen one of the sixteen representatives of the Scottish peerage at the general election, 1790, and rechosen in 1796 and 1802. He died at Edinburgh 7th April 1803, in the 77th year of his age. He married Margaret, daughter of Ronald Crauford of Restalrig, in the county of Edinburgh, and had two daughters, the younger of whom died an infant. The elder, Lady Elizabeth Penelope Crichton, born at Dumfries-house, 25th November 1772, married, October 12th 1792, John Viscount Mountstuart, eldest son of John first marquis of Bute. He died 22d January 1794, and she, dying in the lifetime of her father, at Southamptom, 25th July 1797, in the 25th year of her age, was buried at Cumnock, leaving two sons, John, sixth earl of Dumfries and second marquis of Bute, having succeeded to the latter title on the death of his grandfather the first marquis, 16th November 1814, and the Hon. (afterwards lord) Patrick James Herbert Crichton Stuart (posthumous), born at Brompton Park house 20th August 1794, and on 28th May 1817 obtained the precedency and rank of a younger son of a marquis, died September 6, 1859. See BUTE, Marquis of, vol. i. p. 517.

DUNBAR, a surname once very prominent in the annals of national and border warfare, and derived from the town of that name in Haddingtonshire. The word Dun-bar, both. in the British and the Gaelic signifies "the fort on the height," or, "strength upon the summit," and the town obtained its designation from the fortlet on the rock, which at this place projects into the sea.

Boece and after him Buchanan state that Kenneth the First, having defeated the Picts in a pitched battle at Scone, conferred the fortress here upon one of his most valiant soldiers, whose name was Bar, and hence the name of Dun-bar, or the Castle of Bar, but Kenneth was king of the Picts, and certainly did not make war on his own subjects. He invaded Lothian six times, and burnt Dunbar, which had its name before his day. Boece's derivation of the name, like many others of his statements, is therefore a mere fable.

So early as 961 we find the men of Lothian under two leaders of the names of Dunbar and Graeme, doing battle against the Danish invaders at Cullen.

The title of earl of Dunbar and March was long enjoyed by the descendants of Cospatrick, earl of Northumberland, who, with other nobles of the north of England, fled to Scotland after the conquest of that country, in 1066, by William of Normandy, carrying with them Edgar Atheling, the heir of the Saxon line, and his two sisters, Margaret and Christina.

Malcolm Canmore, who married the princess Margaret, bestowed on Cospatrick the manor of Dunbar and many fair lands in the Merse and Lothian.

His second son, who was also named Cospatrick, witnessed the foundation charter of the abbey of Holyrood house, by David the First in 1128. He had soon afterwards the rank of an earl, and died in 1139, leaving a son, Cospatrick, the second earl, who made donations to the monastery of Kelso of the patronage of the churches of Home, Lambden, and Greenlaw He died in 1147, leaving four sons.

His eldest son, Cospatrick the third earl, had two sons, Waldeve, his successor, and Patrick, who inherited the manor of Greenlaw The latter died in 1166. His son William, after mentioned, was ancestor of the earls of Home.

Waldeve, the fourth earl, was the first who was designed earl of Dunbar He was one of the hostages for the performance of the treaty for the release of King William the First from his captivity in England, in 1174 He died in 1182

Patrick, the fifth earl, is described as having been a brave warrior William the Lion bestowed on him, in 1184, Ada, one of his natural daughters, in marriage. He held the office of justiciary of Lothian and keeper of Berwick In 1218, Earl Patrick founded a monastery of Red friars in Dunbar. In 1231, being then very old, after taking farewell of his children, relations, and neighbours, whom he invited to his castle of Dunbar during the festivities of Christmas for the purpose, he retired to a monastery, where he died the following year

His daughter Ada obtained from him the lands of Home, and took for her second husband her cousin William, above mentioned, son of Patrick, second son of Cospatrick, third earl He assumed the name of Home, and was progenitor of the earls of Home, so created in 1605 See HOME, earl of

Patrick, the sixth earl, succeeded his father, at the age of forty-six. Lord Hailes calls him the most powerful baron of the southern districts of Scotland He held the first rank among the twenty-four barons who guaranteed the treaty of peace with England in 1244 He died in 1248, at the siege of Damietta in Egypt, while on the crusade with Louis IX of France.

Patrick, the seventh earl of Dunbar was one of the chiefs of the English faction during the turbulent minority of Alexander the Third, and heading a party, surprised the castle of Edinburgh, and freed Alexander and his queen from the power of the Comyns. Thomas Lermont of Ercildoun, commonly called 'the Rhymer,' visited the castle of Dunbar in 1285, and foretold to the earl the sudden death of Alexander the Third, who was killed, next day, by a fall from his horse on the sands of Kinghorn This earl was afterwards one of the regents of the kingdom, and died in 1289 at the age of seventy-six.

Patrick, the eighth earl of Dunbar, surnamed Black Beard, appeared at the parliament at Brigham in 1289, where he is called earl of March or the Merse, being the first of the earls of Dunbar designated by that title He was one of the competitors for the crown of Scotland, to which he entered a formal claim at Berwick in 1291, as the great-grandson of Ada, daughter of William the Lion, but his claim was soon withdrawn, and swearing fealty to Edward the same year he ever after steadily adhered to the English interest. His wife, Marjory Comyn, daughter of Alexander, earl of Buchan, favoured the Scots, and retained the castle of Dunbar for Baliol, but was obliged to surrender it to Edward the First in April 1296. The earl died in 1309

His son, Patrick, the ninth earl, received Edward the Second, when he fled from the field of Bannockburn in 1314, into his castle of Dunbar, whence in a fishing boat he escaped to England. The earl afterwards made his peace with his cousin Robert the Bruce, and was present at the parliament held at Ayr on the 26th April, 1315, when the succession to the crown of Scotland was settled. He was subsequently appointed governor of the castle of Berwick, where he was besieged by Edward the Third in 1333. After the defeat at Halidon hill, however, he surrendered that important place, and renewed his oath of fealty to Edward; and his castle of Dunbar, which had been dismantled and razed to the ground, on the approach of the English, was now rebuilt, at the earl's expense, and garrisoned by an English force. He attended Edward Baliol at the parliament held at Edinburgh in February 1334, when the latter ceded to England, Berwick, Dunbar, Roxburgh, and Edinburgh, and all the southern counties of Scotland. In the following December, however, he again renounced his allegiance to the English king, and afterwards exerted himself actively against the English interest. In his absence his countess, who from her complexion was styled Black Agnes, defended the castle of Dunbar against the earl of Salisbury, whom she compelled to retire after a siege of nineteen weeks. Of this heroic lady a memoir is subjoined. The earl commanded the left wing of the Scottish army at the fatal battle of Durham on the 17th October 1346, where, among other nobles, fell his countess' brother, Thomas, earl of Moray, and as he had no male issue, she became sole possessor of his extensive estates, and her husband assumed the additional title of the earl of Moray [See MORAY, earl of] He died in 1369

His third daughter, Lady Elizabeth Dunbar, was married to John Maitland of Lethington, ancestor of the earls of Lauderdale. When the second earl of Lauderdale was created a duke in 1672, he chose for his second title that of marquis of March, to indicate his descent from the Dunbars, earls of March See LAUDERDALE, earl of

George, the tenth earl of Dunbar from the vast possessions which he inherited, became one of the most powerful nobles in Scotland of his time, and the rival of the Douglases. In 1388 he accompanied the earl of Douglas in his incursion into England, and after the battle of Otterburn he took the command of the Scots, whom he conducted safely home. His daughter Elizabeth was betrothed by contract to David duke of Rothesay, the son of Robert the Third, and heir to the throne, but Archibald earl of Douglas, surnamed the Grim, protested against the match, and through the influence of the duke of Albany, had the contract annulled, and the prince was married to his own daughter Marjory instead. In consequence of this slight the earl of Dunbar renounced his allegiance, and retiring into England, put himself under the protection of Henry the Fourth In February 1401 he made a wasteful inroad into Scotland and in June 1402 he again devastated the Borders. At the battle of Homildon hill he fought on the English side Through the mediation of Walter Halyburton of Dirleton, a reconciliation with the Douglases was effected in 1408, and he returned to Scotland the following year In 1411 he was one of the commissioners for negociating a truce with England. He died of a contagious fever, in 1420, at the age of 82

George, eleventh earl of Dunbar and March, succeeded his father in 1420, being then almost fifty years of age, but after holding his titles and estates for fourteen years, and being employed in various public transactions, particularly in making the truces with England which were so frequent at that period, he was, in 1434, imprisoned in the castle of Edinburgh by James the First, and deprived of his earldom and possessions, which he was accused of holding after they had been forfeited by his father's treason, and notwithstanding the plea which he offered of his father's pardon by the regent Albany, the forfeiture was confirmed by parliament, and the earldom and estates of Dunbar vested in the crown. To make some amends for the severity of his conduct the king conferred upon Earl George the title of earl of Buchan, but, dis-daining to assume the title, he retired with his eldest son to England, "and thus," says Douglas, "ended the long line of the earls of Dunbar and March, who for many generations enjoyed vast estates and influence."

DUNBAR, Earl of, a title in the Scottish peerage, revived in 1605, in the person of George Home, third son of Alexander Home of Manderston, in Berwickshire (of the Wedderburn family). See HOME, surname of. He is described by Archbishop Spottiswoode as a man of "deep wit, few words, and in his majesty's service no less faithful than fortunate." Being early introduced at court, he soon rose high in the favour of King James the Sixth, who, in 1585, appointed him one of the gentlemen of his bedchamber, and in 1590 conferred on him the honour of knighthood, and constituted him master of the wardrobe He was one of the cubicular courtiers mentioned in Calderwood's History (vol v p. 510) as having, from their jealousy of the Octavians, stirred up the tumult at Edinburgh of 17th December 1596. On 5th September 1601 he was appointed high treasurer of Scotland. In 1603, he attended James to London, on his accession to the English throne, and on 7th July 1604, was sworn a privy councillor of England, and created a peer of that kingdom, by the title of Baron Home of Berwick. He was created by commission in Holyroodhouse, earl of Dunbar, in the peerage of Scotland, by patent dated at Windsor, 3d July 1605, and subsequently became chancellor of the Exchequer in England After this period he had the chief management of James' affairs in Scotland In the beginning of 1606, he and the earl of Mar were sent from court to Edinburgh to have the imprisoned ministers at Blackness put upon their trial, being appointed one of the assessors to the justice-depute on the occasion He regretted to Mr James Melville the employment, and said he would be content to give a thousand pounds sterling to have the king satisfied in that matter, without injury to the kirk, and danger of the honest men who were warded, and desired him to endeavour to prevail with them to make confession, however slight, of a fault, and to come in the king's will, promising to use his interest with his majesty in their behalf He was the principal person employed in procuring the re-establishment of episcopacy in Scotland, and in the parliament held at Perth, 9th July 1606, he carried through the act for the restoration of the estate of bishops. In the same parliament he obtained a ratification of the earldom of Dunbar, and other lands, and an acquittance and discharge of the king's jewels and wardrobe. He was present at the conferences held by the eight ministers with the king at Hampton Court in September of the same year, and when they were called before the Scottish council, the meeting was held at his house. In Calderwood's history is the following entry as to the payment of the ministers' expenses "Upon Wednesday, the 15th of October, the erle of Dumbar sent Robert Fowsie to their lodging, with eight scheats of gray paper, full of English money, knitt up in form of sugar loaves, conteaning five hundreth merks a piece to everie one of them, for their charges and expences in comming to court." [Calderwood, vol vi p. 589] He refused, however, to admit them, on their application, to a personal conference with himself He was present in the convention of the ministry at Linlithgow, in December 1606, and gave great offence by the solemnity with which he kept Christmas in Edinburgh that year In the end of June 1608 he again came to Scotland with a commission of lieutenantry for the north parts, and as commissioner to the General Assembly of the church of Scotland, which was held at Linlithgow on the last Tuesday of July On the first of that month he entered Edinburgh with a great train. In the following month he was instrumental in bringing George Sprott, a notary of Eyemouth, to trial and execution, for concealment of the Gowrie conspiracy, eight years before, and acquired some odium by being present conspicuously at Sprott's execution. In January 1609 he was again sent down to Edinburgh to hold a convention of the estates, and in the following March he assisted at the trial of Lord Balmerinoch (who had been committed to his keeping) for high treason, in counterfeiting the king's writing, and sending letters to the Pope, in his majesty's name, without his knowledge. [See BALMERINO, Lord, vol i. p. 228.] On Sunday the 24th of April he kept St. George's day at Berwick with much ceremony, and at the feast which he made on the occasion was "served as one of the knights of the garter, by lords, knights, barons, and gentlemen of good rank" He attended church in great pomp, "convoyed with lords, knights, barons, gentlemen, and soldiers," and the ceremonies he used in church are specified with great minuteness by Calderwood in his History (vol vii. p. 18.) This must have been his instalment as a knight of the garter, which Douglas in his Peerage fixes to have taken place on the 20th of May He was present, as one of his majesty's commissioners, at the conference at Falkland, 4th May 1609, and about the end of July, he went to Dumfries, where he held a justice-court, and hanged a number of border thieves. He was again nominated one of the commissioners to the General Assembly, appointed to meet at Glasgow, 8th June 1610, and on passing through Newcastle, he was very pressing with Mr James Melville, who was then exiled to that town, to apply himself to please the king, assuring him that he should be as highly advanced as any minister in Scotland, and even hinting that he might be made a bishop. He took him with him to Berwick, where he left him confined, and entered Edinburgh in state on the 24th of May He died at Whitehall 29th January 1611, "not without suspicions," says Calderwood, "of poison However it was, the earl was by death pulled down from the height of his honour even when he was about to solemnize magnificently his daughter's marriage with the Lord Walden (afterwards earl of Suffolk). He purposed to celebrate St. George's day following in Berwick, where he had almost finished a sumptuous and glorious palace. He was so busy, and left nothing undone to overthrow the discipline of our church, and specially at the Assembly holden the last summer in Glasgow But none of his posterity enjoyeth a foot broad of land this day of his conquest in Scotland" [History, vol vii p. 153] "His death," he adds, "bred an alteration in state affairs, sundry of the council, as well bishops as others, went up to court in the month of March after, every one for his own particular" [Page 154] He was buried at Dunbar, where there is a monument to his memory The earl married Catherine daughter of Sir Alexander Gordon of Gight, by Mary, daughter of Cardinal Bethune, and had two daughters, Lady Anne, married to Sir James Home of Cowdenknows, and was mother of the third earl of Home, [see HOME, Earl of] and Lady Elizabeth, countess of Suffolk

In 1776, as we learn from Douglas' Peerage, (Wood's edition, vol i p. 454) John Home, of the family of Wedderburn, descended from David, second son of Sir David Home of Wedderburn, was retoured heir male of the earl of Dunbar, but the service was reduced by the court of session at the instance of Sir George Home of Blackader, baronet descended from John Home of Blackader, fourth son of Sir David Home of Wedderburn, and immediate younger brother of Alexander Home, the first of Manderston (grandfather of George, earl of Dunbar), and therefore, by the law of Scotland, preferable to the de-candents of the elder brother of Alexander Mr Home Drummond of Blair Drummond, Perthshire, as descended from, and heir male of, Patrick Home of Renton, uncle of the earl of Dunbar, and nearest heir male of the latter, has, as such, a ground of claim to that peerage, as the patent grants the title to the first earl and his heirs-male generally. [See HOME-DRUMMOND.]

Sir Henry Constable of Burton and Halsham, belonging to an English family, was in 1620 created Viscount Dunbar and Baron Constable, but on the death of the fourth viscount in 1721, these titles became dormant.

There are five baronetages belonging to families of the name of Dunbar, viz. of Mochrum, Wigtonshire, of date 1694, descended from the second earl of Moray of the name of Dunbar, of Durn, in Banffshire, of date 1697, descended from the earls of March, through Patrick, tenth earl, of Northfield, Morayshire, of date 1698, descended in the direct male line from James Dunbar, fifth earl of Moray, of Hempriggs, Caithness-shire, of date 1698 (see DUFFUS), and of Boath, Nairnshire, of date 1814, descended from John Dunbar, earl of Moray, son of the ninth earl of Dunbar

There was a sixth baronetcy, of Baldoon, county of Wigton, conferred in 1664, but the heirs-male of the first baronet failing, the title soon became extinct, and the estate of Baldoon devolved on his granddaughter and heiress, Mary, wife of Lord Basil Hamilton, and mother of Basil Hamilton of Baldoon, M P, whose son, Dunbar Hamilton, succeeded in 1744 to the earldom of Selkirk

Of the family of Mochrum was Gavin Dunbar, archbishop of Glasgow, and lord high chancellor of Scotland in the reign of James the Fifth, being a younger son of Sir John Dunbar of Mochrum by his second wife, Janet, daughter of Sir Alexander Stewart of Garlies, and nephew of Gavin Dunbar, bishop of Aberdeen, of whom a memoir is subsequently given in larger type. At the university of Glasgow, he greatly distinguished himself by his acquirements in classical learning and philosophy, and afterwards applying himself to the study of theology and the canon law, he became in 1514 dean of Moray In the following year he obtained the priory of Whithorn in Galloway, and soon after was appointed preceptor to the young king (James the Fifth). In September 1524, on the translation of Archbishop James Bethune to St. Andrews, he was appointed by the lords of the regency to succeed him as archbishop of Glasgow, and on the 3d August 1525, was named, with the earl of Angus and others, a commissioner to meet those of England, for the purpose of procuring a peace, and taking order with the marauders of the borders. In 1526, he was admitted a member of the privy council, and was one of the three prelates selected by the king himself "to be of his secret counsail for the spirituale stait" On 15th November of the same year he was chosen one of the lords of the articles for the clergy He was present at the condemnation of Patrick Hamilton the martyr, at St. Andrews, the last day of February 1527, and in the subsequent persecution of the reformers his name occurs as taking a prominent part. After the escape of the king from the power of the Douglases, he was appointed lord chancellor, 21st August 1528, in place of the earl of Angus, and in 1531 and 1532, he was elected a lord of the articles. On the 27th May of the latter year, the first session of the college of justice was begun, in his presence and in that of the king, the office of principal being conferred by statute on the lord chancellor On James' departure for France, to wed the princess Magdalene, he was appointed, by commission dated 29th August 1536, one of the lords of the regency, and about the same time was presented by the king to the abbacy of Inchaffray in Perthshire, which he held in commendam. In February 1539, he was active in the condemnation and burning for heresy of Thomas Forret, vicar of Dollar and others, on the Castlehill of Edinburgh, and soon after, at the instigation of Cardinal Bethune, he condemned Jerome Russell, and a youth named Kennedy, to death at Glasgow, although he himself was inclined to spare their lives. After James' death he was continued chancellor by the regent Arran, appointed a lord of the articles on 13th March 1543, and two days afterwards sworn one of the governor's privy council. The same day, on the presentation in parliament of a writing or bill by Lord Maxwell, for allowing the Scriptures to be read in the vulgar tongue, which the lords of the articles had found to be reasonable, and allowed to be read in full parliament, Lord Chancellor Dunbar, for himself and in name of all the prelates of the realm, opposed its being enacted, and proposed that the consideration of it should be deferred until a provincial council could be called to decide upon it. It was, however, passed, and on 15th December following, he was forced to resign the seals to Cardinal Bethune. His name frequently occurs afterwards in the rolls of parliament. In 1545, when George Wishart was preaching in the west of Scotland, Archbishop Dunbar went to Ayr to oppose him, and occupied the pulpit there, while Wishart preached at the market cross. "The bishop," says Calderwood, "preached to his jackemen and to some old bosses of the town The summe of all his sermon was this, They say we sould preache why not?—better late thrive nor never thrive. Hold us still for your bishop, and we sall provide better the nixt time.' This was the beginning and the end of the bishop's sermon He departed out of the town with haste, but returned not to fulfil his promise." (Calderwood's Hist., vol i. p. 187) In the end of harvest 1545, Cardinal Bethune visited Glasgow, and Knox and Calderwood relate a dispute for precedency which took place between the crossbearers of the cardinal and the archbishop, coming forth or going in at the quire door of Glasgow cathedral, which ended in buffets and blows, and led to a coolness between their masters, and they were only reconciled on occasion of the martyrdom of George Wishart. "The cardinal," says Calderwood, "was knowne proud, and the archbishop was a glorious fool The cardinal alleged that by reason of his cardinalship, he was primate of all Scotland, and the Pope's legate that his cross should not only go before, but also should only be borne wheresoever he himself was. Good Gukestone, Glaikstone. Archbishop Dunbar lacked no reasons, as he thought, for maintenance of his glory He was an archbishop in his own province, bishop in his own diocese and cathedral church, and there ought to give place to no man" (Ibid, p. 198, see also Knox's History, p. 51) In the following February, however, the archbishop attended the summons of the cardinal to be present at the trial of Wishart at St. Andrews. He assisted at the judgment against him, and witnessed his cruel death from the same window as the cardinal. Archbishop Dunbar died on the 30th April 1547, and was interred in the chancel of his cathedral church, in a tomb which he had caused to be erected for himself, but of which no vestige now remains. Spotswood speaks of him as a good and learned man, and Buchanan has celebrated his praises in one of the most elegant of his epigrams.

DUNBAR AND MARCH, AGNES, countess of, commonly called, from her dark complexion, Black Agnes, a high-spirited and courageous woman.

whose heroic and successful defence of her husband's castle of Dunbar against the English, in 1337, has obtained a conspicuous place in the history of the period, was the daughter of the celebrated Thomas Randolph, earl of Moray, regent of Scotland, and the wife of Patrick, ninth earl of Dunbar and March Her husband having embraced the party of David Bruce, had taken the field with the regent, Sir Andrew Murray of Bothwell, and was then absent with him in the north of Scotland. In January 1337, William Montague, earl of Salisbury, besieged the castle of Dunbar with a large English army, and employed against it great battering engines, constructed to throw huge stones against the walls The castle, in some old records called "Earl Patrick's strong house," was indeed very strong, being built upon a chain of rocks stretching into the sea, and having only one passage to the mainland, which was well fortified Before the use of artillery it was almost impregnable, and during the siege by the earl of Salisbury, Black Agnes, in the absence of her husband, resolved to defend it to the last extremity She performed all the duties of a bold and vigilant commander, setting at defiance all the attempts of the English to take the castle. She showed herself with her maids on the battlements, and when the battering engines hurled immense stones against the walls, she in scorn ordered one of her female attendants to wipe off the dust with a towel or handkerchief One of the engines employed by the besiegers was an enormous machine constructed of timber, moving upon wheels, and including within it several platforms or stages, which held various parties of armed men, who were defended by a strong roofing of boards and hides, under cover of which they could advance with safety to the foot of the walls This machine, from the shape of its roof, which resembled the ridge of a hog's back, was termed a sow When the countess beheld this formidable and bulky engine rolled forward to the walls of the castle, so far from being intimidated, she cried out to the earl of Salisbury in derision

"Beware, Montagow,
For farrow shall thy sow!"

At the same time she made a signal, when a huge fragment of rock, which had been made ready for the purpose, was hurled from the battlements upon the sow, and its roof was at once dashed in pieces As the English soldiers enclosed within it, were running in all directions to escape with their lives, Black Agnes scoffingly called out, "Behold the litter of English pigs" It happened that one day when the earl of Salisbury rode near the walls with a knight dressed in armour of proof, one William Speus, a Scottish archer, shot an arrow from the battlements of the castle, with such good aim and force that it pierced through the folds of mail which the knight wore over his acton, or leathern jacket, and reached his heart. "That," said Salisbury, as the knight fell dead from his horse, "is one of my lady's tire-pins. Black Agnes' love shafts go straight to the heart."

The resistance of the countess was so determined that Salisbury, despairing of taking the castle by force of arms, endeavoured to bribe one of the garrison to betray his trust, and offered him a considerable sum if he would leave the gate open, so as to admit a party of English after nightfall The man took the money, but disclosed the whole transaction to the countess It is thought that it was at her suggestion that he had entered into such a treaty with Salisbury, as she was anxious to make the latter prisoner In this, however, she was disappointed At the time fixed, the earl, trusting to the agreement with the porter, came before the gate, which, as had been arranged, he found open, and the portcullis drawn up As he was about to enter, however, one of his followers, named John Copeland, a squire of Northumberland, hastily passed before him As soon as he was within the fortress, the portcullis was dropped, and Copeland, mistaken for his commander, remained a prisoner, while Salisbury escaped Black Agnes witnessed the result of the enterprise from the battlements, and as he retired she called out jeeringly to Salisbury, addressing him, as she always did, by his family name "Farewell, Montague! I intended that you should have supped with us, and assist us in defending the castle against the English"

Turning the siege into a blockade, Salisbury closely invested the castle both by land and sea, all communication being cut off betwixt the garrison and their friends. Alexander Ramsay of Dalwolsy (ancestor of the earls of Dalhousie), who was then concealed, with a resolute company of young men, in the caves of Hawthornden, near Roslin, and maintained a kind of predatory warfare against the English, having heard of the extremities to which the brave garrison of Dunbar and their intrepid female commander were reduced, proceeded to their relief with forty men These he embarked at the Bass, in some boats which he had engaged for the purpose, and taking advantage of a dark night, he contrived to elude the vigilance of the English, and entered the castle by a postern next the sea, the ruins of which are still visible He was no sooner within the fortress than he sallied out, and attacked the advanced guards of the English, whom he drove back to their camp Salisbury now despaired of taking the castle, and on the 10th of June 1337 he raised the siege, which had lasted nineteen weeks The castle was left in possession of Black Agnes, whose courage and perseverance formed the subject of the songs of the minstrels of the time In Winton's 'Cronykill' there is an interesting account of this memorable siege, under the title,

"Of the assege of Dunoare
Where the Countess was wise and ware"

The conclusion modernized may be thus rendered, in the supposed words of Salisbury,

"She kept a stir in tower and trench
That watchful, plodding Scottish wench
Came I early, came I late
I found Agnes at the gate"

On the death of the countess' brother, Thomas, earl of Moray, who fell at the battle of Durham, in 1346, as he had no male issue, she became his heiress, and besides the earldom of Moray, she and her husband obtained the Isle of Man, the lordship of Annandale, the baronies of Morton and Tibbers in Nithsdale, of Morthingtoun (afterwards Mordington) and Longformacus, and the manor of Dunse in Berwickshire, with Mochrum in Galloway, Cumnock in Ayrshire, and Blantyre in Clydesdale. The countess died about the year 1369, leaving two sons, George, tenth earl of Dunbar and March, and John earl of Moray The barony of Mordington above mentioned seems to have been given as a dowry to her daughter Agnes, on the latter marrying James Douglas of Dalkeith, and it continued with the descendants of this Douglas till the Reformation, and eventually gave them the title of Baron Mordington in the peerage of Scotland—a title which became dormant in 1796

DUNBAR, WILLIAM, styled by Pinkerton, "the chief of the ancient Scottish poets," and by George Ellis, "the greatest poet that Scotland has produced," is supposed, from an allusion in one of his poems, to have been born in East Lothian, about the middle of the fifteenth century Laing sets down 1460, and Pinkerton 1465, as the date of his birth Walter Kennedy, in his famous 'Flyting' with Dunbar, represents him as a descendant of the forfeited family of the earls of Dunbar and March, and his biographer, Mr David Laing, conjectures that he was either the grandson or the grandnephew of Sir Patrick Dunbar of Beill, the fourth son of George, tenth earl of March, the only branch of that once powerful family retaining property in East Lothian "This Sir Patrick," says Mr Laing, "signalized himself on many occasions, and was one of the hostages for James I in 1426, and it also appears from an original charter dated August 10th, 1440, that one of his sons was named William, who in all probability was either the father or uncle of the poet. No other persons of the same baptismal name can be traced during the whole of that century, and as such names usually run in families, the circumstance of our author's alleged descent from the earls of March, in connection with his own avowal respecting his birthplace, adds some strength to the conjecture of his being the grandson of Sir Patrick Dunbar of Beil" It is certain that he chiefly resided in Edinburgh, and this is sufficient to account for the allusion to Lothian in his poems. In Sibbald's Chronicle of Scottish Poetry, vol i., page 358, a probability is stated of his belonging to Fifeshire, but as regards the precise place, as well as the exact date of his birth, conjecture, however ingenious, is vainly exercised. Enough that he was born a Scotsman Allan Ramsay was in a mistake when he said in his 'Evergreen,' that his birthplace was Mount Saltone, and Lord

Halles was even farther bewildered when he fixed upon Salton in East Lothian as the place either of his birth or residence Mount Falconn was the place meant, as it stands distinctly in Chapman and Miller's Miscellany, 1508. It is a far-fetched idea to suppose that "Mount Falconn" was intended to mean Falkland Mount in Fife-shire; although certainly the family of Dunbar, notwithstanding their attainder, retained possession of the barony of Kilconquhar, in Fife, until the reign of Queen Mary That Dunbar was intended for the church there can be no doubt In the year 1475, he was sent to the university of St Andrews He is supposed also to have studied at Oxford In his youth he appears to have been a travelling noviciate of the order of St Francis, as we learn from his poem, 'How Dunbar was Desyred to be ane Frier' Modernized into prose, according to Dr Irving's paraphrase, the poet says, "Before the dawn of day, methought St Francis appeared to me with a religious habit in his hand, and said, Go, my servant, clothe thee in these vestments, and renounce the world But at him and his habit I was scared like a man who sees a ghost —And why art thou terrified at the sight of the holy weed?—St Francis, reverence attend thee! I thank thee for the goodwill which thou hast manifested towards me, but with regard to those garments of which thou art so liberal, it has never entered into my mind to wear them Sweet confessor, thou needst not take it in evil part In holy legends have I heard it alleged, that bishops are more frequently canonized than friars. If, therefore, thou wouldst guide my soul towards heaven, invest me with the robes of a bishop Had it ever been my fortune to become a friar, the date is now long past Between Berwick and Calais, in every flourishing town of the English dominions, have I made good cheer in the habit of thy order In friar's weed have I ascended the pulpit of Dernton and Canterbury, in it have I also crossed the sea at Dover, and instructed the inhabitants of Picardy But this mode of life compelled me to have recourse to many a pious fraud from whose guilt no holy water could cleanse me."

How long he continued a travelling friar, or what were the circumstances under which he first became connected with the court, is unknown, but he seems afterwards to have been employed in various embassies to foreign courts, including that of England, in the character, as his biographer suggests, of "ane clerk," it being customary in those days to associate some one of the clergy in such missions, their education enabling them to be of great service in promoting negociations From various allusions in his poetical contest or 'Flyting' with his friend Walter Kennedy, it would appear that before the close of the fifteenth century Dunbar had on several occasions visited the Continent Mr Laing thinks it more than probable that he was in the train of the earl of Bothwell and Lord Monypenny who, in July 1491, were sent on an embassy to France, and that he was left behind in Paris, after the ambassadors had returned in November of that year He seems to have been residing in Edinburgh in the year 1500, in the character of a court poet, for in August of that year he received from the king, James the Fourth, a yearly pension of ten pounds (not so small a sum in those days as it would now be considered), which was the first occasion on which his name occurs in the public records

Towards the close of 1501 he appears to have visited England, and it is conjectured, on very good grounds, that he accompanied the ambassadors who were sent to London to conclude the negociations for the king's marriage with the princess Margaret, and that he remained to witness the ceremony of affiancing the royal bride, which took place on the 25th of January 1502 His biographer has little hesitation in believing that Dunbar was the person then styled "the Rhymer of Scotland," who received £6 13s 4d in reward from Henry the Seventh, on the last day of the year 1501, and a similar sum on the 7th of January following This propitious alliance, which eventually led to the union of the two kingdoms, was commemorated by Dunbar in a poem of surpassing beauty, called 'The Thistle and the Rose' "At this period," says Mr Laing, "Dunbar appears to have lived on terms of great familiarity with the king, and to have participated freely in all the gaieties and amusements of the Scottish court, his sole occupation being that of writing ballads on any passing event which might serve to exercise his fancy or imagination, and thus contribute to the entertainment of his royal master" Several of his compositions consist of supplications and addresses to the king, for preferment in the church, the great object of his ambition He frequently complains that his old age is suffered to wear away in poverty and neglect, while his youth was spent in the king's service In one of these pieces, 'The Petition of the Grey Horse, Auld Dunbar,' he represents himself as an old worn out steed which deserves to be turned out to pasture, and to have shelter provided during the winter In form of an answer, a rhyming order, addressed to the treasurer by the king, is attached to the poem, but whether really written by James or added by Dunbar himself cannot be ascertained It is certain that on the 17th of March 1504, on occasion of his first performing mass in the king's presence, his majesty's offering to him was seven French crowns, or £4 18s in Scottish money, a larger sum than usually given by the king on hearing "a priest's first mass" At Martinmas 1507 his pension was increased to the annual sum of £20, and on the 26th August 1510, by a warrant under the privy seal, it was raised to £80, to be paid as before, at the stated terms of Martinmas and Whitsunday, during his life, "or until he be promoted to a benefice of £100, or above" But that benefice it was never his fortune to receive As he himself says in one of his addresses, "It has been so long promised that it might have come in much shorter time from the New found isle, or over the great Ocean-Sea, or from the deserts of India." He also addressed several poems on the subject of promotion to the queen, who seems to have favoured him, although her power of serving him was not so great as her will He is supposed to have formed one of her train, when she set out to visit the northern parts of Scotland for the first time, in May 1511, as the poem composed by him, descriptive of her reception at Aberdeen, is, says Mr Laing, evidently written by an eyewitness Another of his poems, although of a satirical nature, but interesting both on account of its locality and the curious picture which it exhibits of the state of the Scottish metropolis at that early period, is his 'Address to the Merchants of Edinburgh,' written probably about the year 1500

Some of Dunbar's poems were printed in his lifetime by Chapman and Millar so early as 1508. Among his principal pieces may be mentioned 'The Golden Targe,' a moral allegorical piece, the design of which is to show the mastery of love over reason, 'The Twa Marriet Wemen and the Wedo,' which contains much humorous sentiment and many sarcastic reflections on the female sex, and 'A Dance,' representing pictures illustrative of the seven deadly sins. His 'Lament for the Makars,' as writers of verses were in those days called, written "quhen he was seik," is among those of his pieces which were printed by Chepman and Millar in 1508 In it he expresses his sorrow for the death of all his early friends and brother poets, and for his rival, Walter Kennedy, then lying at the point of death, and he concludes very naturally that since death has all his brethren "tane," he himself cannot be expected to be left "alane," but must of force "his nyxt pray be" He is also supposed to be the author of an exquisitely humorous tale, entitled 'The Freirs of Berwick,' which supplied the groundwork of Allan Ramsay's well-known poem of 'The Monk and the Miller's Wife' In his 'Testament of Kennedy,' in compliance with a practice of some of the poets of that period, he interweaves Latin with Scottish verses in a very fantastic manner It is not certain how or where he spent his latter years His name does not appear in the Treasurer's accounts after the 14th May 1513, a few months previous to the disastrous battle of Flodden, when his patron James the Fourth and the chief part of his nobles were slain Whether his pension was transferred to some other branch of the royal revenue, or he himself was at last promoted to a benefice by the queen dowager during her regency, there is now no means of ascertaining There is but too much reason to believe that, disappointed in all his applications for a church, he died as he had lived in poverty His death is supposed to have taken place about 1520. A complete edition of his poems, with a life and notes, was published by Mr David Laing of Edinburgh, in 1834, in two volumes, and to it, as well as to Dr Irving's Life of Dunbar, I have been principally indebted for the materials for this notice.

DUNBAR, GAVIN, bishop of Aberdeen, one of the greatest benefactors of that city of his time, was, according to most authorities, the fourth son of Sir Alexander Dunbar of Westfield, only son of James, fifth earl of Moray, and Isabel, daughter of Alexander Sutherland, baron of Duffus According to Bishop Keith, however, who seems likely to be correct, he was the son of Sir James Dunbar of Cumnock, by Elizabeth, eldest daughter of the earl of Sutherland, thus, being the nephew, instead of the son, of the above named Sir Alexander Dunbar Of his early studies or pursuits there is no record, but in the year 1488, he was appointed dean of Moray, and he became archdeacon of St Andrews, 18th March, 1503 At the same time he was made privy councillor to King James the Fourth, and clerk register In 1518 he attained to the dignity of bishop of Aberdeen It is said that it was by his advice that Hector Boece, principal of King's college, Old Aberdeen, wrote his History of Scotland About 1530 he erected a stately bridge over the river Dee, about two miles from Aberdeen, consisting of seven arches, which had been projected by Bishop William Elphinstone, one of his predecessors, who died in 1514, leaving a considerable sum of money for the purpose He also completed the building of the cathedral of Aberdeen, which had been begun by Bishop Kinnimund the second of that name, about the year 1357, and had been carried on by his successors In the year 1531 he endowed an hospital in Old Aberdeen for the maintenance of twelve poor men Twenty-one poor men now derive support from the funds of the Bishop's hospital Bishop Dunbar died at St Andrews on the 9th of March, 1532 According to Dempster, he was an author, and wrote 'Contra Hæreticos Germanos,' and 'De Ecclesia Aberdonensi' This latter work Dr Mackenzie takes to be the "Breviary which he caused compose for his church" During the period that this munificent prelate was bishop of Aberdeen, it is stated that he expended the whole revenues of the see in works of charity and beneficence So many, indeed, were the benefactions which he conferred on the city, that, if we except the labours of Elphinstone, it is perhaps true what Dempster states, that he alone left more monuments of his piety behind him than did all his predecessors together A remarkable circumstance is stated by Dempster, that when the Reformers broke down the bishop's monument, many years after his burial, they, to their great amazement, found his body quite fresh, and his vestments entire

DUNBAR, DR JAMES, author of 'Essays on the History of Mankind in Rude and Uncultivated Ages,' published in 1780, was professor of moral philosophy in King's college, Aberdeen, where he died, May 28, 1798

DUNBAR, GEORGE A M, F R S E, an eminent Greek scholar, was born in the village of Coldingham, Berwickshire, in 1774 In early life he was employed for some time as a gardener, but an accident, from the effects of which he became lame for the remainder of his life, incapacitated him for so active an occupation, and his attention was thenceforward directed to literature An assiduous cultivation of the classics soon developed those faculties of which in subsequent years he showed himself possessed About the beginning of the present century he went to Edinburgh, and his attainments procured for him a situation as tutor in the family of the then Lord Provost Fettes He was shortly after selected as assistant to Professor Dalziel, who then filled the chair of Greek literature in the university of Edinburgh, on whose death in 1805, he was appointed his successor, and the duties of his professorship he continued to discharge, with great zeal and ability, till the commencement of the session of 1851 2 An evident devotion to his profession, accomplished scholarship, and great experience, enhanced by other good qualities, contributed to his great success as a public instructor, and peculiarly fitted him to conduct one of the most important classes in the university Of him it may be truly said that his long and unwearied study of the Grecian language and literature strikingly illustrated the truth and force of Dr Beattie's remark, that it was impossible for a man to shine in more than one department of literature, science, or art Professor Dunbar chose his department and chalked out a line of study for himself, in a steady adherence to which lay the secret of the high distinction which he acquired He died at Trinity near Edinburgh, 6th December, 1851, in the 76th year of his age His works are —

Collectanea Majora, and Collectanea Minora, published without his name, soon after his becoming professor

Both of these attracted considerable attention among classical teachers at the time, but have been latterly superseded by more recent elementary works.

DUNBLANE, viscount of, a title in the peerage of Scotland conferred 3d May 1675, on Sir Thomas Osborne of Kiveton, Yorkshire, lord high treasurer of England, (descended from Sir Edward Osborne, knight, lord mayor of London in 1582), and after the revolution created marquis of Carmarthen (1689) and duke of Leeds (1694), and now possessed by his descendant, George Godolphin Osborne, eighth duke of Leeds (1859).

DUNCAN, a surname of Norwegian origin ennobled in the person of Admiral, Viscount Duncan, in 1797, of whom a memoir is subsequently given in larger type The family of Duncan of Lundie in Forfarshire, to which he belonged was a very ancient one, and originally was designated of Seasyde. At what time the barony of Lundie came into the possession of the Duncans is not stated, but we find the family designed of Lundie before 1678 They had also the estate of Gourdie in the same county One member of it, Sir William Duncan M D, an eminent physician of London, married Lady Mary Tufton, daughter of the earl of Thanet Soon after their marriage they went to the East Indies, where Sir William realized a large fortune. On his return to London he became one of the physicians to his majesty and was, in 1764, created a baronet, but the title became extinct at his death in 1774 Admiral Lord Duncan was his nephew The father of the latter, Alexander Duncan of Lundie, provost of Dundee, distinguished himself by his attachment to the reigning family during the rebellion of 1715, and died in 1771 He married Helena, a daughter of Mr Haldane of Gleneagles, Perthshire [See HALDANE, surname of.] The admiral succeeded to the family estates on the death of his elder brother Colonel Duncan, who died without issue in 1793 Two of Lord Duncan's sons died before him in early youth, and he was succeeded in his titles and estates by the third and eldest surviving son, Robert Dundas Duncan-Haldane (the latter name being assumed from his maternal grandmother having inherited her estate) second Viscount Duncan, born in 1785, and created in 1831, earl of Camperdown, from the place where the great victory of his father was gained He married a daughter of Sir Hew Dalrymple Hamilton, baronet, with issue. His eldest son, Adam (named after his grandfather) Viscount Duncan, M P succeeded in 1859 as 2d earl The 1st earl's younger brother, Captain the Hon. Sir Henry Duncan, R N., C B., K.C.H., held the office of surveyor general of the ordnance, and died 1st November 1855

It is remarkable that the crest of the family, now borne over the arms of the earls of Camperdown, is a dismantled ship, intended to commemorate, according to heraldic tradition, the escape from shipwreck of an heir of Lundie, about two centuries since, who, while acting as supercargo on board a vessel bound from Norway to his native place, Dundee, was overtaken by a tremendous storm, in which the ship was dismantled, and with great difficulty reached its destined port.

DUNCAN I, King of Scots, "the gracious Duncan" of Shakspeare, succeeded his grandfather, Malcolm the Second, in 1033 He was the son of Bethoc, (or Beatrice) a daughter of King Malcolm, by Crinan, abbot of Dunkeld In those early times, before Romish superstition and intrigue had introduced the law of the celibacy of the clergy into the church, the marriage of churchmen was allowed, and even down to the period of the reformation the dignity of a mitred abbot was equal to that of a bishop Pinkerton conjectures either that Crinan, Duncan's father, was Malcolm's minister of state, as was then usual for churchmen, who alone possessed such learning as the age afforded, or that his marriage with his daughter took place before Malcolm became king, and he gives a list of all the most conspicuous instances in history, of priests, abbots and bishops holding the highest state offices in the different countries to which they belonged, and of being princes, distinguished military leaders, and chief councillors of their respective sovereigns [Pinkerton's Inquiry, vol ii p 194] The dynasty of Kenneth Macalpine, which for so many generations had filled the Scottish throne, appears to have terminated with Malcolm, who was defeated and slain in a great battle, on the southern shore of the Beauly frith, by Thorfinn, a powerful Norwegian earl, styled in the Orkneyinga Saga the richest of all the earls of Orkney, possessing nine earldoms in Scotland, the whole of the Sudreys, and a large rik or district in Ireland On the accession of Duncan there remained to the Scots north of the friths of Forth and Clyde, only the districts of Fife, Strathern, Menteith, Gowrie, and Lennox, with Athol and Argyle in the north A considerable part of the territories of the northern Picts also remained unconquered by the Norwegians During the whole of Duncan's reign the Scots enjoyed almost uninterrupted tranquillity In 1035, he is said by

Simeon of Durham to have besieged that city without success. In 1039, taking advantage of the absence of Thorfinn in an English expedition, Duncan, with the view of recovering some of the territories of the Scots, of which they had been deprived by the Norwegians, raised an army and advanced as far as Moray, without encountering any resistance. The Gaelic inhabitants of the north, however, had never admitted his right to the throne, although he was a chieftain of their own race, and under Macbeth, the maormor of Moray, they attacked him at Bothgowanan (in Gaelic, the Smith's dwelling) near Elgin, defeated his army, and slew himself This happened in 1040 Macbeth immediately seized the sceptre, which he claimed in right of his cousin Malcolm, and the two sons of Duncan, (he is said to have married the sister of Siward, earl of Northumberland) were obliged to fly The elder, Malcolm, surnamed Canmore, took refuge in Northumberland, while the younger, Donald Bane, escaped to the Hebrides [Skene's Highlanders of Scotland, vol i p 115] The story of the assassination of Duncan, on which Shakspeare has founded his tragedy of Macbeth, appears to have been an invention of Hector Boece Five years afterwards, Crinan, the aged abbot of Dunkeld, was slain in battle, in the attempt to revenge his son's death and obtain the restoration of the throne to his grandchildren

DUNCAN II, King of Scots, was the eldest of all the sons of Malcolm Canmore His mother was Ingiobiorge, widow of Thorfinn, the Norweg in earl of Orkney mentioned in the preceding article Historians generally have considered him an illegitimate son of Malcolm, but according to the Orkneyinga Saga, it would appear that his father married Ingiobiorge, (the princess Margaret, the sister of Edgar Atheling, being his second wife,) and therefore, by the Saxon rule of succession, on his father's death in 1093, he had the best right to the throne In accordance, however, with the Celtic laws of inheritance, which preferred brothers to sons, his uncle, Donald Bane, was considered to have a prior right to it, and by the aid of the Gaelic inhabitants and the men of the Hebrides, among whom he had spent most of his life, the latter was advanced to the sovereignty Duncan had, in 1072, while yet a mere youth, been delivered to William the Conqueror, as a hostage for his father's fidelity in maintaining peace with England, and in consequence received his education at the Norman court By William Rufus he was invested with the honour of knighthood, and retained in his service After the death of his father, assisted by that monarch, and accompanied by a numerous band of English and Norman adventurers, he advanced into Scotland in 1094, and expelling Donald Bane, made himself king By Scottish historians Duncan is usually styled and treated as a usurper, and whether legitimate or illegitimate, he was undoubtedly considered so by the Celtic portion of Scotland, which continued firm in its allegiance to Donald Bane To obtain the support of the native chiefs he unwisely consented to dismiss from the kingdom the English and Normans by whose aid he had succeeded in getting possession of the throne, but no sooner had he done so than the former attacked and slew him, after a short reign of little more than a year, replacing Donald on the throne [Skene's Highlanders of Scotland, vol i p 126] A half-brother of his own, named Edmund, third son of Malcolm Canmore by Queen Margaret, joined in the conspiracy against him, and it is stated that for his treachery he was to obtain a portion of the kingdom from his uncle, Donald Bane At their instigation Duncan was assassinated by Malpedir, maormor of Moern According to William of Malmesbury, Edmund, for his accession to the murder of his brother, was condemned to perpetual imprisonment, and being touched with remorse, on his deathbed he acknowledged the justice of his punishment, and in token of his repentance desired that he should be buried in his chains Lord Hailes thinks that his imprisonment took place after the accession of his brother Edgar to the throne, and infers from this that Duncan was not a usurper, but a regent during the minority of the children of Malcolm, [Hailes' Annals, vol i p 46] but as the condition of Edmund's assistance to Donald Bane's project was a partition of the kingdom between them, it seems most likely that, on the success of their plot, it was the latter who threw Edmund into prison, to avoid fulfilling his part of the infamous compact

Duncan left a son, William, who had also a son named William, called the Boy of Egremont, who after the death of David the First, disputed the claim to the throne of his grandson Malcolm the Fourth, and was supported in his pretensions by the Gaelic or Scots part of the population. The Orkneyinga Saga states that "Ingiobiorg Jarlsmoder (Earl's-mother, or as it has been translated, 'the mother of the earls'), widow of Earl Thorfinn, married Melkolf, king of Scotland, who was called Langhals (Malcolm Canmore, or Great Head) Their son was Dungad (Duncan) king of Scotland, the father of William, who was a good man His son was William Odlinger, (the Noble,) whom all the Scots wished to take for their king" There can be no doubt that this desire was expressed by the only constitutional body then existing in Scotland, namely, the earls of the seven provinces into which the country was at that period divided, (see vol i of this work, page 67) when, in 1160, Ferquhard earl of Strathern, and five other of these earls conspired to seize the person of Malcolm, and place Duncan's grandson on the throne in his stead Winton mentions the Boy of Egremont as being among the conspirators on this occasion, as well as Gilleandres earl of Ross [See Skene's Highlanders of Scotland, vol i pp 261, 262 App]

In Anderson's Diplomata is contained a charter (No IV.) granted by Duncan to the monks of St Cuthbert, said to be the oldest original charter concerning Scotland now known At the commencement of it he styles himself 'Dunecanus filius Regis Malcolumb, constans hereditarie Rex Scotie,' and among the names with crosses subscribed to it are those of 'Eadgari' and 'Malcolumb,' whom he styles his brothers Lord Hailes thinks it singular (Annals, vol i p 45, note) that Edgar should have resided at the court of Duncan; but if Duncan was, as has been shown, no usurper, but the legitimate possessor of the throne, there is nothing surprising in the matter As for Malcolumb, he deems him to have been a natural son of Malcolm the Third, but he was in fact the younger brother of Duncan, by his mother Ingiobiorga, and legitimate. Subjoined is a fac-simile of the seal of Duncan at this ancient charter, which seal is believed to be the oldest extant:

DUNCAN, MARK, an eminent professor of the sixteenth century, was the son of Thomas Duncan of Maxpoffle, Roxburghshire, and Janet, his wife, daughter of Patrick Oliphant of Sowdoun, in the same county A manuscript account, preserved by an English branch of the family, states that he was the son of Alexander, and the grandson of John Andrew Duncan of Airdrie, in Fifeshire, and that he was born in London, but this statement is altogether erroneous His birth is supposed to have taken place about 1570, and it is supposed that after laying the foundation of his great learning in Scotland, he completed his academical studies on the continent, but it is not known in what university he took his degree of M D He was appointed professor of philosophy in the university of Saumur, in France, the chief seminary of the French protestants Here he attained to great celebrity, and by the publication in 1612 of his 'Institutio Logica,' he greatly extended his reputation as an acute and able logician Of this work, which he dedicated to the celebrated Philip du Plessis Mornay, there are at least three editions Dr Duncan married a French lady of a good family, and to his academical labours he added the practice of physic, to his own profit and the increase of his reputation. From King James he received an invitation to England, his majesty transmitting to him, at the same time, a formal appointment as his own physician, but the reluctance of his wife to quit her native country prevented him from taking advantage of so promising a road to preferment. He was afterwards promoted to the office of principal of the university of Saumur, with which he retained his professorship of philosophy In 1634 he published, but without his name, a tract under the title of 'Discours de la Possession des Religieuses Ursulines de Lodun,' (64 pages 8vo) on the supposed possession of the Ursuline nuns of Loudun, on whose evidence, Urbain Grandier, curate and canon of Loudun, had the preceding year been committed to the flames, on a charge of sorcery exercised upon them In this tract Dr Duncan, at some risk to himself, exposed this infamous and cruel imposture He died in 1640, regretted both by catholics and protestants. He had three sons and three daughters. The eldest son, Mark Duncan de Cerisantes, distinguished himself as a scholar, by the elegance of his Latin verses, and as a soldier by his well-tried courage, and he likewise rose to some eminence as a diplomatist In 1641 he was sent as an envoy to Constantinople, and having afterwards entered the service of the queen of Sweden, he, in 1645, succeeded Grotius as her resident ambassador at the court of France After he quitted the queen's service, he renounced the protestant faith, and was employed by the French king to observe the conduct of the duke of Guise, during his expedition to Naples In a general attack on the Spanish posts, he was wounded in the ancle by a musket ball, and died on the 28th or 29th of February 1648

DUNCAN, WILLIAM, an ingenious critic and translator, was born at Aberdeen in July 1717 His father, William Duncan, was a tradesman in that city, and his mother, Euphemia Kirkwood, was the daughter of a farmer in Haddingtonshire After receiving the rudiments of his education partly at the grammar school of Aberdeen, and partly at a boarding school at Foveran, kept by a Mr Forbes, he finished his studies at the Marischal college of his native city, and in 1737 took his degree of M A He was originally destined for the church, but not liking the clerical profession, he removed to London, where he devoted himself to literature. He wrote 'The Elements of Logic' for Dodsley's Preceptor, which was afterwards printed in a separate form in 1752, in which year he was appointed regius professor of philosophy in the Marischal college, Aberdeen He was also the author of a faithful and elegant version of 'Cæsar's Commentaries,' rendered still more valuable by a learned preliminary discourse on the art of war among the ancients He likewise translated those 'Select Orations of Cicero' which occur in the common Dauphin edition, accompanied with judicious explanatory notes He died unmarried, May 1, 1760, in the forty-third year of his age

DUNCAN, ADAM, Viscount Duncan, a distinguished naval commander, was, as already stated, the second son of Alexander Duncan, Esq of Lundie, Forfarshire, and was born at Dundee, of which town his father was provost, July 1, 1731 His mother was Helena Haldane, heiress of Glencagles in Perthshire, lineally descended from Duncan earl of Lennox, who died in the year 1424 He received the rudiments of his education in his native town, and entered the navy in 1746, under his relative Captain Haldane, on board the Shoreham frigate, with whom he continued for about three years He was next a midshipman in the Centurion of fifty guns, the flag-ship of Commodore, afterwards Lord Keppel, then appointed commander-in-chief on the Mediterranean station In 1755 he was promoted to the rank of lieutenant and appointed to the Norwich, a fourth-rate of fifty guns, commanded by Captain, afterwards Admiral Barrington, one of the squadron under Keppel, sent out with troops to General Braddock, in consequence of the various encroachments of the French on the British settlements in North America. He returned to England in the Centurion, and remained on the home station for about three years Appointed second lieutenant of the Torbay, of seventy-four guns, he proceeded in that ship on the expedition sent against the French settlement of Goree on the coast of Africa, where he was slightly wounded Soon afterwards he became first lieutenant of the Torbay, in which capacity he returned to England In September 1759 he was made master and commander, and on February 25, 1761, post captain, when he was appointed to the Valiant of seventy-four guns, on board of which Keppel hoisted his flag as commander of the expedition against the French island of Belleisle In 1762 he served under Admiral Pococke at the reduction of the Havannah

He afterwards accompanied Keppel to the Jamaica station, where he remained till the conclusion of the war. In 1779 he commanded the Monarch, a seventy-four, which was one of those placed under the orders of Sir George Rodney, who sailed with a powerful squadron to the relief of Gibraltar, then closely blockaded by a Spanish army on the landside, and a strong flotilla by sea On the 16th January 1780, the British fleet being then off Cape St Vincent, fell in with a Spanish squadron of eleven ships of the line, commanded by Don Juan Augustin de Yardi, stationed there to intercept Rodney's squadron, which was supposed to consist of no more than four ships of the line, having a fleet of victuallers and transports under their protection Captain Duncan's ship, the Monarch, although not remarkable as a swift sailer, was the first to get into action On being warned of the danger he incurred by dashing so hastily amidst the enemy's squadron, he replied with the utmost coolness, "Just what I want, I wish to be among them" In a short time he found himself alongside the San Augustin, one of the Spanish ships of seventy guns, and much larger than the Monarch, while two others of similar rate and dimensions lay within musket shot to the leeward of him After a short but animated resistance, the San Augustin struck her colours, while the other two ships had taken to flight. The prize was found to be not worth taking possession of, being too much shattered by the Monarch's fire, and as it then blew hard, and the whole fleet was on a lee-shore, its crew were enabled to escape with it. In 1782 Captain Duncan was appointed to the Blenheim of ninety guns, with which ship he joined the Channel fleet under Lord Howe, and in the engagement which took place off the mouth of the straits of Gibraltar in October of the same year, with the combined fleets of France and Spain, he led the larboard division of the centre squadron He was subsequently removed to the Edgar, seventy-four, a Portsmouth guard-ship.

In September 1787 he was promoted to be rear-admiral of the blue, and on a second advancement of flag-officers, in 1790, he became rear-admiral in the white squadron. In February 1793 he was made vice-admiral of the blue, and in 1794 of the white Hitherto his merit had been entirely overlooked by those in power, and although he had frequently solicited a command, he remained for years without being engaged in active service At length, in February 1795, he was appointed commander of the fleet in the North seas, when he hoisted his flag on board the Venerable, of seventy-four guns, and on the 1st of the following June was promoted to the rank of admiral of the blue At this period a large Dutch fleet was collected in the Texel, for the purpose of co-operating with the French general Hoche, who was waiting the first opportunity of invading Ireland, with forty thousand men After a harassing service of two years occupied in watching this formidable armament, Admiral Duncan had the mortification in June 1797, to see the mutiny, which first commenced in the Channel fleet at Spithead and then spread to the Nore, extend to almost all the ships under his command On the 3d of that month he assembled the crew of his own ship, the Venerable, and addressed them in the following simple and pathetic words "My lads, I once more call you together with a sorrowful heart, from what I have lately seen of the disaffection of the fleets I call it disaffection, for they have no grievances To be deserted by my fleet, in the face of an enemy, is a disgrace which I believe never before happened to a British admiral nor could I have supposed it possible My greatest comfort, under God, is that I have been supported by the officers and seamen of this ship, for which, with a heart overflowing with gratitude, I request you to accept my sincere thanks I flatter myself much good may result from your example, by bringing these deluded people to a sense of the duty which they owe not only to their king and country, but to themselves The British navy has ever been the support of that liberty which has been handed down to us by our ancestors, and which, I trust, we shall maintain to the latest posterity, and that can be done only by unanimity and obedience. The ship's company, and others who have distinguished themselves by their loyalty and good order, deserve to be, and doubtless will be, the favourites of a grateful country. They will also have, from their inward feelings, a comfort which will be lasting, and not like the fleeting and false confidence of those who have swerved from their duty It has often been my pride to look into the Texel, and see a foe which decided on coming out to meet us My pride is now humbled indeed! My feelings are not easily to be expressed Our cup has overflowed, and has made us wanton The all-wise Providence has given us this check as a warning, and I hope we shall improve by it On Him then let us trust, where our only security can be found I find there are many good men among us, for my own part, I have had full confidence of all in this ship, and once more beg to express my approbation of your conduct May God, who has thus far conducted you, continue to do so, and may the British navy, the glory and support of our country, be restored to its wonted splendour, and be not only the bulwark of Britain, but the terror of the world. But this can only be effected by a spirit of adherence to our duty, and obedience, and let us pray that the Almighty God may keep us in the right way of thinking, God bless you all!" The whole ship's crew, dissolved in tears, declared their resolution to continue faithful to their duty, and, deserted as he was by every ship in the fleet except his own and the Adamant, he adopted the daring but successful expedient of blockading the passage from the Texel with the two ships, practising from time to time the ruse of making signals, as if his fleet had been in sight, instead of lying ingloriously inactive in the power of the mutineers. This stratagem served his purpose, till some of his misguided fleet joined him, and it was his declared resolution never to quit his post, nor permit the Dutch fleet to pass the narrow channel which he occupied, without the most determined resistance On one occasion, information was brought to the admiral by one of the officers that the whole of the enemy's fleet was in motion to force a passage He immediately ordered the lead to be hove, and on hearing the depth of water, calmly replied, "Then when they have sunk us, my flag will still fly" At length the deluded men returned to their duty, and not long after an opportunity was afforded them of retrieving their conduct and character in the decisive victory of Camperdown

The admiral's ship had been eighteen weeks at sea, and several others had suffered much from recent gales, and were also in need of provisions and repairs Thus circumstanced, the admiral put into Yarmouth roads on the 3d October 1797, to refit and revictual, leaving a squadron of observation on the Dutch coast On the 9th information reached him that the enemy's fleet was at sea. On the 11th at noon he brought them to close action off Camperdown, as they were seeking to regain their port, and gained one of the most glorious victories in the annals of naval heroism At nine o'clock in the morning a signal was made by Captain Trollope, commanding the Russell, 74, that the enemy were to leeward The admiral immediately bore up and made the signal for a general chase, and soon got sight of them forming on the larboard tack "Finding," says the admiral in his despatch, "there was no time to be lost in making the attack, I made the signal to bear up, break the enemy's line, and engage them to leeward, each ship her opponent, by which I got between them and the land, whither they were fast approaching My signals were obeyed with promptitude, and Vice-admiral Onslow, in the Monarch, bore down on the enemy's rear in the most gallant manner, his division following his example, and the action commenced about 40 minutes past 12 The Venerable (the admiral's own ship) soon got through the enemy's line and began a close action, with my division on their van, which lasted two hours and a half" The result was that of 15 sail of the line and 11 frigates and smaller vessels, of which the Dutch fleet consisted, nine of the line and two frigates were taken, including the Dutch admiral, the brave De Winter, and the vice-admiral The English fleet consisted of 14 sail of the line, one frigate, and three or four cutters The number of killed and wounded in this sanguinary battle was near 800 men Captain Burgess of the Ardent fell early in the action, to whose memory a handsome monument has been erected in St Paul's Cathedral This victory, so shortly after the most formidable mutiny that had ever occurred in the British navy had been subdued, was doubly gratifying, by proving that British seamen, after their grievances had been redressed, fought with the most loyal and heroic zeal for their king and country.

Admiral Duncan arrived at the Nore on the 16th of October A patent of baron of the United Kingdom had already been made out, though not signed, for his intrepid conduct during the mutiny at the Nore, but his title was now changed to that of viscount, and on the 17th he was raised to the peerage, by the title of Viscount Duncan of Camperdown and baron of Lundie, to which estate he had succeeded on the death of his elder brother He also received the thanks of parliament and of the city of London, with a pension of two thousand pounds a-year to him and his two next heirs. The commanders were presented with gold medals, Vice-admiral Onslow was created a baronet, and the Captains Trollope and Fairfax, knights bannerets In 1799 he was created admiral of the white His lordship retained the command of the North sea fleet till 1800, when he retired into private life In 1804 he went to London, with the view of again offering his services against the enemies of his country, when a stroke of apoplexy, which seized him while attending at the admiralty, obliged him to hasten down to his family in Scotland. He died at Cornhill near Kelso, on his way home, in August 1804 He married, in 1777, one of the daughters of Robert Dundas, lord president of the court of session, and niece to Viscount Melville, by whom he had several children He was succeeded by his eldest son, created at the coronation of William the Fourth, in 1831, earl of Camperdown A portrait of Admiral Lord Duncan is given in the previous column

DUNCAN, ANDREW, senior, M D , an eminent physician, was born at St Andrews, October 17, 1744 After studying for the medical profession at the university of his native place, and at the college of Edinburgh, in the year 1768 he went on a voyage to China, as surgeon to the Hon East India Company's ship Asia. In October 1769 he received the diploma of M D from the university of St. Andrews, and in the following May was admitted a licentiate of the royal college of physicians, Edinburgh During the sessions of 1774 and 1775 he delivered lectures on the theory of medicine in the university of Edinburgh, in the room of Dr Drummond, and also illustrated the cases of poor patients labouring under chronic diseases, by giving clinical lectures In June 1776, on Dr James Gregory being appointed professor of the theory of medicine at Edinburgh, Dr Duncan announced his intention of continuing his lectures independent of the university, which he did for a period of fourteen years By his exertions, a public dispensary was, in 1776, erected in Richmond Street, on the south side of Edinburgh, in the hall of which his portrait is placed In 1773 he commenced the publication of a periodical work, entitled 'Medical and Philosophical Commentaries,' which continued till 1795, when it had reached 20 volumes He afterwards continued the work till 1804, under the title of 'Annals of Medicine,' after which it was conducted by his son, under the name of the 'Edinburgh Medical and Surgical Journal' In 1790 Dr Duncan was elected president of the college of physicians in Edinburgh, and shortly after professor of the Institutions of Medicine in that university In 1792 he brought forward a plan for the erection of a Lunatic Asylum in the neighbourhood of Edinburgh; and a royal charter having been obtained in April 1807, a building was accordingly erected at Morningside. He was also the projector of a scheme for the establishment of a horticultural society, and of a public experimental garden, both of which objects were at last successfully attained. In 1821 he was appointed first physician to the king for Scotland Dr Duncan died July 5, 1828, in his 84th year Besides various valuable works in medical literature, he occasionally indulged in little effusions in verse, printed on slips of paper, and distributed amongst his friends Of the Royal Medical Society of Edinburgh he was frequently elected president, and he was a member of several medical and philosophical societies both at home and abroad His third son, General Alexander Duncan of Gatonside House, who distinguished himself in India, born in 1780, died in 1859 Dr Duncan's works are

DUNCAN, Andrew, junior, M D, son of the preceding, was born at Edinburgh, August 10, 1773, and commenced the study of medicine in 1787 He received the degree of M D in 1794, and after spending some time in London, he proceeded to Germany, and entered himself a student at the university of Gottingen He next made the tour of Italy and the principal German cities, visiting the hospitals and medical institutions, and becoming acquainted with the most celebrated men in the places through which he passed When he returned to Edinburgh he became joint-editor with his father of the 'Annals of Medicine,' and subsequently re-visited the Continent, when he resided nine months at Pisa and Florence On his return he settled at Edinburgh as a medical practitioner, was elected a fellow of the royal college of physicians, and soon after one of the physicians of the royal dispensary, founded by his father in 1776 In 1805 he became sole editor of the 'Edinburgh Medical and Surgical Journal' His most valuable work, however, was the 'Edinburgh Dispensatory,' published in 1803, and early thereafter translated into the German, French, and other languages By his exertions the chair of medical jurisprudence was instituted in the university of Edinburgh in 1807, and he himself was appointed the first professor He was shortly afterwards elected secretary and librarian to the university, in 1819 he was appointed joint-professor with his father of the theory of medicine, and in 1821 he became professor of materia medica and pharmacy, distinguishing himself throughout by his unwearied devotedness to the duties of his chair, and his unquenchable

DUNCAN, HENRY, D D, the founder of savings banks in Scotland, was the third son of the minister of Lochrutton, Dumfries-shire, in the manse of which parish he was born, October 8th, 1774 His family, both on father's and mother's side, were connected with ministers settled in almost every part of Scotland He was the descendant of a cadet of the family of Charteris of Amisfield, in Dumfries-shire, who being involved in the troubles of border warfare, had, early in the seventeenth century, fled to the Orkney Islands, and changed his name to Duncan At an early age he gave indications of superior talent, and was always fonder of reading than of play Of an imaginative temperament, he loved the romantic solitudes of nature, and in his youth was addicted to writing verses, which were marked more by their vein of humour and sentiment than their poetical merit He displayed also, we are told, at an early age, a considerable degree of mechanical ingenuity He received his early education first at home, under a private tutor, and afterwards at Dumfries Academy, and in his fourteenth year was sent to the university of St. Andrews, where he continued two winters; but in consequence of a letter to his parents from his near relative, Dr Currie of Liverpool, offering to procure him a situation in the banking house of Messrs. Heywood of that town, he proceeded to that place in the summer of 1790 Two of his brothers were already settled at Liverpool, and for nearly three years he remained in the bank to which he had been appointed, but having a strong desire to enter the ministry, he relinquished his situation, and repairing to the university of Edinburgh, joined Professor Dugald Stewart's moral philosophy class, in November 1793. The remainder of his college studies were pursued partly in Glasgow and partly in Edinburgh During his last two sessions in the latter city he was a member of the famous Speculative Society, having been admitted on March 28, 1797, and was a constant associate, among others, of Leyden and Brougham, the latter of whom, then a student in Edinburgh, became a member of the society the same year, and with him he maintained a friendly correspondence as long as he lived. His only essay while a member was one on the 'Influence of Commerce on the situation and relations of Society'

In 1798, he was licensed to preach the gospel, and in the following year was presented by the earl of Mansfield, the patron, to the vacant parish of Ruthwell, in his native county Dr Duncan was one of the purest philanthropists that ever breathed, and on receipt of the presentation he generously surrendered the standing crop on the glebe, fifty acres in extent, to which he was entitled, to the widow and family of his predecessor, an act of liberality which gained for him, at the outset, the affections of the parishioners In the long-continued scarcity which prevailed at the commencement of the present century, he obtained a cargo of Indian corn from Liverpool, where his brothers were in business as merchants, which he sold at prime cost to such of his parishioners as were able to pay, while to the poor among them he supplied it gratuitously At other times, when meal was at a very high price, he has ordered rice from Liverpool, which he furnished to the people of his parish in the same manner Indeed, in seasons of scarcity, his benevolence was unceasing Often, when he had occasion to go into Dumfries, did he load his gig with small bundles of flax and wool for the female portion of his parishioners, and when they had converted it into yarn, he easily found a sale for it when he again returned to Dumfries.

In 1803, when the spirit of patriotism, roused by the expected invasion of the French, became so strong throughout the kingdom that almost every one who could bear arms was eager to be a soldier, a company of volunteers was formed in the parish of Ruthwell, of which the parish minister, at the urgent desire of his parishioners, became captain, and regularly attended the first year's training, which extended to a month. He once, while out on duty, actually preached in a portion of his regimentals, with his pulpit gown over all, in the new church of Dumfries, of which his brother was the minister Feeling, however, the incongruity of his position as a clergyman, he soon resigned his commission as captain.

In November 1804, Mr Duncan married Miss Agnes Craig, the daughter of his predecessor, and while she recommenced at the manse those charitable attentions which, in early life, she had bestowed on the poor of the parish, he was forming schemes of a higher and more comprehensive benevolence He began by instituting a friendly society for the benefit of the working classes This was followed by the establishment of another society, on a similar basis, for the female portion of the parishioners He soon established a parish library, and in 1808 commenced the publication of 'The Scottish Cheap Repository,' a series of tracts addressed to the humbler classes This was one of the earliest attempts in Scotland in the department of popular literature, and its success was extraordinary In 1809, with three other individuals, he started the Dumfries Courier newspaper, of which he was for several years principal editor, previous to Mr M'Diarmid being appointed to its management

Although thus actively engaged, he did not neglect his clerical and ministerial duties It was owing to his active efforts that an auxiliary Bible society was formed in Dumfries, on 25th February, 1810, under the presidency of the duke of Buccleuch, and in 1814 a missionary society was formed of which Mr Duncan himself was chosen first president In the beginning of 1810 he first turned his attention to the erection of an economical bank for the savings of the industrious, and to the working out of such a scheme his three years' occupation in Liverpool as a banker admirably fitted him Particular circumstances connected with the state of the poor of Dumfries and its neighbourhood, and especially a desire to avert the introduction of poor rates, had induced him to publish several letters on the subject in the Dumfries Courier, and whilst engaged in the necessary investigations, he had an opportunity of consulting some books and pamphlets lent to him by Mr Erskine, afterwards earl of Mar, among which he found an ingenious paper giving an account of a scheme proposed by John Bone, Esq , of London, for gradually abolishing poor rates in England, in a subordinate provision of which he found the germ of the idea that he afterwards so successfully brought into operation He immediately published a paper proposing to the county gentlemen the establishment of banks for savings in the different parishes of the district, and containing a sketch of rules and regulations for conducting them He did not, however, confine himself to a mere recommendation in the newspaper, but took immediate measures for giving a proof of its practicability and usefulness by the establishment of a bank, on this plan, in his own parish Its success soon began to attract public attention, and meetings were held in various parts of the country for the institution of similar societies These being for the most part formed in accordance with the Ruthwell rules, Mr Duncan was kept almost incessantly employed in detailing the fruits of his experience, or giving the benefit of his advice An act of parliament being applied for, during the session of 1819, in favour of savings banks, he was invited to London, and the success of that measure was mainly owing to his unwearied exertions in the matter The draft of the bill had originally been drawn up by himself

As an antiquary and geologist, Dr Duncan also acquired some distinction, by the preservation of a remarkable Runic cross, in the manse garden of Ruthwell, a description of which he gave in his Statistical Account of the parish, and also furnished a masterly paper on the subject to the Society of Antiquaries of Scotland, as a corresponding member of that body in the year 1832, for which he received the special thanks of the society, and by his discovery in 1827, of the traces of extinct four-footed animals in the new red sandstone of Dumfries-shire, which Dr Buckland, in a letter to him, declared to be "one of the most curious and most important that has ever been made in geology" In reference to Dr Duncan's merit in this discovery, Dr Chalmers has left his testimony in the following terms: "He was," he says, "not only the first to point out traces of now extinct animals on the strata of former eras, but he at once also appreciated the importance of these traces as geological phenomena."

In November 1823, the university of St. Andrews conferred on him the degree of D D Holding a distinguished name in the church, although he seldom took any prominent part in the discussions of the church courts, he was in the summer of 1836 elected moderator of the General Assembly At the public breakfasts given officially by the moderator he introduced the practice of inviting the guests half-an-hour earlier, to join in social prayer, a practice which has ever since been maintained. At the Disruption in 1843, he quitted the established church, and in the face of many difficulties, commenced a Free church in the neighbourhood of Ruthwell The physical and mental exertions connected with that movement, combined with his advanced age, to exhaust his energies While expounding at a private meeting of his people, he was, on 12th February 1846, seized with paralysis, and died in a few days

Dr. Duncan was twice married By his first wife, who died in January 1832, he had two sons and a daughter, the latter married to the Rev James Dodds, Free church minister at Belhaven The elder son, the Rev George John C Duncan, formerly minister of Kirkpatrick-Durham, subsequently presbyterian minister at North Shields, published, in 1848, a Memoir of his father, with a portrait, and a vignette etching of Ruthwell manse The younger son, the Rev William Wallace Duncan, at one time minister of Cleish, and afterwards of the Free church, Peebles, married Mary Lundie, daughter of the Rev Robert Lundie, of Kelso, an interesting life of whom by her mother, under the title of 'Memoirs of Mary Lundie Duncan,' was published soon after her death in 1840 Dr Duncan's second wife, (whom he married in October 1836,) was Mrs Lundie, the mother of his daughter-in-law, and widow of the minister of Kelso. Besides the Memoirs of her daughter, Mrs Duncan also published a work in foolscap 8vo, entitled "Missionary Life in Samoa, as exhibited in the Journals of George Archibald Lundie, during the revival in Tutuila in 1840–41"

As a popular writer Dr. Duncan acquired great reputation in his lifetime His works are

DUNCAN, JOHN, an enterprising traveller in Africa, was the son of a small farmer in the county of Wigton At an early age he enlisted in the first regiment of life-guards, in which he served with credit for eighteen years About the year 1840 he was discharged with a high character for good conduct. In the voyage to the Niger, in 1842, Mr Duncan was appointed armourer, and during the progress of that ill-fated expedition, he held a conspicuous place in all the treaties made by the commissioners with the native chiefs. He returned to England, one of the remnant of the expedition, with a frightful wound in his leg, and a shattered body, from which he long suffered. With the return of health, however, came a renewed desire to explore Africa, and under the auspices of the council of the geographical society, he started, in the summer of 1844, not without substantial proofs from many of the members, of the interest they took in his perilous undertaking The particulars of his journey along the coast until his arrival in Dahomey, were detailed in letters to his friends, and published in the 'Geographical Society's Journal' of that period From Dahomey he again returned to the coast, having traversed a portion of country hitherto untrodden by any European, but broken down in health, and in extreme suffering, from the old wound in his leg Apprehensive that mortification had commenced, he at one time made preparations for cutting off his own limb, a fact which displays his great resolution All these journeys were undertaken on a very slenderly furnished purse, which, on his arrival at Whydah, was so totally exhausted that he was compelled to place himself in "pawn," as he expressed it, for advances which would take years of labour on the coast to liquidate From that disagreeable position his friends of the Geographical society soon relieved him, by an ample subscription, with which he proposed to make the journey from Cape Coast to Timbuctoo, but the state of his health compelled him to return to England He was subsequently appointed by government vice-consul to Dahomey, for which place he was on his way when his death took place, on the 3d November 1849, on board her majesty's ship Kingfisher, in the Bight of Benin The hopes which were entertained that, from his influence with the native chiefs, and more especially with the king of Dahomey, an effectual check might be put to the slave trade on that part of the coast, were entirely frustrated by his untimely death Although without much education, Mr Duncan was a man of much observation, and strong natural good sense, and under all his trials and hardships displayed a courage and spirit of endurance worthy of all respect He left a widow but poorly provided for

DUNCAN, THOMAS, an eminent artist, was born on the 24th May, 1807, at Kinclaven in Perthshire. He was educated at Perth, to which city his parents had removed shortly after his birth He early showed a love for art by employing every leisure moment in drawing such objects as struck his fancy, especially the portraits of his young companions, one of whom, of the name of Findlater, he portrayed in full length, in the character of MacIvor in Waverley, and this portrait was thought so highly of, that it was exhibited for some time in a bookseller's shop window While yet at school, he painted the whole of the scenery for a dramatic representation of 'Rob Roy,' which he, in conjunction with his school-fellows, undertook to perform in a stable-loft His parents, however, placed him in the office of a writer in Perth, with whom he served the usual term of seven years After the expiration of his engagement, more than ever anxious to become an artist, he at length procured the consent of his father to his visiting Edinburgh, where he was placed under the able instruction of Sir William Allan, afterwards president of the Scottish academy His pre-eminent talent speedily developed itself He made rapid progress, and soon outstripped all his competitors in that most difficult department,—the drawing of the human figure The picture that first brought him into notice was his 'Milkmaid,' and shortly afterwards he exhibited his 'Old Mortality,' and the 'Bra' Wooer' The correct drawing, fine feeling, and masterly execution of these early works gave the most promising assurance of the future excellence of the artist, and his progress, from this time, was one of uninterrupted improvement, so much so as to cause him to be appointed, at an unusually early age, to the professorship of colour in the Edinburgh Academy, and subsequently to the chair of drawing in the same school He was likewise enrolled among the members of that body Having completed an interesting historical work, 'Prince Charles Edward and the Highlanders entering Edinburgh after the battle of Prestonpans,' he sent it, in 1840, to London for exhibition in the Royal Academy, and it at once brought him into the most favourable notice in England An admirable engraving of this fine picture by Mr Bacon, made it generally known In 1841 Mr Duncan exhibited a most touching picture from the ballad of 'Auld Robin Gray,' termed the 'Waefu' Heart,' in the following year, 'Deer-Stalking,' and in 1843, 'Charles Edward asleep after the battle of Culloden, protected by Flora M'Donald.' The latter picture combined, in the highest degree, the great characteristics of excellence, composition, and chiaro'-scuro It was engraved by Mr Ryall In the year last mentioned Mr Duncan was elected an associate of the Royal Academy In 1844 his contributions to the exhibition were 'Cupid,' and 'The Martyrdom of John Brown of Priesthill, in 1685" These were the last pictures by him exhibited in London, excepting a portrait of himself, which, to the honour of the Scottish artists, it may be mentioned, was purchased by subscription, and presented by them to the Scottish Academy Mr Duncan died on the 25th of May, 1845, at the early age of 38 He gave fair promise, had he lived, to have attained a lofty position as an historical painter His portraits were distinguished for faithfulness and skill As a colourist, indeed, he had few superiors As an instructor of his art, he was kind, conciliatory, and anxious for the improvement of his pupils, and in every relation of domestic life he continued to secure the esteem and affection of all around him

DUNDAS, the surname of an ancient family in Scotland, the origin of which may be traced to Helias, the son of Huttred, a younger son of Cospatrick, prince of Northumberland, the grandfather of Cospatrick, the first earl of Dunbar and March

Waldeve, the son of Cospatrick, and brother of Huttred, having, about 1124, granted to Helias, his nephew, the lands of Dundas in Linlithgowshire, the family thenceforth assumed from them the surname of Dundas, derived from the hill of that name, signifying 'the hill of the fallow deer'

"The Dundases," says Lord Woodhouselee, in the Transactions of the Royal Society, "were descended of a family to which the historian and the genealogist have assigned an origin of high antiquity and splendour, but which has been still more remarkable for producing a series of men eminently distinguished for their public services in the highest offices in Scotland."

Helias, abovenamed, was, in the beginning of the reign of William the Lion, succeeded by his son, Serle de Dundas, whose name is frequently mentioned in the affairs of Scotland of that period A subsequent Serle de Dundas and Robertus de Dundas, appear as subscribers to the Ragman Roll. James de Dundas, the tenth from Helias, married Elizabeth, daughter of Sir Alexander Livingstone of Callander governor of Scotland in the minority of James the Second, and on his father-in-law's downfall, he was committed prisoner to the castle of Dumbarton, with his brother Duncan, when his lands were confiscated, but were afterwards restored. He died without male issue in 1450, and was succeeded by his brother Sir Archibald Dundas, who was several times sent on an embassy to England, and was in such high favour with King James the Third that in 1488, he received from his majesty a letter intimating his intention to create him earl of Forth, but this design was frustrated by that monarch's unfortunate death when fleeing from the battle of Sauchieburn soon after He obtained, however, from James the Fourth, in 1491, a grant of the island of Inchgarvie, with liberty to build and fortify a castle thereon, and numerous important privileges attached.

George Dundas, the eighteenth laird of Dundas, was served heir in 1636. He espoused the cause of the parliament in the civil wars, and in 1641, was on the committee for the trial of the gallant marquis of Montrose and his adherents. Subsequently he was one of the colonels in Linlithgowshire for putting the kingdom into a state of defence.

George Dundas, the twenty-third in a direct male line, a captain in the East India Company's service, and commander of the Winterton East Indiaman, was lost at the wreck of that ship off the coast of Madagascar, 22d August 1792. His son, James Dundas, Esq of Dundas, a posthumous child, born 14th January 1793, married 20th July 1818, the Hon Mary Tufton Duncan, daughter of the celebrated Admiral, Lord Duncan, and has a large family

The principal branches of the family are Dundas of Blair Castle, Perthshire, Dundas of Arniston, Mid Lothian; Dundas of Duddingston, Linlithgowshire, and Dundas of Fingask, Perthshire. There is also Dundas of Barton Court, in Berkshire, England, a branch of the latter

The estate of Blair castle was acquired in 1720 by William Dundas, the third laird of Kincavel in Linlithgowshire, who married Elizabeth, daughter of Richard Elphinstone of Calder Hall, by Jean Bruce, heiress of Airth, only daughter of Alexander Bruce, son of Sir John Bruce of Airth, representative of that distinguished branch of the house of Bruce. He joined the Chevalier in the rising of 1715, for which he was imprisoned. He was subsequently obliged to sell the estate of Airth, which his wife possessed in right of her mother, but in the year above mentioned, he purchased the lands of Blair, in the county of Perth, which is now the designation of this branch of the Dundases. His grandson, the present proprietor (1853), Robert Bruce Dundas, Esq, is married, and has a family

The family of Duddingston are now called Hamilton Dundas. Agnes Dundas, the heiress of Duddingston, married, about the middle of the last century, Captain Gabriel Hamilton of Westburn, a cadet of the house of Hamilton of Torrance, and had a son, John Hamilton Dundas, who died in 1820, leaving a son, Gabriel Hamilton Dundas of Duddingston and Westburn He had also John Hamilton Dundas, an officer of hussars, James Hamilton Dundas, and other children.

Charles Dundas, Esq of Barton Court, Berkshire, second son of Thomas Dundas of Fingask, M P for the stewartry of Orkney and Shetland, was for many years representative in parliament for the county of Berks, and on 10th May 1832, was created a peer of the United Kingdom as Baron Amesbury, but enjoyed the honour scarcely two months, as he died on the 30th June of the same year His lordship was twice married, but had issue only by his first wife, Ann, daughter and sole heiress of Ralph Whitley, Esq of Aston Hall, Flintshire, namely, a daughter, Janet, who married her cousin Rear-Admiral James Deans, and he inheriting the estates of Barton Court, assumed the additional surnames of Whitley and Dundas.

Sir John Dundas, of Fingask, in Perthshire, who flourished about the middle of the seventeenth century, was descended from Alexander, eldest son, by a second marriage, of James Dundas of Dundas, eleventh from Earl Cospatrick, with Christian Stewart, daughter of John, lord of Innermeath and Lorn, and aunt of the Black Knight of Lorn. The family having lost the estate in Perthshire, acquired property in Stirlingshire, which they also styled Fingask.

A daughter of Thomas Dundas, Esq of Fingask, became, in 1776, the wife of James Bruce of Kinnaird, the celebrated Abyssinian traveller

The Dundasses of Arniston, several of whom acquired distinction and honours by their legal attainments and political services, are descended directly from the parent stock of Dundas of Dundas. The first of the Arniston branch was Sir James Dundas, governor of Berwick in the reign of James the Sixth, who bestowed on him the honour of knighthood. He was the third son of George Dundas of Dundas, the sixteenth in descent from Cospatrick, earl of Dunbar, by his second wife, Catherine Oliphant, daughter of Lawrence, Lord Oliphant.

His eldest son, Sir James Dundas of Arniston, for a short time one of the judges of the court of session, was knighted by Charles the First on 16th November 1641, and sat as one of the members for Mid-Lothian in the Scottish parliament. Though distinguished for his loyalty, he disapproved of Laud's attempt to introduce episcopacy into Scotland, and was one of those who subscribed the national covenant. On 16th May 1662 although not professionally educated, he was appointed a lord of session, when he assumed the title of Lord Arniston, but when the test declaring all covenants unlawful was presented to the court on 16th November 1663, to be subscribed by the judges, he absented himself, and resigned his seat on the bench rather than sign it. His place, however, was not filled up for eighteen months, in the vain hope that he would be induced to subscribe the declaration This, on being solicited, he refused to do, unless with a clause subjoined, importing his abjuration of the national and solemn league and covenant, "in so far as it led to deeds of actual rebellion" It was then proposed that although, for the sake of example, he should subscribe without such clause, he should be allowed, in a private conversation with the king to explain the sense in which he understood it, but this he would not consent to, making answer that he acted from conscience and would never subscribe that declaration unless allowed to qualify it, "and if," he added, "my subscription is to be public, I cannot be satisfied that the salvo should be latent." He died at Arniston in 1679

His eldest son, Robert Dundas of Arniston, was also a judge of the court of session In 1689 he was elevated to the bench, when, like his father, he took his seat as Lord Arniston He represented Mid Lothian in several of the Scottish parliaments. He died in 1727 Of his eldest son, the first Lord-president Dundas, a notice is subjoined, as well as of his eldest son, the second Lord-president Dundas, and of Henry, Viscount Melville, who belonged to the same family. The latter took his title from the estate of Melville in Mid Lothian, which he possessed in right of his wife, the daughter of Captain David Rennie.

Philip, 4th son of the 2d Lord president Dundas, had, with other children, Robert Adam, born in 1804, married in 1828, Lady Mary Bruce, eldest daughter of 6th earl of Elgin He assumed the name of Christopher in lieu of Dundas, in compliance with the will of George Manners, Esq of Bloxholm Hall, Lincolnshire, and took the names of Hamilton-Nisbet on Lady Mary, his wife, succeeding to the maternal Belhaven and Dirleton estates, on the death of Mrs. Ferguson, in 1855 Mr Hamilton-Nisbet, then Mr Christopher, was sworn a privy councillor in March 1852, on being appointed chancellor of the duchy of Lancaster, an office which he retained till December of the same year He was for some years an M P.

Lawrence Dundas, Esq. of Kerse, of the Fingask branch, was in 1762 created a baronet of Great Britain, and in 1794 Sir Thomas Dundas, his son, was created a peer under the title of Lord Dundas of Aske in Yorkshire. In 1838, Lawrence, 2d baron, was created earl of Zetland, having much property in Orkney See ZETLAND, Earl of.

A baronetcy of the United Kingdom was conferred in 1815 on Sir David Dundas, one of the medical attendants of George III The 3d baronet was a major-general K. I C. S. The 4th baronet, Sir John Burnet Dundas, born in 1794, 3d son of 1st baronet, entered the navy young, and was at the capture of Copenhagen in 1807 Became a rear-admiral in 1855

A baronetcy of Great Britain is borne by the family of Dundas of Beechwood, Mid Lothian, conferred in 1821 The first baronet was Sir Robert Dundas, one of the principal clerks of the court of session, and deputy to the lord privy seal of Scotland, born 10th July 1761, eldest son of the Rev Robert Dundas, minister of Humbie, Haddingtonshire, whose father was a merchant in Edinburgh, and whose next brother was General Sir David Dundas, a memoir of whom is given below in larger type Sir Robert was created a baronet 24th July, 1821 His son, Sir David, 2d baronet, succeeded him on his death, 28th December 1835 Born in 1803, he was admitted advocate in 1840, and was twice married, issue, by first wife.

DUNDAS, ROBERT, of Arniston, lord president of the court of session, son of the second Lord Arniston above mentioned, was born December 9, 1685 He passed advocate in 1709, and in 1717 was appointed solicitor-general for Scotland In 1720 he became lord advocate, and in 1722 was elected member of parliament for the county of Edinburgh In 1725, when Sir Robert Walpole and the duke of Argyle came into power, he resigned the lord advocate's gown On the 9th December 1721 he had been elected dean of the faculty of advocates In 1728 he had the opportunity of displaying his argumentative powers to the greatest advantage, in his defence of Mr Carnegie of Finhaven who was indicted before the high court of justiciary for the murder of the earl of Strathmore At a convivial meeting in the country, where the company had drank to excess, Carnegie having received the most abusive language from Lyon of Bridgeton, drew his sword, and, staggering forward to make a pass at him, unfortunately killed the earl of Strathmore, who had interposed between him and his antagonist with the view of separating them In this memorable trial, Mr Dundas had not only the merit of obtaining a verdict of not guilty for his client, and thereby saving the life of the prisoner, but of establishing, according to ancient practice, the power of a jury, which at that time was questioned in Scotland, of returning a general verdict on the guilt or innocence of the person accused, and not merely of determining whether the facts in the indictment were proved or not. In June 1737 Mr Dundas was raised to the bench, when he took the title of Lord Arniston, and on 10th Sept. 1748 he succeeded Duncan Forbes of Culloden as lord president of the court of session He died August 26, 1753. He was twice married, first to Elizabeth, daughter of Robert Watson, Esq of Muirhouse, and had, with two daughters, a son, the second lord president Dundas, and secondly to Anne, daughter of Sir Robert Gordon of Invergordon, by whom he had Henry Viscount Melville He is described as having been "a thorough bon vivant of the old claret-drinking school of lawyers," and in a note to Guy Mannering, on the "Convivial habits of the Scottish bar," an interesting anecdote is recorded of him

DUNDAS, Robert, of Arniston, second lord president of the court of session of that name and family, the eldest son of the preceding, and half brother of Henry Viscount Melville, was born July 18, 1713 He received the earlier part of his education under a domestic tutor, and afterwards pursued the usual course of academical studies in the university of Edinburgh In the end of 1733 he went to the university of Utrecht to study the Roman law, and, having visited Paris and several of the towns of France and the Netherlands, he returned to Scotland in 1737 In the following year he was admitted advocate, when he early afforded proof that he inherited, to the fullest extent, the peculiar genius and abilities of his family In August 1742, at the age of 29, he was appointed solicitor-general for Scotland In 1746, on a change of ministry, he was obliged to resign his office, when he was elected dean of the faculty of advocates In the beginning of 1754 he was chosen member of parliament for the county of Edinburgh, and in the following August became lord advocate. On June 14, 1760, he was appointed lord president of the court of session, a situation which he filled, for twenty-seven years, with consummate wisdom and ability, and the highest rectitude. He died, after a short illness, December 13, 1787, in the 75th year of his age. President Dundas, like his father, was twice married, first, to Henrietta, daughter of Sir James Carmichael Baillie of Lamington, baronet, and, secondly, in September 1756, to Jane, daughter of William Grant of Prestongrange, one of the lords of session By his first marriage he had four daughters, and by his second four sons and two daughters Subjoined is a woodcut from a portrait of the second Lord President Dundas, engraved by Beugo, in the Scots Magazine, vol. lxiii for August 1801.

DUNDAS, Robert, of Arniston, lord chief baron of the court of exchequer in Scotland, eldest son of the preceding by his second wife, was born June 6, 1758, and admitted advocate in 1779 At an early age he succeeded Sir Ilay Campbell as solicitor-general, and in 1789, when only 31, was appointed lord advocate Though he filled that responsible office at a period of great political excitement, and was the public prosecutor in the trials of Muir of Huntershill, Skirving, and Palmer, in 1793, for sedition, from his moderation and urbanity, he enjoyed, during the twelve years that he held the situation, a high degree of popularity.

In 1801, on the resignation of chief baron Montgomery, Mr. Dundas was appointed his successor, and sat as chief baron of exchequer until within a short period of his death, which took place at Arniston, June 17, 1819 He was succeeded by the late Sir Samuel Shepherd Subjoined is his portrait, from an etching by Kay, vol i part 1

He married in 1787 the Hon Elizabeth Dundas, eldest daughter of Henry first Viscount Melville, and had issue

DUNDAS, Sir David, a distinguished British general, third son of Robert Dundas, merchant in Edinburgh, a scion of the family of Dundas of Dundas, was born in that city in 1735 His mother was Margaret, daughter of Robert Watson of Muirhouse He was first intended for the medical profession, but in 1752 he entered the army under the auspices of his uncle, General David Watson, being appointed to the quarter master-general's department In January 1756 he received his commission as lieutenant in the engineers, and in 1759 was appointed to a troop in the first light dragoons, raised by Colonel Elliot, afterwards Lord Heathfield, with whom he served in Germany In 1762 he accompanied that illustrious commander as his aide de-camp in the expedition sent out against the Spanish settlements in the West Indies, under the command of the earl of Albemarle, and was present at the reduction of the island of Cuba He became major of the 15th dragoons, May 28, 1770, and subsequently lieutenant-colonel of the 15th dragoon guards In February 1781 he was promoted to the rank of colonel, at which time he held the appointment of adjutant-general Shortly after the peace of 1783, Frederick the Great having ordered a grand review of the Prussian army on the plains of Potsdam, Colonel Dundas obtained permission to be present on the occasion, when he laid the foundation of his system of military tactics, which was published in 1788, under the title of 'Principles of Military Movements, chiefly applicable to Infantry' This work was dedicated to George the Third, who directed it to be arranged and adopted for the use of the army, in June 1792 He soon after planned the 'Rules and Regulations for the Cavalry,' which also became a standard work regarding the discipline of the army In 1790 he was promoted to the rank of major-general, and in the autumn of 1793 he commanded a body of troops at Toulon He distinguished himself in the brilliant action of the 10th of May 1794, at Tournay, and in the succeeding disastrous retreat through Holland he bore an active part With the remains of the British army under his command, he returned to England in the end of April 1795 In 1797 General Dundas was nominated quarter-master-general, and served with great distinction in the subsequent expedition to Holland under the duke of York In 1804 he was appointed governor of Chelsea Hospital, and June 1st of that year was installed a knight of the order of the Bath On the temporary resignation of the duke of York in March 1809, he was created commander-in-chief, which situation he held two years About the same time he became a member of the privy council, and colonel of the 95th regiment He was also governor of Fort George and Fort Augustus He married Charlotte, daughter of Lieut General De Lancey, but had no issue He died February 18, 1820

and Anne, daughter of Sir Robert Gordon of Invergordon, Bart., was born April 28, 1742, in Bishop's Land, Bishop's Close, High Street, Edinburgh. He studied at the university of Edinburgh, and in 1763 was admitted a member of the faculty of advocates. In 1773 he was appointed solicitor-general, and in 1774 was returned to parliament as member for the county of Edinburgh, for which he sat till 1787, when he was elected for the city, and remained its representative till 1802 In 1775 he became lord advocate, and in 1777 joint keeper of the signet for Scotland In 1782 he was appointed treasurer of the navy, and sworn a member of the privy council, but the coalition formed between Lord North and Mr Fox having, in the course of a few months, forced Mr Pitt to resign, Mr Dundas also retired from office On the downfall of the coalition administration, he resumed, under Mr Pitt, his office of treasurer of the navy, and from that period took a leading part in all the measures of the Pitt administration On the passing of the act for the better regulation of the affairs of the East India Company, having, on all occasions, displayed a thorough knowledge of Indian matters, he was nominated president of the board of control In 1791 he was appointed secretary of state for the home department, an office which he filled with peculiar vigour and resolution, at a crisis when the democratical spirit diffused among the people, after the outbreak of the French Revolution, alarmed the friends of the constitution, and rendered energetic measures, on the part of government, necessary for the salvation of the empire The plans for the formation of the fencible regiments, the supplementary militia, the volunteer companies, the provisional cavalry, and all that internal military force, which was levied and maintained for the defence of the country against invasion or insurrection, either originated with Mr Dundas, or were promoted and organised under his direction

On the accession of the duke of Portland to office, Mr Dundas was, in 1794, appointed secretary at war, which he remained till 1801, when he resigned along with Mr Pitt. On December 21st, 1802, the Addington administration raised him to the peerage by the titles of Viscount Melville and Baron Dunira. In 1804, on Mr. Pitt's return to power, Lord Melville succeeded Lord St. Vincent as first lord of the admiralty. While treasurer of the navy, he had, in 1785, introduced a bill for the regulation of the money voted for the naval department, prohibiting the treasurer from appropriating any part of it to his own private use. By the tenth report of the commissioners for naval inquiry, instituted under the auspices of the earl of St. Vincent, it appeared that large sums of the public money, in the hands of the treasurer of the navy, had been employed in direct contravention of the act. The matter was taken up very warmly by the opposition, and after keen debates in the house of commons, certain resolutions, moved by Mr Whitbread, for an impeachment against his lordship, were carried, April 8, 1805, by the casting vote of the Speaker On the 10th, Lord Melville resigned his office of first lord of the admiralty, and on the 6th of May he was struck from the list of privy councillors by his majesty On the 26th of June Mr Whitbread, with several other members, appeared at the bar of the House of Lords, and solemnly impeached his lordship of high crimes and misdemeanours On July 9th he presented the articles of impeachment, the charges being ten in number, and on April 29th, 1806, Lord Melville's trial took place, before the House of Lords, at Westminster Hall, when the evidence adduced not directly implicating him in the alleged malversation, but tending rather to involve his deputy, Mr Trotter, his lordship was, by large majorities, declared not guilty on all the charges On the fourth, which concerned a sum of £10,000, stated to have been applied by his lordship to his own individual use, the lords were unanimous in their acquittal He was immediately restored to his place in the privy council, but did not thereafter hold any other public situation He died at Edinburgh, May 27, 1811 He was twice married first, to Elizabeth, daughter of David Rennie, Esq of Melville castle, by whom he had a son, Robert Saunders Dundas, who succeeded him in his titles and estates, and three daughters; and, secondly, in 1793, to Lady Jane Hope, sister to James earl of Hopetoun, by whom he had no issue. In Edinburgh are two monuments to his memory, the one, a marble statue by Sir Francis Chantrey, in the outer house of the court of session, and the other, a column surmounted by a statue in the centre of St. Andrew's square.

Lord Melville possessed excellent business habits, and had great powers of application "His eloquence," says one of his eulogists, "was manly and vigorous, it rose superior to ornament, and was always more intent on convincing the understanding than pleasing the fancy Unravelling with ease the most intricate details, and seizing with intuitive rapidity the strongholds of his subject, he could either convey it to his audience with the simplicity of statement, or impress it on their conviction with uncommon powers of argument and great dignity of language and address His speeches in debate bore the stamp of a mind rich in common sense, in political sagacity, and in the perfect knowledge of life and of affairs In the affairs of his own department Lord Melville was always prepared to supply the fullest information, when the prudence of office permitted the disclosure; and in the bills which it belonged to his duty to propose, he was never anticipated by the suggestions of others, but whenever he chose to adopt them he always improved by making them his own"

DUNDEE, Earl of, a title in the peerage of Scotland (now extinct) conferred in 1660 on John Scrimgeour, third Viscount Dudhope, constable of Dundee, descended from Alexander Scrymseour, standard-bearer of Scotland, one of the heroic associates of Sir William Wallace, and the first on whom the title of constable of Dundee was bestowed, an office which, with that of standard-bearer, became hereditary in his family (see SCRIMGEOUR, surname of). The earl's grandfather, Sir John Scrimgeour of Dudhope, the eleventh constable of Dundee in succession, was created a peer by patent, dated at Holyroodhouse, 15th November 1641, as viscount of Dudhope and Lord Scrimgeour, 'for the good and faithful service done by him and his progenitors to his majesty and his predecessors, for which they were honoured with the heritable title of the king's standard-bearers." Lord Dudhope died 7th March 1643. By his wife, Margaret Seton, of the family of Parbroath, he had a son and two daughters.

The son, James, second viscount of Dudhope, had a command in the Scots forces sent, in 1644, to the assistance of the parliament of England against Charles the First and at the battle of Marston-moor, 2d July of that year, received a wound, of which he died on the 28d of the same month He married Lady Isabel Ker, third daughter of the first earl of Roxburgh, and had two sons and two daughters. The second son, a captain in the army, was killed in a duel at London, by Lord Cranston, in 1661

The elder son, John, third Viscount of Dudhope, was a colonel of horse in the "Engagement," under the duke of Hamilton, in 1648, and adhering to the fortunes of Charles the Second, accompanied him to the battle of Worcester in 1650. Escaping from thence, he joined General Middleton in the Highlands of Scotland, and was taken, with a party of Middleton's troops, in the braes of Angus, by an English force, in November 1654 At the Restoration, in consideration of his services and sufferings in the royal cause, he was sworn a privy councillor, and created earl of Dundee, viscount of Dudhope, and Lord Scrimgeour and Innerkeithing, by patent dated 8th September 1660 He died 23d June 1668, without issue. His countess, Lady Anne Ramsay, second daughter of the first earl of Dalhousie, took for her second husband, Sir Henry Bruce of Clackmannan. On the earl's death, without immediate heirs, the duke of Lauderdale obtained from the crown a gift of his estates in favour of his brother, Maitland of Hatton, depute lord treasurer In 1686 they were bestowed by James the Seventh on John Graham of Claverhouse, subsequently viscount of Dundee, and after his death and forfeiture, they became the property of the earl of Angus, and eventually of Lord Douglas Under the act of parliament for abolishing heritable jurisdictions in Scotland, the duke of Douglas, as constable of Dundee, received £907 7s. 3⅓d. instead of £6,000, which he claimed, as the value of the constabulary rights.

The representation of the family of the earl of Dundee devolved on the Scrimgeours of Birkhill, whose male heir is Mr Scrymseoure Wedderburne of Wedderburne, hereditary royal standard-bearer of Scotland The heritable standard-bearer bore the great standard of Scotland in all wars, where it was ordered to be unfurled The 4th and last Lord Douglas, who died in 1857, was titular constable of Dundee.

DUNDEE, Viscount of, a title in the Scottish peerage, conferred by James the Seventh, 12th November 1688, eight days after the landing of the Prince of Orange in England on John Graham of Claverhouse, renowned for his rigorous proceedings against the Covenanters, descended from John, second son of Sir Robert Graham of Strathearron and Fintry, eldest son of William Lord Graham of Kincardine, (of the same family as the great marquis of Montrose,) by his second wife, Lady Mary Stewart, second daughter of King Robert the Third The eldest son, Robert Graham of Fintry, was ancestor of the Grahams of Fintry and Garvock, and of the gallant Sir Thomas Graham of Balgowan, Lord Lynedoch

John Graham, the second son, had a charter of the lands of Balargus in Forfarshire. By his wife Matilda, daughter of Sir James Scrimgeour, constable of Dundee, he had a son, John, also of Balargus, who acquired, in 1580, the lands of Claverhouse, which became the designation of the family On 8th October 1527, he brought himself under the notice of the law in having, with George Ramsay of Clatty, John Bethune of Balfour, whose daughter Margaret, he had married, James Bethune of Melgum, and others, at the head of about eighty persons, in warlike manner invaded Lord Lindsay, sheriff of Fife, in the execution of his office, in his own court, within the Tolbooth of Cupar, for which he and the others mentioned were obliged to find caution His son, John Graham of Claverhouse, at his death, about 1580, left two sons, William his successor, and John, who obtained a remission for being art and part in the slaughter of Isabella Chalmers, 29th April 1592 Sir William, the elder son, died in October 1642. He married Marion, daughter of Thomas Fotheringhame of Powrie, Forfarshire, and had two sons. The elder, George, died in April 1645 Walter the younger was ancestor of the Grahams of Duntroon, who ultimately became the representatives of the Claverhouse family George had two sons, Sir William, his heir and Thomas.

The elder son, Sir William, greatly improved the family estates, and married Lady Jean Carnegie, fourth daughter of John first earl of Northesk by whom he had, with two daughters, two sons, John, styled "the bloody Claver'se," first Viscount Dundee, of whom a memoir is given in larger type, under the name of GRAHAM, JOHN: and David, third Viscount Dundee. The first viscount married Jean, third and youngest daughter of William Lord Cochrane, eldest son of the first earl of Dundonald, and had a son, James, second viscount, who died an infant in December 1689, six months after his father was killed at Killiecrankie. His mother took for her second husband William, second Viscount Kilsyth.

His uncle, David, third Viscount Dundee, was with his brother at the battle of Killiecrankie, and was in consequence outlawed in 1690, on which he retired to the court of St. Germains, and in 1692, was by King James, the exiled monarch, invested with the order of the Thistle. He died, without issue, in 1700, when the representation of the family devolved on David Graham of Duntroon, who died in January 1706. His son, William Graham of Duntroon, assumed the title of Viscount Dundee, and engaging in the rebellion of 1715, was attainted and forfeited by act of parliament. The last of the family, James Graham of Duntroon, styling himself viscount of Dundee, was forfeited for his adherence to the Pretender in 1746. He afterwards had a company in Lord Ogilvy's regiment in the French service, and died at Dunkirk in 1759

DUNDONALD, Earl of, a title in the peerage of Scotland conferred in 1669, on Sir William Cochrane, of Cowdon, knight, who had distinguished himself by his loyalty, of the ancient family of Cochrane in Renfrewshire (see art COCHRANE, vol i p. 655). About 1640 he possessed the lands of Auchans and Dundonald, in the north west district of Kyle Ayrshire, and was created a peer, December 27, 1647, by the title of Lord Cochrane of Dundonald. In the following year he was sent to Ireland to bring over the Scotch troops there, in aid of the royal cause After the restoration he was sworn one of the privy council, and constituted one of the commissioners of the treasury and exchequer, and on 12th May 1669, was created earl of Dundonald and Lord Cochrane of Paisley and Ochiltree He died in 1686

Of this family the following description occurs in Hamilton of Wishaw's Account of Renfrewshire, compiled about 1710 "This family continued in the male line untill the beginning of the last age (the seventeenth century) that it fell in ane heires, who maried Alexander Blair, son to the laird of Blair, who, changing his name to Cochran, became the father of many children, as Sir John Cochran, who was imployed in severall forreign embassies, his immediat younger brother, Sir William, afterward earle of Dundonald, Sir Bryce; Cornell Alexander; Cornell Heugh, and Gavine Cochrane of Craigmair,—all sensible and judicious men But the two eldest brothers seamed constantly to contend in two cardinall vertews,—the first in liberality, the second in frugality: for whatever the first gott he liberally parted with it, and whatever the second gott or acquired he frugally and nobely improved, for being a gentleman of the greatest accomplishment for manageing affairs that owr nation hath produced, he acquired a vast fortune, which he left to his eldest grandsone, and provided all his other children and grandchildren to plentifull fortunes." It is added in a note, "Indeed the age appears to have beheld with admiration the earl's frugality, and his success has been celebrated as one of three wonders of the shire, namely, 'How Dundonald gathered such an estate,—how Orbistoun spent such an estate,—and how Glencairn lived so handsomely on such an estate.'" [Hamilton of Wishaw's Lanarkshire and Renfrewshire, printed for the Maitland Club in 1831, page 82] The name Dundonald means 'Donald's hill' or 'fort,' and in the castle of Dundonald King Robert the Second died in 1390.

The first earl of Dundonald married Euphame, daughter of Sir William Scott of Ardross, in Fife, and had two sons, William, Lord Cochrane, who predeceased his father in 1679, and the Hon Sir John Cochrane of Ochiltree. The latter in 1683, joined with Baillie of Jerviswood and other patriotic gentlemen, in concerting a scheme of emigration to the American colonies, with the view of escaping from the tyrannical government of Charles the Second in Scotland, and he was one of the deputation sent to London to prepare for that purpose, but while there they entered into the conspiracy for a general insurrection, at the head of which were the duke of Monmouth, Shaftesbury, Russell, and Algernon Sidney On the discovery of the Ryehouse plot, however, the object of which was the assassination of the king, and in which they had no share, Sir John Cochrane and his second son, John (who was forfeited, 9th April 1684, for being in arms at Bothwell Bridge in 1679, when only 16 years of age), escaped to Holland, where they remained till the death of Charles. In 1685, Sir John and his son were in the expedition of the earl of Argyle when he invaded Scotland from Holland, and on the dispersion of Argyle's followers, at the head of a larger force than had continued with that nobleman, Sir John crossed the Clyde, and had a sharp skirmish with the king's troops at Muirdykes near Lochwinnoch, where they beat back their assailants. In the encounter Captain Cleland, a royalist officer, was killed, after which Cochrane's party separated, and every man sought his personal safety by flight. On this occasion the persecuted Covenanters stood aloof from Argyle, and gave no support to his enterprize, not only on account that his declaration made no mention of the Covenants or Presbyterian church government, but that both he and Sir John Cochrane had been themselves implicated in the persecuting measures of the government, Sir John having, in 1680 directed Bruce of Earlshall to Airdsmoss, where Richard Cameron was killed, and Argyle having voted in 1681, for the death of Cargill Sir John and his son took refuge in the house of his uncle, Gavin Cochrane of Craigmuir, whose wife was the sister of Captain Cleland killed at Muirdykes, and out of revenge she betrayed them to the royalists, and they were conveyed to the Tolbooth of Edinburgh, bound and bareheaded, ignominiously conducted by the common hangman His estates were forfeited, but his life was redeemed by his father for a considerable sum He was sent to London, and admitted to an interview with James the Seventh, when his answers to the questions put to him were deemed satisfactory, and in August 1687, he was despatched by the king to Edinburgh, to negociate the removal of the penal laws against the Roman Catholics. After the Revolution his estates were restored to him, and in 1693 he was one of the farmers of the poll-tax By his wife, Margaret, second daughter of Sir William Strickland of Boynton, Yorkshire, (one of Cromwell's lords of parliament) he had two sons and a daughter The eldest son, William, married Lady Mary Bruce, eldest daughter of Alexander, second earl of Kincardine, and heir of her brother Alexander, third earl, on whose death unmarried, in November 1705, she claimed that title, but without success. They had nine sons and four daughters Thomas, the seventh son, became eighth earl of Dundonald

William Lord Cochrane, the elder son of the first earl, had married, in 1658, Lady Catherine Kennedy, second daughter of the sixth earl of Cassillis, and had, with three daughters, four sons. John, the eldest, became second earl. The second son, William Cochrane of Kilmaronock was member for Ren frew in the Scottish parliament, to which, on 17th July 1695, he presented a petition, requesting reparation for losses sustained by him from the rebels, when his case was ordered to be recommended to the king. In 1708, he was chosen for the county of Dumbarton. He was one of the heads of the cavalier party, and warmly opposing the Union, encouraged the people to have recourse to arms to defeat that measure. In 1708 he was elected a member of the imperial parliament for the Wigton burghs, and rechosen at the general election in 1710. In the following year he was appointed joint-keeper of the signet, along with Sir Alexander Erskine, lord lyon, and John Pringle of Haning. He died in 1717 By his wife, Lady Grisel Graham, third daughter of the second marquis of Montrose, he had a son, Thomas, who succeeded as sixth earl of Dundonald, of whom afterwards, and five daughters.

Lord Cochrane's eldest son, John, succeeded as second earl, on the death of his grandfather in 1686, and died 16th May, 1690 By his countess, Lady Susan Hamilton, (afterwards marchioness of Tweeddale,) second daughter of William and Anne, duke and duchess of Hamilton, he had two sons, William, third earl of Dundonald, who died, unmarried, 19th November 1705, and John, fourth earl. At the keenly contested election of sixteen representative peers, 17th June, 1708, the fourth earl voted, though under age, but his votes were set aside by the House of Lords, on account of his minority At the general election of 1713, he was himself chosen one of the Scots representative peers, and by Queen Anne was constituted colonel of the 4th or Scottish troop of horse guards (reduced in 1747), and continued in that command till 1719 He died 5th June 1720 He married, first, Lady Anne Murray, second daughter of the first earl of Dunmore, by whom he had a son, William, fifth earl, and three daughters, celebrated for their beauty by the elegant Hamilton of Bangour, in his pleasing verses to Lady Mary Montgomerie, namely, 1 Lady Ann, married 14th February 1723, to the fifth duke of Hamilton, and died 14th August 1724, in her eighteenth year, leaving a son, James, sixth duke of Hamilton; 2 Lady Susan, married to the sixth earl of Strathmore, who was killed by Carnegie of Finhaven, in May 1728, without issue, and in 1745, she married, secondly, Mr George Forbes, her factor, by whom she had a daughter, and 3 Lady Catherine, married to Alexander, sixth earl of Galloway, and had a numerous issue. The earl's first wife having died in 1711, his lordship married, secondly, in 1715, Lady Mary Osborne, dowager duchess of Beaufort, second daughter of Peregrine second duke of Leeds, without issue.

William, fifth earl of Dundonald, the only son, succeeded his father in 1720, and died unmarried, 27th January 1725, in his seventeenth year He was succeeded in his unentailed property by his nephew, James, duke of Hamilton, and in his titles and entailed estates by his cousin, Thomas Cochrane, son of William Cochrane of Kilmaronock, second son of William, Lord Cochrane, as above mentioned.

Thomas, sixth earl, born in 1702, was in his 24th year when he succeeded to the titles of his family He died at the abbey of Paisley, 28th May 1737, in his 35th year By his wife, Catherine, second daughter of Lord Basil Hamilton of Baldoon, he had two daughters and two sons.

The elder son, William, seventh earl, had his horse shot under him at the Westport of Edinburgh, 27th October 1745, by a gun fired from the castle while the rebels were in possession of the capital In 1750, he was captain in Stewart's Scots regiment in the service of the states of Holland, but afterwards entering the British service, in 1757 he had a company in the 17th regiment of foot. The same year he accompanied General Forbes to America, and was killed at the siege of Louisbourg, in a sortie made by a drunken party of the garrison of that place, 9th July 1758. Dying unmarried, the title devolved upon Thomas Cochrane of Culross, grandson of the Hon. Sir John Cochrane of Ochiltree, second son of the first earl

Thomas, eighth earl, was a major in the army He was chosen M P for the county of Renfrew at the general election in 1722, and on 17th April 1730, was appointed one of the commissioners of excise in Scotland. On 3d April 1761, three years after succeeding to the earldom, he resigned his seat at the board of excise in favour of his youngest brother, Basil. This gentleman was the eighth son of William Cochrane of Ochiltree. A full length portrait of him is given in one of the etchings by Kay, in which he appears a tall straight personage. He entered the army at an early period, and rose to the rank of captain in the 44th or Lee's regiment of foot, with which he was present at the battle of Prestonpans in 1745 Being taken prisoner by the Highlanders, he was marched to Edinburgh with the other prisoners of war The officers were liberated on their parole not to depart from the city nor correspond with the enemies of the prince. He subsequently for some time held the office of deputy-governor of the Isle of Man, under the duke of Athol. On the resignation of his brother, the earl, as stated, he was, in 1761, appointed one of the commissioners of excise, and on 9th May 1764 was advanced to the board of customs. He died, unmarried, at Dalry, near Edinburgh, 2d October 1788. His brother, the eighth earl, had died at his seat of La Mancha, Peeblesshire, nearly ten years before, namely, on 27th June 1778. The earl was twice married. By his first wife he had a son, William, and a daughter Lady Grisel, who both died young By his second wife, Jane, eldest daughter of Archibald Stuart of Torrance, Lanarkshire, he had one daughter and twelve sons. The eldest of these having died young, Archibald, the second son, became ninth earl of Dundonald

The Hon Charles Cochrane, the third son, a major in the English army in America, was sent with despatches from Sir Henry Clinton to Lord Cornwallis, then besieged in New York, and passed in an open boat undiscovered through the French fleet. For such intrepid conduct, he was made one of his lordship's aides-de-camp, but a day or two thereafter his head was shot off by a cannon-ball, before the surrender of the army, on 18th October 1781

The fourth son, the Hon John Cochrane, was deputy commissary to the forces in North Britain The Hon and Rev James Athol Cochrane, the fifth son, vicar of Mansfield in the county of Nottingham, and afterwards rector of Longhoraley in Northumberland, was author of the following works 'Sermon on Matt. x. 16,' 1777, 4to, 'On the existence of a Deity, a Sermon on Rom i. 20,' 1780, 8vo, 'Plan for recruiting the British Navy,' Lond. 1779, 4to, 'Thoughts concerning the Proper Constitutional Principles of Manning and Recruiting the Royal Navy and Army,' Lond. 1791, 4to, Thoughts concerning the Uses of Clay Marl, as Manure On the Uses of Agriculture Salts On Decomposing Pit-Coal, Wood, Peat, Soda, and Reeds for Manure, also on Coal Tar, &c.' Lond 1805, 8vo, 'A Letter, addressed to the Right Hon. Wm Pitt, concerning the establishment of a Provision for Soldiers and Sailors. Lond. 1805, 8vo.

The Hon Basil Cochrane, the sixth son, was placed on the Madras civil establishment in 1769, and on his return to Britain in May 1807 he purchased the barony of Auchterarder in Perthshire. He published the following works 'An Improvement in the Mode of Administering the Vapour Bath, and in the Apparatus connected with it with Plans and Estimates of fixed and Portable Baths for Hospitals and Private Houses, and some Practical Suggestions on the Efficacy of Vapour in Application to Various Diseases in the Human Frame, and as it may be beneficial to the Veterinary Art of Medicine.' Plates. Lond. 1809, 4to; 'Addenda, in which the Apparatus is given on a reduced Scale, for the Accommodation of Private Families and the Public in general.' 2 Plates. London, 1810, 4to.

Sir Alexander Forrester Inglis Cochrane, the ninth son, a distinguished naval officer, was born April 22, 1758. Having early entered the navy, in 1778 he attained the rank of lieutenant, and served as signal officer to Sir George Rodney in the action with Mons. de Guichen, April 17, 1780, when his name was returned among the wounded. In 1782 he was made post captain, and after some years of retirement during the peace, he was, in 1790, appointed to the Hind, a small frigate, which he continued to command until after the commencement of hostilities against the French republic. In the spring and summer of 1793, he captured no less than eight of the enemy's privateers, mounting upwards of eighty guns. After serving for several years on the coast of America, where he also captured several privateers, he was appointed in February 1799, to the Ajax, of eighty guns. He afterwards served on the coast of Egypt. In April 1804, he was advanced to the rank of rear-admiral, and in 1805 assumed the command of the Leeward Islands station Early in 1806 Vice-admiral Sir John Duckworth arrived in the West Indies, in search of a French squadron which, under the command of Admiral de Siegle, had sailed from Brest for the relief of St. Domingo. Forming a junction with Rear-admiral Cochrane, they proceeded to that place, where, February 6th, 1806, they obtained a complete victory over the enemy On this occasion Admiral Cochrane sustained the brunt of the action, and was exposed to imminent danger, having his hat blown off by the wind of a cannon ball. For his share in this important achievement his majesty created him a knight of the Bath on the 20th of March; he also received the thanks of both houses of parliament, and of the corporation of London, the latter accompanied with the freedom of the city, and a sword of a hundred guineas' value. The under-writers at Barbadoes presented him with a piece of plate valued at five hundred pounds, and the committee of the Patriotic Fund at Lloyd's, with a vase worth three hundred pounds. He manifested great prudence and fortitude in not attacking the squadron of Admiral Villiamez in the West Indies in June of the same year, the French force being too superior to justify an engagement. In the course of 1807, Sir Alexander shifted his flag to the Bellesle, 74, and assisted in reducing the Danish islands of St. Thomas, St. John, and St. Croix, also of Guadaloupe On the 14th April 1809, the thanks of the House of Commons were voted to him for his able and meritorious direction of the naval force in effecting the conquest of Martinique. In 1810 he was appointed governor and commander-in-chief of Guadaloupe and its dependencies. In 1813 he was selected to the command of the fleet on the coast of North America, where he declared the ports of the United States under blockade. Promoted to the full rank of admiral in 1819, he was commander-in-chief at Plymouth from 1821 to 1824 He died suddenly at Paris, January 26, 1832, leaving three sons and two daughters. His eldest son, Vice-admiral Sir Thomas John Cochrane, K.C.B., was commander-in-chief on the East Indian station from 1842 to 1846. Sir Thomas' son, Alexander Dundas Ross Wishart Baillie Cochrane, Esq of Lamington, Lanarkshire, M P for Honiton (1866), is author of the following works, viz. 'The Morea,' London, 1840, 8vo; 'The Meditations of Other Days,' 1841; 'The State of Greece, a pamphlet, London, 1847; 'Ernest Vane,' London, 1849, 2 vols. 8vo; 'Lucille Belmont,' London, 1849, 3 vols. 8vo; 'Young Italy,' London, 1851, 12mo; 'Florence the Beautiful,' London, 1854, 2 vols. 8vo, 'Justice to Scotland,' a pamphlet, Edin and Lond., 1854. (see vol. i p. 164, article BAILLIE.)

The Hon. Andrew Cochrane, the twelfth and youngest son, at one time governor of Dominica, married Lady Georgina Hope Johnstone, third daughter of third earl of Hopetoun, and assumed the name of Johnstone in addition to his own. She died in September 1797, and he married again, at Martinique, Madame Godet, a French lady

Archibald, ninth earl of Dundonald, born January 1, 1748, in 1764 obtained a cornet's commission in the 3d dragoons. He soon, however, quitted the army for the navy, and served as a midshipman under Captain Stair Douglas. He was afterwards stationed on board a vessel on the coast of Guinea as an acting lieutenant. On the death of his father, June 27, 1778, he succeeded to the family titles. He then determined to devote himself entirely to scientific pursuits. While on the coast of Africa, he had perceived that vessels were subject to be worm-eaten in a very short space of time, and he conceived the idea of laying them over with an extract from coal, in the shape of tar, which he thought would prove a sufficient protection. After a variety of trials, this was at length found to answer Warehouses and buildings for carrying on the process were accordingly erected at Newcastle, and in 1785 his lordship obtained an act of parliament for vesting in him and his assignees, for twenty years, the sole use and property of his discovery, for which he had previously procured a patent. The general adoption of copper sheathing, however, rendered the speculation abortive, and Lord Dundonald sustained a considerable loss by his invention. In 1801 his lordship obtained a patent 'For a Method of Preparing a Substitute for Gum Senegal and other Gums, extensively employed in certain Branches of Manufacture.' His preparation was to be formed from lichens, from hemp or flax, and the bark of the willow and lime. In 1808 he received another patent, 'For Methods of preparing Hemp and Flax, so as materially to aid the Operation of the Tools called Hackles, in the Division of the Fibre.' As this plan was found to lessen the danger of mildew in sailcloth, it was more generally adopted, although it did not prove more profitable than Lord Dundonald's other inventions. The latter years of this nobleman, so eminent for his scientific research, were embittered by poverty and misfortune. He had been compelled to part with his estates, including Culross abbey, which was bought by the late Sir Robert Preston. At one period he was offered, by an English company, an annuity of between five and six thousand a-year to surrender his coal-tar patent to them, but unluckily for himself he rejected the offer He died at Paris, July 1, 1831, at the advanced age of 83 years. His lordship was thrice married, first on 17th October 1774, to Anne, second daughter of Captain James Gilchrist of Annsfield, R.N, by whom he had six sons, the eldest of whom was the celebrated Admiral Lord Cochrane, secondly, to Isabella, daughter of Samuel Raymond, Esq. of Bekhamp in Essex, and widow of John Mayne, Esq. of Teffont, Wiltshire, and thirdly, to Anna Maria Plowden, daughter of Francis Plowden, Esq, author of a History of Ireland. The latter, on her father's account, had a small pension from the crown, which died with her, and after her death the earl was assisted by the Literary Fund Society, as appears from the annual address of the Registrars in 1823 His lordship published several useful tracts and pamphlets, a list of which is subjoined:

The Present State of the Manufacture of Salt explained, and a new mode suggested for refining British Salt, so as to render it equal or superior to the finest Foreign Salt. Lond. 1785, 8vo.

Account of the qualities and uses of Coal Tar, and Coal Varnish. Lond. 1785, 8vo.

Memorial and Petition to the Court of Directors of the East India Company 1786, 4to.

A Treatise, showing the intimate Connexion that subsists between Agriculture and Chemistry; addressed to the Cultivators of the Soil, to the Proprietors of Fens and Mosses in Great Britain and Ireland; and to the Proprietors of West India Estates. Lond. 1795, 4to.

The Principles of Chemistry applied to the improvement of the practice of Agriculture. 1799, 4to.

The eldest son, Thomas, tenth earl, better known by the title of Lord Cochrane, was born December 14, 1775, and entered the navy in his tenth year under the immediate protection of his uncle, Sir Alexander Forrester Inglis Cochrane. In 1799, while lieutenant in Lord Keith's flag-ship, the Queen Charlotte, he was intrusted with the admiral's cutter, and sent to relieve the Lady Nelson in the Bay of Algesiras, that ship being then surrounded and attacked by French privateers and Spanish gunboats, when he chased the privateers under the cannon of the harbour For his conduct on this occasion Lord Keith made him master and commander of the Speedy sloop, of fourteen guns. In this vessel he made numerous captures. An extraordinary display of courage, while commanding the Speedy, was in the attack and capture by boarding of the Spanish frigate, Gamo, of thirty-two guns, off Barcelona, on the 6th May, 1801 In the same vessel he succeeded in cutting out a Spanish convoy at Oropeso, lying under the protection of a strong battery and numerous gunboats. Soon after, however, the Speedy was captured by the French squadron, under the command of Admiral Linois, but in consequence of the engagement which took place in Algesiras Bay, between Sir James Saumarez and Linois, on the 6th of July, he soon recovered his liberty In the ten months that he had commanded the Speedy, he had taken thirty-three vessels, mounting in all one hundred and twenty-eight guns. He received his rank as post-captain, on the 8th August, 1801, for the capture of the Spanish frigate the Gamo. In October 1803, soon after the commencement of hostilities, his lordship was appointed to the Arab, and in the following year to the Pallas frigate, of thirty-two guns. In the latter ship he proceeded to the Newfoundland station, but remained there only a short time. Early in 1805 he was sent out with despatches to his uncle Sir Alexander Cochrane, who was at that time employed in the blockade of Ferrol This was shortly after the rupture with Spain, and as Lord Cochrane was employed in cruising off the Spanish coast, he had the good fortune to make a considerable number of prizes. Amongst others the capture of the Fortuna, bound from Rio de la Plata to Corunna, and laden with specie to the amount of £150,000, besides a considerable quantity of merchandise, is particularly mentioned. Early in April 1806, the Pallas was employed in the Gironde, a river very difficult of navigation, and at this time he succeeded in cutting out the Tapageuse corvette of fourteen long twelve-pounders and ninety-five men, notwithstanding she lay twenty miles above the Cordovan shoals, under the protection of two heavy batteries. Between the 13th December 1806 and the 7th of January 1807 his lordship took and destroyed fifteen ships of the enemy In the Imperieuse frigate, he next served off the coast of Languedoc, where in September 1808 he blew up the then newly-constructed semaphoric telegraphs at Bourdique, La Pinede, St. Maguire, Frontignan, Canet, and Foy, together with the houses attached, fourteen barracks of the gens-d'armes, a battery, and the strong tower upon the lake of Frontignan. In 1809 he served at the defence of Rosas and on the coast of Catalonia. On the 10th of April of that year he assisted in the attack on the French fleet, then blockaded by Lord Gambier, in the Basque roads, and personally conducted the explosion ship, and for his services on this occasion he was made a knight of the Bath. He had been returned to parliament first for Honiton and afterwards for Westminster, and as he intimated his intention to oppose a vote of thanks proposed by government to Lord Gambier, who had had the chief command in the Basque roads affair, that nobleman was subjected to a court-martial, but was acquitted His own prospects of preferment were ruined by his constant opposition to the ministry, and by the stock-jobbing transaction of 1814 Early in that year a false report was spread that Napoleon had fallen, by which means the prices of the English funds suddenly rose, when Lord Cochrane and several of his friends availed themselves of the opportunity to sell out to a large amount, and the evidence against them being concerned in propagating the report was such that a jury found them guilty of fraud. His lordship was sentenced to a heavy fine, to a year's imprisonment, and to stand in the pillory He was deprived of his title of knight of the Bath of his rank in the navy, and expelled from the House of Commons. The pillory was remitted. The electors of Westminster returned him again as their representative He broke out of prison and appeared again in the house. In 1818 he accepted the command of the fleet of the South American state of Chili, then contending for its national independence. Here his flag was ever triumphant, and he materially contributed to the success of the cause, particularly by the taking of Valdivia, the last stronghold left to the Spaniards. His cutting out of the Esmeralda frigate from under the guns of the castle of Callao, was an exploit unsurpassed by any of his former deeds of daring Subsequently he was in the service of the Brazils, the emperor of which, Don Pedro, created him marquis of Marenham in 1823 In 1830, on the accession of the whigs to power, he was restored to his rank in the British navy, from a feeling that he had been the victim of party spirit. He succeeded his father as earl of Dundonald in 1831 In 1847 he became a vice-admiral of the Red, and from 1848 to 1851 was commander-in-chief on the North American and West Indian station Rear-admiral of the United Kingdom 1854, admiral of the Red, 1858 The earl was also a baronet of Scotland and Nova Scotia (1673), G C B (1847), Grand Cross of the Imperial Brazilian order of the Cruzero; knight of the royal order of the Saviour of Greece, and of the order of Merit of Chili. Of great scientific attainments, Lord Dundonald was long in possession of some extraordinary submarine method for blowing up ships, and during the war in the Crimea, he offered to the British government to destroy Sebastopol in a few hours by a plan of his own, but his offer was rejected Besides an 'Address to his Constituents of Westminster,' 1815, 8vo he published a 'Narrative of Services in the Liberation of Chili, Peru, and Brazil' 2 vols. 1839, 8vo, and his 'Autobiography' 2 vols. 1859 His brother, the Hon Basil Cochrane, lieut.-col. 80th foot, went a volunteer with his lordship in the Imperieuse at Basque Roads in April 1809 Another brother, the Hon William Erskine Cochrane captain 15th dragoons, served under Sir John Moore in Spain, while a third, the Hon. Archibald Cochrane, also in the navy, distinguished himself under his lordship in the Mediterranean in 1801 He had the rank of master and commander in 1805, and of captain in 1806, and commanded the Fox frigate in the East Indies.

The tenth earl died Oct 31, 1860 He m. the daughter of Thomas Barnes, Esq of Essex, issue, four sons and a daughter His eldest son, Thomas Barnes, Lord Cochrane, born in 1814, succeeded as 11th earl He m. in 1847, 2d dr of MacKinnon of MacKinnon; issue, 2 sons and 4 drs.

Capt. John Dundas Cochrane, R N, an eccentric pedestrian traveller, nephew of the tenth earl, proceeded on foot through France, Spain, and Portugal, and afterwards through Russia and Siberia, to the extremity of Kamschatka. At the seaport of St. Peter and St. Paul, at the end of the Kamschatka Peninsula, he married a young lady, a native of Bolcheretsk, the ancient capital of that country He subsequently engaged in some of the mining companies in South America, and died in 1825 at Columbia. He published a 'Narrative of a Pedestrian Journey through Russia and Siberian Tartary, from the frontiers of China to the Frozen Sea and Kamschatka,' 2 vols. 8vo. London, 1824.

DUNFERMLINE, Earl of, a title in the Scottish peerage, now extinct, conferred in 1606, on Alexander Seton, one of the most eminent lawyers of his time, third son of George, sixth Lord Seton, and brother of Robert, first earl of Winton, [see WINTON, Earl of] by Isobel, daughter of Sir William Hamilton of Sanquhar He was born about 1555 Originally intended for the church, he went to Rome in his youth, and was admitted a student in the college of Jesuits. In his sixteenth year he delivered, with great applause, in the Pope's chapel in the Vatican, in presence of Gregory the Thirteenth and the assembled cardinals and prelates, an oration of his own composition, 'De Ascensione Domini.' According to Spotswood, he took holy orders, and Scot of Scotstarvet, in his 'Staggering State of Scots Statesmen,' says, that his chalice wherewith he said mass, at his return to Scotland was sold in Edinburgh. While at Rome he obtained from Queen Mary the priory of Pluscardine, of which his father had been economus and commissioner, since 17th April 1561 The establishment of the reformed religion in Scotland induced him to abandon his design of continuing in the church, and betake himself to the study of the civil law, and for that purpose he went to France, where he remained for several years. On his return to Scotland he continued his legal studies, and at length passed advocate. With King James the Sixth he was in high favour, and on 27th January 1583, he was appointed one of the extraordinary lords of session, when he took his seat on the bench by the title of prior of Pluscardine. On 16th February 1587, he was appointed an ordinary lord, when he assumed the title of Lord Urquhart. He was elected president of the court, 27th May 1593, and the same year was, by James's queen, Anne of Denmark, on whom the temporal lordship had been conferred appointed heritable bailie of Dunfermline. On the 9th January 1596, he was nominated one of the eight commissioners of the treasury, called from their number Octavians, but with his colleagues, he resigned that unpopular office on the 7th January following. In consequence of his partiality to his Roman Catholic kinsman, the earl of Huntly, he was cited to appear before the Synod of Lothian The Synod remitted him to the commissioners of the church, to whom he cleared himself of the accusation He was one of the principal objects of popular fury in the well-known riot of Edinburgh of December 17, 1596, and one of the conditions of pacification proposed by the insurgents to James the Sixth, was that he and two others named should 'not be admitted to sit in council, at least when the cause of religion and matters of the church are treated, seeing they are enemies to the quietness thereof, and have, by their devices, raised the troubles that presently do vex the same." It was even proposed to excommunicate him Notwithstanding this, however, the citizens of Edinburgh elected him their provost for nine successive years. On 4th March 1597-8, he obtained a letter under the great seal, erecting the barony of Fyvie into a free lordship, with the title of a lord of parliament, and shortly after he was intrusted with the education of the king's second son, Prince Charles, afterwards Charles the First. On the 8th February 1604 he was appointed vice-chancellor, and in the following July one of the commissioners nominated by parliament to treat of a union then projected between the kingdoms. The same year he was appointed high chancellor of Scotland, and, on 4th March 16 6, was created earl of Dunfermline. He was admitted a member of the English privy council in 1609, and was commissioner to the parliament holden at Edinburgh 24th October 1612, in which the obnoxious acts of the General Assembly of Glasgow in June 1610, were ratified, and the act of parliament of 1592, establishing presbyterianism, was rescinded. He died at his seat of Pinkie, near Musselburgh, which had been built by himself, 16th June 1622, in the 67th year of his age, after an illness of fourteen days. Spotswood says of him that "he exercd his place with great moderation, and to the contentment of all honest men, he was ever inclining to the Roman faith, as being educated at Rome in his younger years, but very observant of good order, and one that hated lying and dissimulation, and above all things studied to maintain peace and quietness." [Spotswood's History, p. 548.] Calderwood states "that howsoever he was popishly disposed in his religion, yet he condemned many abuses and corruptions in the Kirke of Rome. He was a good justicier, courteous and humane both to strangers and to his own country people, out noe good friend to the bishops." [Calderwood's History, v. vii. p. 548.] He is said to have been a good scholar Some fragments of his poetry are still extant, particularly an epigram prefixed to Lesley's History of Scotland, and another addressed to Sir John Skene, on his publication of the Regiam Majestatem. He is also the subject of one of Arthur Johnston's panegyrics. He was thrice married, first to Lilias, second daughter of Patrick, third Lord Drummond, by whom he had six daughters, secondly, to Grizel Leslie, fourth daughter of James, Master of Rothes, and by her he had a son, Lord Fyvie, who died young, and a daughter, and, thirdly, to Margaret Hay, sister of John, first earl of Tweeddale (who had married Lady Jean Seton, a daughter of the chancellor) by whom he had, with two daughters, a son, Charles, second earl of Dunfermline

The second earl, a zealous adherent of the Covenant, was sent in June 1639, from the Scots camp at Dunse law with the petition to Charles the First, then with his army at the Bricks, about three miles from Berwick-on-Tweed, which produced the short pacification of Dunse In the following November, after the sudden prorogation of the Scots parliament by the earl of Traquair, the king's commissioner, the earls of Dunfermline and Loudoun were despatched by the estates to London, to vindicate the proceedings of the assembly and the parliament, but they were denied access to the presence of the king, and refused a hearing, on the pretext that they had not obtained the permission of the lord high commissioner He was also one of the commissioners sent by parliament to London early in 1640 He returned in May, and commanded a regiment in the Scots army which, under General Leslie, crossed the Tweed to England on the 21st August of that year, and was governor of Durham during the time it was occupied by them In the following October he was one of the eight Scots commissioners for the treaty of Ripon, and a member of the sub-committee which afterwards concluded a peace at London While there, he obtained from Charles, on 21st June 1641, a lease of the valuable abbacy of Dunfermline for three times nineteen years On the 30th July he was again sent to London with the final instructions of parliament to their commissioners. In November of the same year he was sworn a privy councillor, and in 1642 he was appointed by the king high commissioner to the General Assembly of the church of Scotland, which met at St. Andrews in July of that year He took an active part in the subsequent transactions of that important period In January 1646 he was chosen one of the committee of the estates during the interval between the sessions of parliament, and after the surrender of the king to the Scots army he was at Newcastle with his majesty the same year, and offered, along with the chancellor and the marquis of Argyle, to go to London to treat with the parliament of England for a mitigation of the articles proposed by them As he supported the "Engagement" in 1648, for the attempted rescue of the king he was in consequence deprived by the act of Classes. After the execution of the king, his lordship went to the continent in April 1649, to wait on King Charles the Second, with whom he returned to Scotland in 1650 He was admitted a member of the committee of estates, and of the committee for managing the affairs of the army, and also commanded a regiment of horse in the army levied to invade England under Charles the Second At the Restoration he was sworn a privy councillor On 2d November 1669, he was appointed an extraordinary lord of session, and chosen one of the lords of the articles in the parliament which met that year In 1671 he was appointed lord privy seal. He died before 14th January 1673. He married Lady Mary Douglas, third daughter of the earl of Morton, and had, with one daughter, three sons: Alexander, third earl, who died soon after succeeding to the title, the Hon. Charles Seton, killed in a sea-fight with the Dutch in 1672; and James, fourth and last earl of Dunfermline.

The fourth earl, in his youth, served under the prince of Orange in several memorable expeditions. On his accession to the title he returned to Scotland, and in 1689 joined the viscount of Dundee with a troop of horse, which he commanded at the battle of Killiecrankie. In 1690 he was outlawed and forfeited by parliament. Following King James the Seventh to St. Germains, he had the order of the Thistle conferred upon him, and died in exile in 1694 He married Lady Jean Gordon, sister of the first duke of Gordon, but had no issue, on which the title became extinct, and the earl being at the time of his death under forfeiture, the whole estates reverted to the crown The office of heritable bailie of the regality of Dunfermline had been in 1605 assigned to John earl of Tweeddale, for a debt due to him by the earl of Dunfermline.

Dunfermline, Lord a title in the peerage of the United Kingdom conferred in 1839 on the Right Hon James Abercromby, third son of the celebrated Sir Ralph Abercromby, by the daughter of John Menzies, Esq of Fernton, Perthshire, created Baroness Abercromby (see vol i pp 4 and 14). Born in 1776, he was called to the English bar in 1800 In 1827 he was appointed judge-advocate-general, and sworn a member of the privy council, and in 1830 chief baron of the exchequer in Scotland Master of the mint, 1834, and Speaker of the House of Commons from 1835 to 1839 for which he had a pension of £4,000 a-year, M P for Calne from 1812 till 1830 and for Edinburgh from 1832 till 1839, when he was raised to the peerage, elected in 1841 dean of faculty in the university of Glasgow He was for several years auditor to the duke of Devonshire's estates. Married in 1802 the daughter of Egerton Leigh, Esq of West Hall, Cheshire and died in 1858 His son, Sir Ralph Abercromby, K.C B born in 1803, minister plenipotentiary and envoy extraordinary to Sardinia from 1840 to 1851, when he was transferred in the same capacity to the Hague, succeeded as second Lord Dunfermline, married eldest daughter of second earl of Minto, issue, a daughter

Dunkeld Lord a title in the Scottish peerage, now extinct, conferred on 15th May 1645 on Sir James Galloway of Carnbe in Fife, master of requests to James the Sixth and Charles the First, and a privy councillor He was the son of Patrick Galloway, minister first at Perth and afterwards at Edinburgh, where he died in 1624 His mother was Mary, daughter of Mr James Lawson, also a minister of Edinburgh He was served heir to his father 10th October 1634, and in 1640 was conjunct secretary of state with William earl of Stirling His son, Thomas, second Lord Dunkeld, was served heir to his father May 8, 1662 By his wife, Margaret, daughter of Sir Thomas Thomson of Duddingston, baronet, he had James, third lord two other sons, and five daughters. James, third lord was an officer in the army In 1689 he joined the viscount of Dundee, and was at the battle of Killiecrankie, for which he was outlawed and forfeited He retired to the court of St Germains, and was afterwards a colonel in the French service He was killed in battle, leaving a son James, who assumed the title of Lord Dunkeld, and was an officer in the French service, in which he rose to the rank of lieutenant general, and a daughter, the Hon. Mary Galloway, who entered into the nunnery of Val de Grace in France.

DUNLOP, a surname derived from a parish of that name in the district of Cunningham, Ayrshire, which has long been celebrated for its cheese. The origin of the name is said to be Dun lob, 'the fortified hill at the bend,' there being at the village of Dunlop a small hill, anciently fortified, round which is a bend or winding of the local stream.

The family of Dunlop of Dunlop can be traced as far back as the year 1260, in which year Dominus William de Dunlop is incidentally mentioned as one of an inquest respecting certain lands in litigation between Dominus Godfrey de Ross and the burgh of Irvine. In the Ragman Roll occurs the name of Neill Fitz-Robert de Dulop. About the end of the fourteenth century the estate of Dunlop passed for a short time into the family of Douglas, as part of the barony of Stewarton, but was soon restored to its original owners. In 1489 Constantine Dunlop was appointed by parliament, among other barons, to collect the bygone rents and casualties of the crown He is also mentioned as member of an inquest on the retour of Mathew, earl of Lennox He was first designed of Hunthall, but in 1499 was designed of Dunlop. He died in 1505 He had a daughter, Janet, married to James Stewart, sheriff of Bute, (great-grandson of King Robert the Second,) and a son and successor, John, whose descendant in the fourth generation, James Dunlop of Dunlop, was a warm supporter of the Presbyterian cause in the reign of Charles the First. To secure the estate from forfeiture, he executed a deed of resignation in favour of his next brother, John Dunlop, who having purchased the lands of Garnkirk, was designed of that place. In 1633 the latter took possession of Dunlop, in virtue of the deed mentioned, but resigned it to his nephew, James, the son of his brother This gentleman also acted a prominent part during the civil wars, and as he too was a firm friend of the Presbyterian cause, he was obliged to make over a considerable portion of his estates to the earl of Dundonald. In 1665, for his opposition to the oppressive measures of the government, he was committed to Edinburgh castle, where he remained till 1677, when he was liberated under a bond of twelve thousand marks. In a few months thereafter he joined the ranks of the Covenanters. He was succeeded by his elder son, Alexander, who, being well known to be a zealous supporter of the covenant, was, on suspicion of having been at Bothwell Bridge in 1679, arrested on 30th July 1683, compelled to surrender a portion of his estates, and to execute a bond for ten thousand pounds, to appear in the following November (see Wodrow's Hist. folio edition, vol. i. p. 280, vol ii pp. 309 and 373). In April 1684 he was indicted anew, when he made over to his son, John Dunlop, the lands of Peacock Bank and others, which had been settled on him on his marriage, in 1667, with Antonia, daughter and heiress of Sir John Brown of Fordal. Soon after doing so, he emigrated to America, and in 1685 was appointed sheriff of South Carolina. His son and successor, John Dunlop, acquired back the possessions which had been surrendered by his father in 1683, and by an adjudication in his favour in 1687 he recovered all his grandfather's estates from the earl of Dundonald, though heavily burdened with expenses and fines. Dying unmarried in 1706, he was succeeded by his brother, Francis. The latter was one of those who were appointed, 26th March, 1707, to see the Regalia of Scotland built up in the Crown Room in the castle of Edinburgh, as appears from the minute of proceedings taken at the time and found amongst his papers. During the rebellion of 1715, he took an active part on the side of the government, and was lieutenant-colonel, under the earl of Kilmarnock, of a regiment of fencible cavalry, then raised. He was twice married. By his first wife he had three sons, and a daughter married to Sir Thomas Wallace of Craigie, baronet, and by his second wife he had two daughters. His eldest son, John Dunlop of Dunlop, was in 1745, with his brother-in-law, Sir Thomas Wallace, deputed by the landed gentlemen of Ayrshire, to offer the assistance of that county to the duke of Cumberland in the suppression of the rebellion. He married Frances Anne, last surviving child of Sir Thomas Wallace of Craige by Eleanor his wife, daughter and heiress of Colonel Agnew of Lochryan (see WALLACE of CRAIGIE, surname and family of). By this lady, celebrated as the early friend and correspondent of Burns, he had, with six daughters, five sons. Thomas, the eldest son, succeeded his maternal grandfather in the title of baronet and the estate of Craigie, and assumed in consequence the surname and arms of Wallace. Andrew, the second son, entered the army, and served in the first American war He attained the rank of major, and afterwards raised a regiment of horse, called the Ayrshire Fencible cavalry, which he commanded until it was reduced in 1800. He died unmarried in 1804. James, the 3d son, succeeded to the family estate of Dunlop, and entering the army, first served in the American war In 1787 he proceeded to India, as captain of the 77th foot, and remained there thirteen years. At the storming of Seringapatam, where he was severely wounded, he commanded one of the assaulting columns. In 1810, having attained the rank of major-general, he was appointed to the command of a brigade in the fifth division of Lord Wellington's army in the Peninsula, and he remained at the head of that division during the campaign of 1811 In the following year he was elected M P for the stewartry of Kirkcudbright. He married in 1802, Julia, daughter of Hugh Baillie, Esq., and had three sons and two daughters. Frances, the younger daughter became the wife, in 1838, of Alexander Earle Monteith, Esq., sheriff of Fifeshire. General Dunlop died in 1832 His eldest son, John Dunlop of Dunlop, born in 1806, was at one period an officer in the Grenadier guards. He represented the county of Ayr in parliament, and was created a baronet in 1838. He died 3d April 1839 He was twice married By his first wife he had a son, Sir James, second baronet, born 27th August 1830 He entered the Coldstream Guards as ensign and lieutenant in 1849, and became a major in the army in 1855 He served in the East through the whole of the Crimean war, and wore the medal and clasps for the Alma, Balaklava, Inkermann, and Sebastopol. He died unmarried, 10th February 1858, when the title became extinct

DUNLOP, WILLIAM, principal of the university of Glasgow after the Revolution, was the son of Mr. Alexander Dunlop, minister of Paisley, of the family of Auchenskeich in Ayrshire His mother was Elizabeth, daughter of William Muro of Glanderston, who was allied to the Muros of Caldwell One of her sisters was the wife of Mr John Carstairs of Glasgow, father of the celebrated Principal Carstairs, while another married, first, Zachary Boyd, and after his death, Mr James Durham, of whom a memoir is given below. He was educated for the Church of Scotland in the university of Glasgow, and after leaving it he became tutor in the family of William Lord Cochrane. He seems to have been licensed to preach about the dark and eventful year 1679, but the troubles in Scotland at that period induced him, (to avoid being exposed to persecution from the oppressive government that then ruled in Scotland,) to emigrate to Carolina, in North America, where he continued till the Revolution restored to their country many good and able men, who had till then lived in voluntary exile On his return in 1690, he was presented, through the interest of the Dundonald family, to the parish of Ochiltree in Ayrshire, but did not remain there long, as after receiving a call from his native place, Paisley, which he could not accept, he was in November of the same year (1690) appointed by King William principal of the university of Glasgow, then vacant In 1694 he was a member of the deputation sent by the church of Scotland to London, with the twofold object of congratulating the king on his return from the continent, and of negociating with his majesty concerning the interests of the church In 1699 he was again sent to London, as commissioner from the Scottish universities, to solicit the pecuniary aid of government to each of them, a mission which required considerable judgment, tact, and management to conduct On this occasion he succeeded in obtaining a yearly grant of twelve hundred pounds sterling out of the bishops' rents, each of the university towns receiving three hundred pounds for their respective colleges His claim for the expenses incurred by him in his journey and in getting the grant passed through the proper public offices, was, on his return to Glasgow, considered too high, and several of the universities were not disposed to comply with it. Before the matter was adjusted, he died, but his son, Mr Alexander Dunlop, renewed the demand, and obtained from the town council of Edinburgh, as patrons of that university, the sum of one hundred pounds, as their part of the expenses As the king's historiographer for Scotland, Principal Dunlop had a pension of forty pounds a-year His death took place in March 1700 Wodrow highly eulogises him for his singular piety, public spirit, universal knowledge, and general usefulness.

He had married, while young, his cousin Sarah, the sister of Principal Carstairs, who accompanied him to America, and by whom he had two sons; Alexander, born in Carolina in 1684, appointed in 1720 professor of Greek in the university of Glasgow, and died in 1742, and William, the subject of the succeeding notice Alexander, the elder son, whose system of teaching the Greek language was considered superior to that of any of his contemporaries, published in 1736, a Greek Grammar, which was at one time so highly esteemed as to have been long the one chiefly in use in the Scottish universities

DUNLOP, WILLIAM, a pious, learned, and eloquent divine, younger son of Principal Dunlop, was born at Glasgow in 1692, and received his education at the university of that city In 1712 he took the degree of master of arts, and subsequently removed to Edinburgh, where he prosecuted his studies under the roof and superintendence of his uncle, Principal Carstairs He afterwards spent two years at the university of Utrecht studying the civil law, as was customary in those days, and on his return to Scotland, he applied himself with greater diligence than ever to the study of divinity In 1714, he was licensed to preach the gospel by the presbytery of Edinburgh, and his learning and pulpit eloquence soon placed him in the foremost rank of the ministers of his time Although not appointed to any parochial charge, he was, by the influence of Mr William Wishart, who had succeeded his uncle as principal of the university of Edinburgh, nominated, on a vacancy, regius professor of divinity and ecclesiastical history in that university His name, however, does not appear in the list of professors of the university from 1700 to 1759, in the register of the Town Council of Edinburgh Bower says, "the patrons 'recommended to the committee for the affairs of the college to receive Mr William Dunlop second professor of divinity in the said college' No farther notice appears to be taken of it in the records, nor how long he retained that situation, nor anything respecting his future history, but there can be no doubt of his having been inducted to the office of professor of ecclesiastical history" [Bower's Hist of the University of Edinburgh, vol ii p 137]

About that period there had begun to appear both in England and Scotland a keen hostility to all creeds and confessions of faith, and it was deemed expedient for the Church of Scotland to lift up a testimony in their defence. In 1719, therefore, a number of gentlemen of Edinburgh resolved to publish an authorised collection of all the public standards of the church, and Professor Dunlop was requested to preface it with a vindication of the uses and ends of confessions. This he did with a candour and ability that proved his admirable fitness for the task It was also, as appears from a paragraph at the end of the preface to his Sermons, intended to publish his lectures on ecclesiastical history, but this was never done His career of usefulness was very short. He died October 29, 1720, at the early age of twenty-eight. His works are DUNMORE, Earl of, a title in the peerage of Scotland, conferred in 1686, on Lord Charles Murray, second son of John, first marquis of Athol, by Lady Amelia Stanley, daughter of the seventh earl of Derby Being lieutenant-colonel of General Dalziel's regiment of horse (now the Scots Greys) on the death of Dalziel, he succeeded him in the command. Subsequently he was master of the horse to the princess (afterwards queen) Anne. On the accession of her father, James the Seventh, he was appointed to the same office under his queen, Mary, and by that infatuated monarch he was created, August 6, 1686, earl of Dunmore, Viscount Fincastle, and Lord Murray of Blair, Moulin, and Tillemot. At the Revolution he was deprived of all his offices, and in 1692 was committed to prison, with the earl of Middleton, for a supposed plot in favour of the abdicated monarch. During the remainder of King William's reign he lived in retirement in the country, but soon after the accession of Queen Anne, he was, on February 4, 1703, sworn a member of the privy council of Scotland. He was a steady supporter of the Union, and in 1707 was appointed captain of the castle of Blackness. He died in 1710. He had four sons and three daughters.

As the eldest son, James, Viscount Fincastle, had predeceased his father in 1706, the second son, John, became second earl. He entered the army as an ensign in March 1704, and fought at the battle of Blenheim, on 13th August following. He was appointed colonel of the 3d foot guards, 10th October 1713 when only twenty-eight years old. At the capture of Vigo in 1719, he served as brigadier-general under Lord Cobham, and in July 1731, he became one of the lords of the bedchamber to King George the Second. In 1739 he attained the rank of lieutenant-general, and in 1743 he served under the earl of Stair at the battle of Dettingen. On 23d June, 1745, he was appointed governor of Plymouth, and the same year was promoted to be full general. He was elected a representative peer of Scotland in four successive parliaments. He died, unmarried, 18th April, 1752.

His youngest brother, William, succeeded as third earl. When the Hon. William Murray of Taymount, he engaged in the rebellion of 1745, but in the end of April 1746, he surrendered himself to a justice of peace of Forfarshire, and being sent to London, he was arraigned for high treason at the court held at St. Margaret's, Southwark, when he pleaded guilty, and received his majesty's pardon. He married his cousin, Catherine, the daughter of his uncle Lord William Murray, (who became Lord Nairne by marrying the heiress of that family,) and had three sons and four daughters. He died 1st December, 1756.

His eldest son, John, fourth earl, for some time an officer in the army, was appointed governor of New York in December 1769, and in the following year, of Virginia. He remained there till the commencement of the Revolutionary war in 1775, when he was obliged first to retire on board a ship of war in James' river, and finally to quit the coast in August 1776 He was a representative peer of Scotland from 1761 to 1784 In 1787 he was appointed captain general and governor-in-chief of the Bahama islands, where he resided for several years. He married Lady Charlotte Stewart, daughter of Alexander earl of Galloway, and had three sons and four daughters.

The fate of the Lady Augusta Murray, the second daughter, was very remarkable She married at Rome, on April 4, 1793, (the nuptials being solemnized by a protestant clergyman,) the prince Augustus Frederick, afterwards duke of Sussex, then under age, the sixth son and ninth child of George the Third, and on their arrival in England they were remarried, at the parish church of St. George's, Hanover Square, London, December 5th of the same year As this marriage took place in defiance of the Royal Marriage act, passed in 1772, which prohibits the descendants of George the Second from marrying without permission from the sovereign, the king directed a suit to be instituted in Doctors Commons, to dissolve it, and by a decree of the prerogative court it was declared null and void in August 1794 A son and a daughter were the fruits of this union, to whom was given the name of D'Este, as descended, through their father from the ancient princes of the house of Este. The son, Colonel Sir Augustus Frederick d'Este, K C H , born 13th January 1794, died, unmarried, in December 1848. The daughter, Ellen Augusta, Mademoiselle D'Este, born August 11, 1801, became in 1845 the second wife of the first Lord Truro (then Sir Thomas Wilde), lord chancellor of England from January 1850 to February 1852. On 15th October 1806, her mother, Lady Augusta, on her separation from the duke of Sussex, received the royal license to assume the surname of De Ameland, by which she was ever afterwards known. In a letter written in 1811, her ladyship thus expressed herself to a friend "Had I believed the sentence of the ecclesiastical court to be any thing but a stretch of power, my girl would not have been born Lord Thurlow told me my marriage was good abroad—religion taught me it was good at home, and not one decree of any powerful enemy could make me believe otherwise, nor ever will. By refusing me a subsistence they have forced me to take a name—not the duke of Sussex's—but they have not made me believe that I had no right to his. My children and myself were to starve, or I was to obey, and I obeyed; but I am not convinced.

Therefore, pray don't call this 'an act of mutual consent,' or say, 'the question is at rest.' The moment my son wishes it, I am ready to declare that it was debt, imprisonment, arrestation (force like this in short) which obliged me to seem to give up my claims, and not my conviction of their fallacy" It appears that one of the results of the duke's marriage with Lady Augusta was a reduction of his own income of eighteen thousand a-year to thirteen thousand, in order to make a provision for his wife, in which object he received no assistance from parliament. Her children, by a decree of the lord chancellor, were placed under the sole guardianship of Earl Mohra. Lady Augusta died 5th March 1830.

Lady Virginia Murray, the youngest daughter of the fourth earl, was born in Virginia (now one of the united states of North America), when her father was governor of that colony, and at the request of the council and assembly, was named after it. The fourth earl died in March 1809

His eldest son, George, fifth earl, born at Edinburgh 80th April 1762, married in August 1803, his cousin, Lady Susan Hamilton, third daughter of the ninth duke of Hamilton, by whom he had three sons: Alexander Edward, sixth earl, the Hon. Charles Augustus Murray, C B, minister plenipotentiary to the Swiss Confederation; and Henry Anthony, commander R.N, unmarried. His lordship was created a peer of the United Kingdom in 1831, as Baron Dunmore of Dunmore in the forest of Athol, Perthshire, and died 11th November 1836.

His eldest son, Alexander Edward, sixth earl, born 1st June 1804, married 27th September 1836, Lady Catherine, daughter of the eleventh earl of Pembroke, and had, with two daughters, a son, Charles Adolphus, his heir His lordship, who was a captain in the army died 15th July, 1845, and was succeeded by his son, Charles Adolphus, seventh earl of Dunmore, who was born 21th March, 1841

DUNN, WILLIAM, of Duntocher, an enterprising mechanic and successful agriculturist, was born at Gartclash, in the parish of Kirkintilloch, county of Dumbarton, in October 1770, and was educated at the parish school, and partly at the neighbouring village of Campsie Before attaining his eighteenth year, he was deprived of his father and mother, and left with four brothers, all much younger than himself, and a sister, dependent on him for advice and support From early life, he evinced superior mechanical skill, inventive powers, and an acute mind, and was remarkable for his sagacity, industry, and perseverance The first situation which he held was in the establishment of Mr Waddington, a cotton-spinner, at Stockingfield, near Glasgow, with whom he learnt iron-turning and machine-making There he remained for three or four years, and was afterwards in Messrs Black and Hastie's works, at Bridge of Weir, from which he went to Pollokshaws, to the works of John Monteith, Esq About the year 1800 he determined, with the proceeds of the sale of Gartclash, a small property of which his father was proprietor, and to which he had succeeded as eldest son, amounting to a few hundred pounds, to attempt business for himself, and commenced a manufacture of machine works in High John Street, Glasgow, which has long been on an extensive scale

About 1802 he acquired a small spinning-mill in Tobago Street, Calton of Glasgow, and six years afterwards he purchased the Duntocher mill, situated about seven miles from that city, which had been previously used for spinning wool and cotton yarn A few years afterwards he purchased from the Fairfley Spinning Company the Fairfley mill, which stood about a mile distant from the other, and applied it to the same purpose In 1813 he purchased the Dalnotter Iron works, which had been used for slitting and rolling iron, and manufacturing implements of husbandry, and after having greatly enlarged the two mills he already possessed, he was encouraged by the constantly increasing business that flowed in upon him, to build upon the site of these iron works, the Milton mill, the foundation of which was laid in 1821, and which was burnt down about 1846 Finally, the Hardgate mill was built in the same neighbourhood in 1831 All these works, lying contiguous to each other, were exclusively applied to the spinning and weaving of cotton The change which they produced in the neighbourhood was immense When Mr Dunn completed his first purchase, in 1808, the village of Duntocher hardly deserved the name of a village, but under his auspices it soon became a thriving and populous locality The men and women employed at the works, previous to that purchase, did not exceed a hundred and fifty, while their number at the date of Mr Dunn's death was about two thousand

The profits which his constantly increasing business brought him, he expended on the purchase of land in the neighbourhood of his works, and at his death his estates formed one compact and unbroken property, extending upwards of two miles along the banks of the Clyde, and about three miles along the banks of the Canal Upon this property, about twelve hundred acres of which was farmed by himself, he employed as quarriers, wrights, farm servants, and others, more than two hundred and fifty men. The total amount of wages which he annually paid in the parish was about thirty-five thousand pounds sterling The wages of the engineers and others employed in his works in Glasgow were also of a high amount.

Mr. Dunn died at Mountblow, on the 13th March, 1849, leaving, it is said, upwards of five hundred thousand pounds By his last will, after several annuities, and a bequest of a thousand pounds to the Royal Infirmary, Glasgow, besides various sums to other charities, amounting in all to three thousand pounds, clear of legacy duty, he left his whole possessions to his sole surviving brother, unfettered by restriction of any kind, indicating, at the same time, that failing him, his property should descend not to one individual, but in certain proportions amongst those most nearly related to him

DUNS, JOHN, commonly called DUNS SCOTUS, an eminent scholastic divine and theological disputant, was born, according to some writers, in 1264, or, as others say, ten years thereafter He is supposed to have been a native of Dunse in Berwickshire, but some English authors contend that his birthplace was Dunstance, near Alnwick, in Northumberland When a boy, two Franciscan friars, while begging for their monastery, came to his father's house, and, finding him to be a youth of extraordinary capacity, prevailed on him to accompany them to Newcastle, where they persuaded him to enter their fraternity From thence he was sent to Merton college, Oxford, and, becoming celebrated for his skill in scholastic theology, civil law, logic, and mathematics, he was in 1301 appointed professor of divinity, when, it is said, the fame of his learning and eloquence attracted scholars from all parts to his lectures In 1304 he was sent by the general of the Franciscan order to Paris, where he was honoured with the degrees, first of bachelor, and then of doctor in divinity At a meeting of the monks of his order at Toulouse, in 1307, he was created regent, and, about the same time, he was placed at the head of the theological schools at Paris. Here he is affirmed to have first propounded his favourite doctrine of the immaculate conception of the Virgin Mary, and having, in a public disputation, refuted two hundred objections urged against it by some divines, he acquired the name of "the most subtle doctor" Nothing, however, could be more barren and useless than the chimerical abstractions and metaphysical refinements which obtained for him this title. He was at first a follower of Thomas Aquinas, but, differing with him on the subject of the efficacy of divine grace, he formed a distinct sect, called the Scotists, in contradistinction to the Thomists. In 1308 he was sent to Cologne by the head of his order; and, not long after his arrival there, he was cut off by apoplexy, November 8 of that year, in the forty-fourth, or, according to some writers, in the thirty-fourth, year of his age, and, it is stated, was buried before he was actually dead, as was discovered by an examination of his grave He was the author of a vast number of works, which were collected by Lucas Wadding, in 12 vols folio, and published, with his Life, at Lyons, in 1639, but which have long since been consigned to hopeless oblivion A life of him by Mr Pinkerton appeared in the Scots Magazine for 1817 The titles of his various writings are subjoined from Watt's Bibliotheca Britannica

DURHAM, a surname derived from the city of Durham in the north of England. The first of the name in Scotland took root here in the early part of the thirteenth century arch of the lands of Grange, afterwards called Grange-Durham, in Forfarshire.

In the reign of Robert the Bruce, Sir William Durham, a distinguished knight, had a grant, in 1332, from that mon-

A descendant of this Sir William, John Durham, (second son of Alexander Durham of Grange, living in 1525) having realised a fortune by engaging in commercial pursuits, acquired the lands of Pitkerrow, Omachie, &c. His great grandson, Sir James Durham, was knighted by King Charles the First. His son, Sir James Durham of Pitkerrow, an eminent lawyer, was by the same monarch appointed clerk of the Exchequer, and director of the Rolls, from which offices he was removed during Cromwell's time, but at the Restoration was reinstated in them, when he received the honour of knighthood from Charles the Second His third son, Sir Alexander Durham, for his services in the royal cause, was knighted by Charles the Second, and constituted lord lyon king at arms. He died unmarried, when he bequeathed the lands of Largo, which he had acquired by purchase, to his nephew Francis, the son of his eldest brother, James of Pitkerrow, one of the ministers of Glasgow, a memoir of whom is given below in larger type. The estate of Largo formerly belonged to the famous admiral Sir Andrew Wood, who received a grant of it from James the Third in 1488, and it continued in possession of his descendants till the time of Charles the First. After the restoration it was purchased by Sir Alexander Durham, lord lyon

The above named Francis was succeeded by his brother, James Durham, Esq of Largo, who married Margaret, daughter of Sir Thomas Rutherford, of Hunthill. This lady, on failure of issue male of her father and brother, became heir of line to the title and honours of Lord Rutherford, in the peerage of Scotland, dormant since the death of Robert, the fourth baron, in 1724. Her descendant, Admiral Sir Philip Charles Durham, quartered the arms of Rutherford with his own, and the family claims the peerage of Rutherford [See RUTHERFORD, Lord]

Of this family was General James Durham of Largo, born January 14, 1754, who served in the army no less than seventy years, having entered as a cornet in the second dragoon guards, June 22, 1769 On the 1st of September 1794 he received the brevet of major, and, having raised the Fifeshire Fencibles, he was appointed lieutenant-colonel of that corps, October 23, 1794. From March 1804 to December 1806, he acted as brigadier and major-general in Ireland. He received the rank of major-general April 25, 1808, and, in December, was placed on the staff in Scotland. He attained the rank of lieutenant-general in 1813, and that of general in 1830 He died February 6, 1840 He was twice married, but having no issue, was succeeded in his estates by his brother, Admiral Sir Philip Charles Calderwood Durham.

Sir Philip entered the navy at an early age, and soon distinguishing himself, was rapidly promoted. In 1782, he joined the Royal George as lieutenant, and on the 29th August of that year, when that vessel sunk at Spithead, he was one of the four lieutenants who were saved He subsequently commanded the Spitfire, the Anson, and the Defiance, in which last he was at the battle of Trafalgar, where he was wounded. For his services in this engagement, as well as in the West Indies, he was made a G C.B , and towards the conclusion of the war was appointed commander-in-chief of the Leeward Islands. He represented Queenborough in 1830, and Devizes in 1837 He was twice married, first to Lady Charlotte Bruce, daughter of the fifth earl of Elgin, and secondly to Anne, only daughter and heir of the late Sir John Henderson of Fordel, Fifeshire. He died April 2, 1845.

The Durhams of Duntarvie, and those of Luffness, are branches of the same stock.

DURHAM, JAMES, a distinguished minister of the Church of Scotland, eldest son of John Durham, Esq of Easter Powrie, now called Wedderburn, in Forfarshire, and descended from the ancient family of Grange Durham, was born about 1622 He was educated at the university of St. Andrews, which he left without taking a degree, having then no design of following any of the learned professions He married, early in life, a daughter of Durham of Duntarvie, and lived for some time on his estate as a country gentleman; but being with his lady on a visit to his mother-in law at the Queensferry, he was induced to hear a sermon preached by Mr Ephraim Melvine, and became deeply impressed with religious feelings In the civil wars he served as a captain, under his brother Sir Alexander Durham, but was so much affected by two remarkable deliverances which he had in an action with the English, that, encouraged by the celebrated Mr David Dickson, he determined to devote himself to the ministry, and accordingly studied divinity under Mr Dick son at the university of Glasgow In 1647 he was licensed to preach by the presbytery of Irvine, and in November of that year, he was ordained minister of the Blackfriars' church, Glasgow, where he became one of the most popular preachers of his time In 1650, on Mr Dickson becoming professor of divinity at Edinburgh, Mr Durham was chosen to succeed him at Glasgow; but before he was admitted to the chair, the General Assembly appointed him chaplain to Charles the Second, a situation which he held till after the king's defeat at Worcester In 1651, when Cromwell and his army were at Glasgow, the Protector, we are told, came unexpectedly on a Sunday afternoon to the outer High Church, while Mr Durham was preaching, and the latter, availing himself of the opportunity, upbraided the usurper to his face for having invaded the country. Next day Cromwell sent for him, and told him he thought he had been a wiser man than to meddle with public affairs in his sermons Mr Durham answered, that it was not his common practice, but that he judged it both wisdom and prudence to speak his mind on the occasion, seeing that he had the opportunity of doing it in his own hearing Cromwell dismissed him with a caution, but met with so many similar instances of reproof from the Glasgow clergy, that he deemed it expedient not to adopt any more severe course against any of them On the death of Mr. Robert Ramsay in the same year, Mr Durham succeeded him as one of the ministers of the inner High Church, his colleague being Mr John Carstairs, his brother in-law by his second marriage, having married Carstairs' sister, the widow of the famous Zachary Boyd His incessant labours and severe study brought on a premature decay of his constitution, and, after some months' confinement, he died June 25, 1658, at the early age of 36 He was the author of some religious works, sermons, and tracts, a list of which is subjoined

DURIE, a surname derived from the estate of Durie in Fifeshire, which was anciently the inheritance of a family of the name of Durie, but for a long time in possession of the Gibsons, the first of whom, a lord of session, purchased it in the reign of James the Sixth The Duries obtained it in the reign of Alexander the Second The castle of Rossend, Burntisland, was built by the laird of Durie in 1382 Of this family was Andrew Durie, bishop of Galloway in 1541, and abbot of Melrose as early as September 24, 1527, who died in September 1558 Calderwood has a curious entry concerning him According to him Bishop Durie was very fond of cards: "He died as he lived," he says. "The articles of his belief were,—I referre decart you Aha! the four kings, and all made the devil goe with it, it is but a variett! from France we thought to have gotten a ruby, and yitt he is nothing but a Cohubie!" (It is explained in a note that these were terms in the card-playing of the period, including a pun at the expense of M Rubie). With such faith and such prayers, departed out of this life that enemy of God and his truth, who had vowed that so long as they that were prelates lived, that word called the Gospel should never be preached within this realm [Calderwood's Hist., vol. i. p. 332.] In the time of James the Fifth Thomas Durie of Durie, leaving an only daughter, the king by virtue of the ward, married her to Sir Alexander Kemp, his favourite, from whose posterity Sir Alexander Gibson bought the lands of Durie. [See GIBSON, Sir Alexander, Lord Durie.] The estate subsequently came into the possession of a family of the name of Christie.

During the struggle between the church and the court, in the reign of James the Sixth, there were two ministers of the name of Durie, who then acted a prominent part, namely, John Durie, one of the ministers of Edinburgh in 1574, and Robert Durie, minister of Anstruther The former, for his opposition to the bishops, brought upon him the persecution of the court, and was the particular object of enmity of the king's favourite, the dissolute duke of Lennox. In 1580, with Mr Walter Balcanquhal, he was summoned before the secret council, and charged to enter prisoner in the castle of Edinburgh, for inveighing in a sermon against the French courtiers. The sentence, however, was soon recalled. He was one of the ministers who held a conference with the Regent Morton, on the morning of his execution, June 2, 1581, when the earl made his celebrated confession. On the 30th May 1582 he was again cited before the council for having, in a sermon, styled the duke of Lennox and the earl of Arran, the court favourites, abusers of the king, and charged to remove out of Edinburgh, which city he accordingly left. That he and the cause of the church must have been very popular is proved by the warm reception he experienced on his return to Edinburgh in the following September Calderwood says, "As he is coming from Leith to Edinburgh upon Tuesday the 4th of September, there met him at the Gallow Green, (that is, about the middle of Leith Walk) two hundred men of the inhabitants of Edinburgh Their number still increased till he came within the Nether Bow There they began to sing the 124th Psalm, 'Now Israel may say,' &c. They came up the street till they came to the Great Kirk (St. Giles') singing thus all the way, to the number of two thousand. They were much moved themselves, and so were all the beholders. The duke (of Lennox) was astonished and more affrayed at that sight than at any thing that ever he had seen before in Scotland, and rave his beard for anger" [Calderwood's Hist vol. iii. p. 646.] He was called before the king and council on the 18th December 1583, for having said that the raid of Ruthven had produced some good effects, when, after being examined, the council decided that he had transgressed the act, and, therefore, should be punished at the king's will, on which he was banished to Montrose He was a member of several of the subsequent General Assemblies which met at Edinburgh, and was engaged in most of the more important transactions of the Presbyterian church at that interesting period of her history

Mr Robert Durie, minister of Anstruther, was one of the six ministers who were condemned at Linlithgow in 1606, and banished the realm, for declining the jurisdiction of the privy council, and holding a General Assembly at Aberdeen after the king had prohibited its meeting

DURIE, or DURY, JOHN, in Latin DURÆUS a learned divine of the seventeenth century, was born and educated in Scotland, and was for some time minister of Dalmeny In 1624 he went to Oxford for the sake of the public library, but being zealously bent on effecting a union between the Lutherans and Calvinists, he published his plan in 1634, and obtained the approbation and recommendation of Laud, archbishop of Canterbury, of the bishops of Kilmore and Exeter, and others The same year he appeared at a famous assembly of the evangelical churches in Germany, at Frankfort, and afterwards negotiated with the divines of Sweden and Denmark. In 1641 we find him in London as one of the members of the Assembly of Divines, and he was also one of the preachers before the long parliament. He afterwards quitted the Presbyterian party, and joined that of the Independents Travelling into Germany for the advancement of his scheme, he obtained from the divines of Utrecht an authentic testimony of their good intentions, which he annexed to a Latin work, published in 1662 at Amsterdam, under the title of 'Johannes Duræi Irenicorum Tractatuum Prodromus,' &c. The discouragements he encountered in endeavouring to serve the church by the plan he had hitherto advocated, induced him to have recourse to another expedient of a still more impracticable nature, namely, the attempt to re-unite all sects of Christians by means of 'A New Explication of the Apocalypse,' which he published at Frankfort in 1674 At this time he resided in Hesse, where the princess Hedwig Sophia, then regent of that country, had assigned him a free house and well-furnished table, with free postage for his letters The time of his death is unknown, but is supposed to have been about 1675 He was the author of a great many publications, relating principally to his two grand schemes for bringing about an accommodation and union between the protestant churches, a list of which is subjoined

DURWARD, a surname derived from the office of ostiarius regis, door-keeper, or door-ward to the king, anciently Lord Durward. After the forfeiture of David Hastings, earl of Athol, Alan Durward, who held this office in the reign of Alexander the Second, was by that monarch created earl of Athol in his place, and in 1242 he was made great justiciary of Scotland. He married the king's sister, and in 1251, when with Alexander the Third at the court of Henry the Third at York, he was accused of high treason, and in 1258, he followed Henry into France and served in his army there. In 1255, he was one of the leaders of the party who opposed the Comyns, then at the head of the government in Scotland, and with Patrick, earl of Dunbar, and others, he invaded Edinburgh, surprised the castle, and set at liberty the young king, Alexander the Third, and his queen [See vol. i., article ALEXANDER THE THIRD.] He was afterwards one of the fifteen regents, but in 1257 he was compelled to take refuge in England In 1258 he was again chosen one of the regents of the kingdom In 1264 he and the earls of Buchan and Mar proceeded to the Western Isles with a great army, and there killed many of those who had persuaded Haco, king of Norway, to invade Scotland, and banished the rest. He died in 1275, leaving three daughters, his heirs, among whom his lands were equally divided.

DYSART, Earl of, a title in the peerage of Scotland, possessed by an English family of the name of Tollemache, but at first conferred, in the reign of Charles the First, on William Murray, a cadet of the house of Tullibardine, and the son of William Murray, rector of Dysart, in Fifeshire, a younger son of the family of Murray of Woodend, Perthshire. His uncle Thomas Murray, was preceptor and afterwards secretary to King Charles the First and by him he was introduced to that monarch when a youth and as they were nearly about the same age, he had the whole of his education along with the king Being of a lively disposition, the young prince became much attached to him, and soon after his accession to the throne he appointed him, in 1626, one of the gentlemen of his bedchamber During the subsequent troublous period which ended with Charles decapitation at Whitehall Murray was employed in several negociations of importance and on 3d August 1646 (Douglas says 1643) he was created a peer of Scotland, by the titles of earl of Dysart, Lord Huntingtower, &c. In 1650, he and the earl of Carnwath were sent with instructions to the Scots commissioners at Breda, who were then in treaty with king Charles the Second relative to his restoration, when he conducted himself with great ability and fidelity He married Elizabeth Bruce, a daughter of the family of Clackmannan and had two daughters Lady Elizabeth, afterwards countess of Dysart, and Lady Margaret, married to William Lord Maynard an English nobleman.

Burnet gives the following unfavourable character of the first earl of Dysart. "He had been," he says, "page and whipping boy to King Charles the First, and had great credit with him, not only in procuring private favours, but in all his counsels. He was well turned for a court, very insinuating, but very false, and of so revengeful a temper, that rather than that any of the counsels given by his enemies should succeed, he would have revealed them, and betrayed both the king and them He had one particular quality, that when he was drunk, which was very often, he was upon a most exact reserve, though he was pretty open at all other times. He got a warrant to be an earl which was signed at Newcastle yet he got the king to antedate it, as if it had been signed at Oxford, to get the precedence of some whom he hated But he did not pass it under the great seal during the king's life, but did it after his death though his warrant, not being passed, died with the king" [History of his own Times, vol i. p. 224]

As he died without male issue, his elder daughter, Lady Elizabeth Murray, assumed the title of countess of Dysart in her own right. Being in great favour with King Charles the Second, she was by him created countess of Dysart baroness of Huntingtower, &c., with her father's precedency, by a new patent, bearing to be "to her or any of her children she thinks fit to name, by a writ under her hand, any time of her life, and in case of no such nomination, to her heirs general, the eldest to be preferred, &c.," dated 5th September, 1670. She married, first, Sir Lionel Tollemache of Helmingham, in the county of Suffolk, by whom she had eleven children, and secondly, on 17th February 1671-2, the celebrated John Maitland, duke of Lauderdale, (being his second wife,) who at one period had the chief power in Scotland, but by him she had no issue. She possessed considerable talent, with unbounded ambition, and a great spirit of intrigue. According to Burnet, "She was a woman of great beauty, but of far greater parts. She had a wonderful quickness of apprehension, and an amazing vivacity in conversation. She had studied not only divinity and history, but mathematics and philosophy She was violent in everything she set about, a violent friend, but a much more violent enemy She had a restless ambition, lived at a vast expense, and was ravenously covetous, and would have stuck at nothing by which she might compass her ends. She had been early in a correspondence with Lord Lauderdale, that had given occasion to censure. When he was prisoner after Worcester fight, she made him believe he was in great danger of his life, and that she had saved it by her intrigues with Cromwell, which was not a little taken notice of Cromwell was certainly fond of her, and she took care to entertain him in it, till he, finding what was said upon it, broke it off On the king's restoration, she thought that Lord Lauderdale made not those returns that she expected They lived for some years at a distance But upon her husband's death she made up all quarrels. So that Lord Lauderdale and she lived so much together that his lady was offended at it, and went to Paris, where she died about three years after The Lady Dysart came to have so much power over the Lord Lauderdale that it lessened him much in the esteem of all the world, for he delivered himself up to all her humours and passions. All applications were made to her She took upon her to determine everything She sold all places, and was wanting in no methods that could bring her money, which she lavished in a most profuse vanity As the conceit took her, she made him fall out with all his friends, one after another From that time to the end of his days he became quite another sort of man than he had been in all the former parts of his life" [Burnet's Own Times, vol i. p. 245] Her grace died in June 1696. Of her eleven children, only three sons and two daughters attained to maturity

Of the sons, the eldest, Lionel Tollemache, became second earl of Dysart. The family to which his father belonged, namely that of Tollemache, Talmash, or Toedmeg, as it is spelled in Doomsday Book, has continued in an uninterrupted male succession from the arrival of the Saxons in England till now, and were possessed of the lands of Bentley in Suffolk, before the Norman conquest They acquired Helmingham by marriage with the daughter and heiress of Helmingham of Helmingham, and several of them served the office of high sheriff of Norfolk and Suffolk.

The Hon. Thomas Tollemache, the second son, was a distinguished military officer, and served seventeen campaigns. He gave his hearty support to the Revolution, and was made colonel of the Coldstream guards 1st May 1689 Soon after, he was advanced to the rank of lieutenant-general, in which capacity he served under King William in Ireland, in 1691

He is stated to have displayed uncommon bravery in the passage over the river Shannon, and at the taking of Athlone, and in the battle of Aughrim. In 1693 he attended the king to Flanders, and at the battle of Landen, against the French, when his majesty himself was obliged to retire, he brought off the English foot with great gallantry In 1694 he was appointed commander-in-chief of the expedition against Brest, where he was mortally wounded, and died at Plymouth, 18th June that year A fine engraving of General Tollemache by Houbraken in Birch's collection of Illustrious Characters.

The third son, the Hon. William Tollemache, was a captain in the royal navy In 1681 he unfortunately killed the Hon William Carnegie, second son of the earl of Southesk, in a duel at Paris. He died of a fever in the West Indies.

Lionel, second earl of Dysart, in the lifetime of his mother was styled Lord Huntingtower Although he had succeeded his mother as earl in 1696, two years thereafter he was chosen member of the English parliament for the county of Suffolk, being an Englishman and having his property in England, and was rechosen for the same county in 1700 and 1701 On the accession of Queen Anne he had the offer of the patent of a baron of England, which he declined, preferring, though a Scotch earl, to be a member of the English House of Commons, and he was a fourth time chosen for the county of Suffolk, after a very keen contest, to the first parliament of Queen Anne in 1702 He was rechosen in 1705 and 1707, but after the treaty of union with Scotland, being no longer a commoner of Great Britain, he was obliged to vacate his seat, and a new writ was ordered 10th November of the latter year His lordship died 3d February 1726 His only son, also named Lionel, died before him in 1712, but left a son, Lionel who became third earl The latter died in 1770, in his 63d year He had fourteen children The eldest son having died young the second, Lionel, became fourth earl, and the third, Wilbraham, fifth earl of Dysart. The fourth son, the Hon. George Talmash, an officer in the navy, was killed in the sixteenth year of his age, by a fall from the masthead of the "Modeste" man-of-war, in a voyage to Lisbon in October 1760 The Hon John Talmash, the fifth son, a captain in the royal navy, was killed in a duel at New York, with Captain, afterwards General Pennington (first lord Muncaster in the peerage of Ireland), 25th September 1777, aged twenty seven The quarrel originated in a sonnet written by Captain Pennington, which Captain Talmash resented as reflecting on the supposed wit of his wife, Lady Bridget Henley, daughter of the earl of Northington, and widow of the Hon. George Fox Lane. His opponent, Captain Pennington, received seven wounds of so severe a nature, that his life was for some time despaired of The Hon. William Talmash, also an officer in the navy, was lost in the twenty-sixth year of his age, in the "Repulse" frigate, in a hurricane, 16th December 1776.

Louisa, the third and only surviving daughter, succeeded as countess of Dysart. She was born in 1745, and married in 1765, John Manners, Esq of Grantham Grange, Lincolnshire, by whom she had three sons and four daughters. Her eldest son, William, Lord Huntingtower, born in 1766, created a baronet 5th January 1793, assumed the surname of Talmash only He died before his mother, 10th March 1833, leaving six sons and six daughters. The Hon. John Manners, the second son of the Countess Louisa, married 19th August 1806, Mary, duchess dowager of Roxburghe. Of the daughters, Maria-Caroline, the second, married the fourth earl of Fife, and Louisa Grace, the third, became the wife of the sixth duke of St. Albans. Lady Louisa Manners, the fourth and youngest daughter, married in 1808, John Dalrymple, seventh earl of Stair, which marriage was dissolved in 1809, in consequence of a previous contract in 1804, with Johanna, daughter of Charles Gordon of Cluny The latter, however, though deemed a valid marriage by the laws of Scotland, was annulled by the court of session, in June 1820 The countess Louisa obtained for herself and her only surviving daughter, Lady Laura, royal permission, in consideration of her ladyship being the heir and representative of the ancient house of Tollemache to adopt the surname and arms of that family, instead of Manners, and in April 1821, her sons John and Charles obtained a similar license. She died on 22d September, 1840

Her grandson, Sir Lionel William John Tollemache, succeeded her as sixth earl, having in 1833 succeeded his father as second baronet. He married in 1819, his cousin Maria, eldest daughter of Sweeney Lone, Esq of Keston Lodge, and has a son, William Lionel Felix, Lord Huntingtower, born 4th July 1820, married in September 1851, his cousin, Katherine Elizabeth Camilla, youngest daughter of Sir Joseph Burke, baronet, of Glinsk castle, county Galway, with issue.

EDGAR, KING OF SCOTS, fourth son of Malcolm Canmore, but second by his queen Margaret, was forced, with his brothers, to take refuge in England, on the usurpation of the throne by his uncle, Donald Bane During the brief possession of the sovereignty by his eldest brother Duncan, he appears to have returned to Scotland, and after Duncan's assassination,—as the Gaelic population of the country continued firm in their support of the usurper,—he seems to have gone back to the English court. To assert his claim to the throne, the English king, William Rufus, sent Edgar Atheling, in 1098, with a large army of Saxons and Normans, to Scotland, and Donald being overthrown and made prisoner, Edgar regained possession of the kingdom In gratitude for his success he founded the priory of Coldingham in Berwickshire, a dependency of Durham, and amply endowed it with various lands and heritages Subjoined is the representation of his seal appended to one of his charters of endowment (No vi of Anderson's Diplomata.) As usual in those times, these charters bear no date, but from the fact of his having commenced his reign in 1098, and from one of them being granted during the lifetime of William Rufus, who died in 1100, the foundation of the priory must have been intermediate to these years

Among the witnesses to this charter are Thor Longus, who received from King Edgar a grant of Ednam in Roxburghshire, where he erected and endowed a church in honour of St. Cuthbert, Alfric, the butler, Algar and Osbern, priests, and Sigulf of Bambrough, all Saxon names. It is quite in accordance with the superstition of the times that Edgar should have attributed his success to St. Cuthbert, the patron saint of Durham, and there is a legendary story related by Fordun, [Scotichronicon, vol i] that on his march to Scotland, Edgar slept one night at Durham, when he received a visit from the saint, who encouraged him in his enterprise, and assured him that if he caused his banner to be carried along with him, his enemies, at the sight of the sacred ensign, would flee in terror before him On the following morning, Edgar borrowed from the monastery the banner of the saint, and having displayed it in battle as he had been directed, the discomfiture of Donald and his Celtic adherents was the immediate consequence King Edgar, therefore, could not do less than express his gratitude by the foundation of a religious house at Coldingham, and on the day of its consecration to the three saints, Cuthbert, Mary, and Abba, he attended personally in the church, and in his charter he says that the consecration was performed in a manner acceptable 'to the glory of God and his own pleasure' Wyntoun says

> Coldyngame than foundyd he
> And rychely gert it dowyt be
> Of Saint Ebb a sweet Hallow, > Saynt Cuthbert thair thai honoure now
> Cronykil, page 275.

By one of his charters Edgar made an ample donation to the monks of St. Cuthbert of lands in Berwickshire, and in the preamble he plainly acknowledges the feudal tenure by which he held Loudonium, or Lothian, from William Rufus, king of England. A supplement states that it was granted on the fourth of the calends of September of that year in which 'King William, son of the great King William,' built a new fortress near Bambrough, against Robert, earl of Northumberland. The donation was made "for the souls of his father and mother, his own soul and body, and the souls of his brothers, Edward and Duncan" Edward was slain with his father, Malcolm Canmore, at the siege of Alnwick castle in 1093, and Duncan, after expelling for a time Donald Bane from the throne and reigning in his stead, was treacherously assassinated by Malpedir, maormor of Moern, in 1096, as already related in his life [See this volume, p 83]

During Edgar's reign the Saxon system prevailed in all that part of Scotland which was not possessed by the Gaelic portion of the inhabitants, and "in imitation," says Skene, "of the Anglo-Saxon kingdom, this part of the country (that is, the Lowlands) was divided into earldoms, which were bestowed upon members of the royal family, Saxon thanes were introduced over the whole country, and sheriffs and sheriffdoms everywhere established" [Hist of the Highlanders of Scotland, vol i p 128] In the life of Edgar's brother, Alexander the First, who succeeded him, it has been stated (see vol i p 60) that, during these two reigns, the laws, institutions, and forms of government of the country, except in that portion which was ruled over by the native or Gaelic chiefs, were purely Saxon, and it appears to have been during the reign of Edgar that the two distinct races which then and ever since have possessed Scotland, namely, the Teutonic and the Celtic, first came to occupy their own precise boundaries in the kingdom "The Norwegian kingdom of Thorfinn," says Skene, "had excluded the Gael from the eastern and more level part of the country north of the Tay, and had colonised these districts with a Norwegian race The Saxon conquest under Edgar, for such it was in its effects, now confined them altogether to the mountainous districts of the country, and peopled the remainder of the Lowlands with Saxons and Normans. The two Teutonic races who were now placed contiguous to each other, and together occupied the whole of the Lowlands, gradually amalgamated and formed that Gothic race which now occupies that portion of the country, while the Gael were confined within those limits to which they have ever since been restricted" [Ibid p 129]

After a peaceable reign of nine years, the Highland portion of the community having made no attempt to regain their lost supremacy, or disturb him in the exercise of the government, Edgar died on the 10th January 1106-7 According to Aldred, abbot of Rivaulx, quoted by Lord Hailes, "He was a sweet-tempered, amiable man, in all things resembling Edward the Confessor, mild in his administration, equitable and beneficent" During his reign his sister, Matilda, was married to Henry the First of England, but Edgar himself seems never to have been married

EDMOND, ——, Colonel, a brave and highly esteemed soldier of fortune, was born in Stirling, about the end of the sixteenth century His father was a baker in that town, and when very young he ran off from his parents, and enlisted in the army of Maurice, prince of Orange By his valour and good conduct he so greatly distinguished himself, as to rise to the rank of colonel Sir Robert Sibbald relates the following anecdote of him While he was serving on the continent, and was one day on the parade with several brother officers, he was accosted by a stranger, who professed to have newly arrived from Scotland, and left the colonel's relations well, enumerating several of them as of high rank Edmond, turning from him indignantly, informed those around him that, however this unknown personage might attempt to flatter his vanity, he must, in candour, inform them, if they did not already know, that he had the honour, of which he should ever be proud, of being the son of an honest baker and freeman in the ancient burgh of Stirling He then ordered the abashed impostor out of his sight Having acquired a competent fortune, and settled in his native town, he proved himself beneficent to his relations, who were all in the humble walks of life He would not visit any person in Stirling unless his father and mother were also invited

The earl of Mar had asked him to his house to dine or sup. Edmond agreed to go, provided he was allowed to bring with him his father and mother. The earl politely assented, and thus escorted by the aged pair, did the gallant colonel wait upon the lord high treasurer of the kingdom Colonel Edmond contributed largely towards the building of the manse of Stirling The manse so erected was taken down in 1824 His daughter married Sir Thomas Livingston of Jerviswood, baronet, a cadet of the noble house of Kilsyth, and of the noble and more ancient family of Linlithgow and Callendar Her eldest son, Sir Thomas Livingston, colonel of a regiment of dragoons, a privy councillor, and commander-in-chief in Scotland, was by William the Third, in 1698, created Viscount Teviot, by patent to male descendants. As he died without issue, the peerage became extinct in 1711 The date of his grandfather, Colonel Edmond's death, is unknown

EDMONSTONE, a surname of great antiquity in Scotland, derived from the lands of Edmonstone in the county of Edinburgh, its origin being Edwundus and town a baronial residence Tradition pretends that in the train of the princess Margaret, sister of Edgar Etheling, when she took refuge in North Britain in 1070, there was a knight named Edmundus, supposed to be a younger son of Count Egmont of Flanders, and that he acquired from David I lands in Mid Lothian, to which he gave his name, but for this there is no authority, and it seems probable that the once powerful race of Seton, to whom these lands are said once to have belonged was the parent stock. The arms of Seton and Edmonstone are the same.

The first of the name on record was Henricus de Edmunstone, of Edmonstone, in 1248. About 100 years later Sir John de Edmunstone is recorded as the son of Henry This Sir John de Edmunstone, a person of note in the reign of David II, was much employed in missions to England, and from that monarch he received the barony of Boyne, in Banffshire

His son, of the same name, married the princess Isabella Stewart, daughter of Robert II, and widow of James, earl of Douglas and Mar, slain at the battle of Otterburn in 1388. Sir John Edmundstone was employed as ambassador in negotiating different treaties with England, during the reign of his brother-in-law, Robert III, and under the regency of his other brother-in-law, Robert, duke of Albany, during the captivity of James I. in 1407 and subsequent years. From this marriage descended the elder branch of the family, which about the middle of the 18th century became extinct in the male line.

Besides Edmonstone, which they sold in 1671, the Edmonstones likewise possessed Ednam in Roxburghshire, a grant of Robert III

The direct and immediate ancestor of the Edmonstones of Duntreath was Sir Archibald, probably a younger son of the first Sir John His son, Sir William Edmonstone of Culloden, married (as her 4th husband) the princess Mary Stewart, countess dowager of Angus, eldest daughter of Robert III., and Queen Annabella Drummond, and in 1445 he obtained from her nephew, James II., the lands of Duntreath in Stirlingshire, a portion of the forfeited estates of Lennox, on the attainder of Duncan, the last earl of that family Duntreath, in the Gaelic, signifies "hill of the chief," and ever since it came into their possession it has remained the principal seat of the Edmonstones.

Sir William's son another Sir William, took an active part in public affairs during the disturbed reign of James III., and was more than once one of the Lords of the Articles. He had a son, Sir Archibald Edmonstone of Duntreath, knight, who was by James IV appointed captain of Doune castle, and steward of Monteith and Strathgartney By his wife, Janet, daughter of Sir James Shaw of Sauchie, comptroller of Scotland, and governor of Stirling castle under James the Third, he had three sons,—Sir William, his heir, James, ancestor of the Edmonstones of Broich in Stirlingshire, Jacob, of the Edmenstones of Balmton, in Perthshire, and five daughters, Janet, married to William, first earl of Montrose, Catherine, to John, second earl of Eglinton; Christian, to John, second lord Ross, Margaret, to George Buchanan of Buchanan, and Beatrix, to James Muschet of Burnbank, in Perthshire.

Sir William Edmonstone of Duntreath, knight, after his father's death in 1502, was by James the Fourth appointed captain of Doune castle and steward of Monteith. He sold Culloden to Strachan of Scotstown and fell on Flodden field 9th September 1513 By Sybilla, daughter of Sir William Baillie of Lamington, he left three sons,—Sir William, who succeeded him, Archibald, ancestor of the Edmonstones of Spittal, James, ancestor of the Edmonstones of Newton and Cambuswallace, and several daughters, the eldest of whom, Marion was married to John Campbell of Glenorchy, paternal ancestor of the earls of Breadalbane

Sir William's son, Sir James, filled some important offices in the reign of James VI His grandson, William Edmonstone of Duntreath married Isabel, daughter of Sir John Haldane of Gleneagles in Perthshire (a female descendant of whom was the mother of the first Viscount Duncan,) and had three sons, Archibald his successor, James and John The last married the sole heiress of Edmonstone of Broich

Archibald Edmonstone of Duntreath, the eldest son, was a member of the parliament which met at Edinburgh in 1633, when Charles I presided in person, and being a strict presbyterian, he strongly opposed all his attempts for the establishment of episcopacy in Scotland By Jean, daughter and heiress of Hamilton of Halcraig, the brother of Viscount Claneboy, in Ireland, he had two sons,—William who, being born deaf and dumb was set aside from the inheritance, and Archibald, who succeeded to the estate, and had a son, Archibald, and two daughters.

Archibald, the son, designed of Duntreath and Red Hall, county Antrim, Ireland, married for his 2d wife, Anne, daughter of the Hon John Campbell of Mamore, son of 9th earl of Argyle, and had Sir Archibald Edmonstone, created a baronet of Great Britain in 1774. He was for many years M P for the county of Dumbarton, and the Ayr district of burghs, and on his death in July 1807, he was succeeded by his third, but eldest surviving son, Sir Charles Edmonstone second baronet, M P for the county of Stirling from 1812 till his death, on April 1, 1821 The second baronet was twice married. By his first wife, the fifth daughter of Richard Wilbraham Bootle, Esq, and sister of the first Lord Skelmeradale, he had a son, Sir Archibald Edmonstone, third baronet, the author of 'A Journey to the Oases of Upper Egypt;' 'The Progress of Religion, a Poem,' 'The Christian Gentleman's Daily Walk,' and other works. He married in 1832, his cousin, the daughter of Randle Wilbraham, Esq. of Rode Hall, Cheshire, but has no children The heir presumptive to the baronetcy is his half brother, William, (a captain in the royal navy, 1858,) by his father's second wife, the daughter of Lord Hotham.

The estate of Edmonstone in Mid Lothian now belongs to a family of the name of Wauchope, John Wauchope, younger son of Sir John Wauchope of Niddry, having obtained a charter of it on 9th June 1671. He was a lord of session, under the judicial title of Lord Edmonstone, from November 1682 to February 1688, but having disobliged the king he was, with Lord Harcarse, arbitrarily dismissed from the bench

EDMONSTONE, ROBERT, an artist of considerable eminence, was born in Kelso, in 1794, and when a boy, was bound apprentice to a watchmaker, but his strong love for painting caused him to devote his whole energies to the study of art His first productions were brought out at Edinburgh, where they attracted much attention, and procured for him the patronage of Baron Hume and other gentlemen, who afterwards honoured him with their friendship He was induced by his success to settle in London, where he speedily attained an honourable reputation He afterwards resided for some years at Rome, Naples, Florence, and Venice, and at all these cities prosecuted his studies with an assiduity which materially affected his health Among the paintings which he finished at Rome is the picture of the 'Ceremony of kissing the Chains of St Peter,' which was exhibited at the British gallery in 1833, and soon obtained a purchaser While at Rome he had a severe attack of fever, which obliged him to relinquish painting for a considerable time He returned to London at the close of 1832, and, with his usual zeal, recommenced his professional labours, but in consequence of his health becoming seriously injured by his unremitting application, he retired to Kelso for the benefit of his native air, and died there September 21, 1834 He excelled in works of imagination, which he preferred to portraits, and was fond of introducing children into his pictures, generally with the happiest effect.

EGLESHEIM a surname derived from the parish of Eglesham in Renfrewshire, (the original property of the earls of Eglinton, and the birthplace of Robert Pollok author of 'The Course of Time,') which received its name from the Norman French eglise (which is again a corruption of Latin ecclesia,) a church or place of worship, and ham, the Saxon word for a village To the latter must also be referred the surname of Eccles, from a parish of that name in Berwickshire, in which there was once a nunnery as also the corruption Kil.

In 1626, a Scots physician of the name of George Eglisheim, one of the physicians of King James the Sixth, who had fled to Flanders on the king's death, published a book, wherein he offered to prove that the marquis of Hamilton and several other noblemen, as well as King James himself, had been poisoned by the king's favourite, George Villiers, duke of Buckingham This curious work is entitled 'The Forerunner of Revenge upon the Duke of Buckingham, for the Poysoning of the Most Potent King, James, of happie memorie, King of Great Britaine, and the Lord Marquis of Hamilton, and others of the nobilitie, discovered by Mr George Eglesheime, one of King James his Physicians for his Majestie's personn above the space of ten yeeres.' An account of Eglesheim's book, and a minute description of the 'poisoning' of the king by Buckingham and his mother will be found inserted in Calderwood's History of the Church of Scotland, vol vii p 694 to the end.

EGLINTON, a surname derived from lands of that name in the district of Cunningham, county of Ayr, and possessed by an ancient family, some of whom were witnesses to the charters of King William the Lion and Alexander the Second and Third In the Ragman Roll appear the names of Sir Radulphus and Sir Raulph de Eglinton, as among those who swore a forced fealty to Edward the First in 1296 In 1361 Sir Hugh de Eglinton was justiciary of Lothian, and six years thereafter he was one of the commissioners for a treaty with England He married Egidia, or Giles, daughter of Walter, high steward of Scotland, and sister of King Robert the Second, widow of Sir James Lindsay of Crawford, and soon after the accession of his brother-in-law to the throne, his majesty granted to him certain lands in Ayrshire, Lanarkshire, and Mid Lothian He appears to have died soon after 1376 He had an only daughter, his sole heiress, Elizabeth, who married Sir John Montgomery, the seventh laird of Eaglesham ancestor of the earls of Eglinton [See MONTGOMERY, surname of] With her Sir John obtained the baronies of Eglinton and Ardrossan and the large possessions of the Eglinton family, and in consequence of this marriage he quartered the arms of Eglinton with his own

EGLINTON Earl of, a title in the peerage of Scotland, conferred in the year 1507, on Hugh, third Lord Montgomery, descended in a direct line from the above Sir John Montgomery of Eaglesham, and his wife Elizabeth de Eglinton This Sir John Montgomery (for whose extraction and descent see MONTGOMERY, surname of) invariably proved himself a true friend of his country, and in 1388, he and his eldest son, Hugh, accompanied the earl of Douglas in his expedition into England, and distinguished himself at the battle of Otterburn, or Chevy Chase, where he commanded part of the Scots force, by taking prisoner Henry Percy, surnamed Hotspur According to the Scotch version of the ballad on this famous fight

> The Percy and Montgomery met
> That either of other were fain
> They swapped swords and they twa swat,
> And aye the blood ran down between
>
> Yield thee, O yield thee Percy' he said,
> Or else I shall lay thee low!

'Whom to shall I yield,' earl Percy said
'Sin I see it maun be so?'

* * * * * *

"'I will not yield to a braken bush,
Nor yet will I to a brier,
But I would yield to Earl Douglas,
Or Sir Hugh Montgomery if he were here.'

"As soon as he knew it was Montgomery,
He stack his sword's point to the ground,
And Sir Hugh the Montgomery was a courteous knight,
And quickly took him by the hand."

Hugh, being a common name in the Montgomery family, is here employed instead of John. At the same battle Hugh, the eldest son of this gallant knight, was slain by an arrow, which transfixed his heart. With Percy's ransom Sir John built the castle of Polnoon in Renfrewshire, which has ever since continued one of the seats of the family He had four sons, and was succeeded by Sir John Montgomery, the second son, Hugh, the eldest, having left no issue Alexander, the third son, was designed of Bonnington The youngest, who became tutor to his grand nephew, the third lord Montgomery, was also named Hugh, having been born after his eldest brother's death.

Sir John Montgomery, the second son and successor, designed of Eaglesham, Eglinton, and Ardrossan, obtained letters of safeguard into England, on 21st September 1405, and also on 1st November 1406, to treat for the release of the earl of Douglas, who had been taken prisoner at the battle of Homildon in 1402, and on 20th April 1408 he became one of his hostages. He was soon, however, released, as, on 15th May 1412, he had a letter of safe conduct into England His lordship, along with William Lauder, bishop of Glasgow, lord high chancellor of Scotland, and other commissioners, had a letter of safe-conduct, 12th May, 1423, to treat about the ransom of King James the First, and he had another to the same effect 16th September following He was one of the hostages for King James, his annual revenue being established at seven hundred marks. He returned to Scotland in 1424, and received the honour of knighthood at his majesty's coronation. He was one of the jury on the trial of Murdach, duke of Albany, his two sons, and the duke of Lennox, at Stirling, 24th May, 1425. He died before August 10, 1430 By his wife, Margaret, only daughter of Sir Robert Maxwell of Caerlaverock, he had two sons and two daughters. Robert, the second son, was ancestor of the Montgomeries of Macluehill and Stanhope, in the county of Peebles, baronets, and of other families of the name.

Sir Alexander de Montgomery of Ardrossan, the eldest son, a man of great abilities, was by James the First admitted, in 1425, when but a youth, a member of his privy council, and in August 1430 was appointed governor of Kintyre and Knapdale, jointly with Sir Robert Cunningham of Kilmaurs, ancestor of the earls of Glencairn After the assassination of King James the First, being in equal favour with his son, King James the Second, he was continued in the privy council From that monarch he obtained several grants of land, in consideration of his great loyalty and faithful services, and in 1438 was joined with Sir Alexander Gordon and Mr John Methven, secretary of state, and other commissioners, to treat of a peace with the English, when they concluded a truce for nine years. In 1444, 1447, and 1449, he was also much employed in negociations with England, and in 1451 he was one of the conservators of the truce with that kingdom He was created a lord of parliament by the title of Lord Montgomery before 31st January 1448–9 when the office of bailiary of the barony of Cunningham was granted to him. In 1459, he was again a conservator of a truce with England, and on 2d June 1460, he obtained a safe-conduct to go into that kingdom with twenty persons in his train, on the affairs of the truce. He died soon after 6th June 1461. With three daughters, he had three sons, Alexander, master of Montgomery, who predeceased his father, in 1452, George, ancestor of the Montgomeries of Skelmorley, from whom the present earl of Eglinton descends through an heiress, and Thomas, rector of Eaglesham

The master of Montgomery had married Elizabeth, eldest daughter of Sir Adam Hepburn of Hales, and by her had Alexander, second Lord Montgomery, Robert of Broadstane, from whom the earls of Mount Alexander, Viscounts Montgomery, in Ireland (titles which became extinct in 1758), and the Montgomeries of Grey Abbey, Downshire, were lineally descended, Hugh Montgomery of Hislot, and a daughter, Margaret, the wife of Alexander, first Lord Home.

Alexander, second Lord Montgomery, who succeeded his grandfather in 1461, had also three sons, Hugh, James of Smithston, and John

The eldest son, Hugh, third Lord Montgomery, and first earl of Eglinton, born about 1460, being under age at his father's death, was placed under the tutorship of his father's uncle, Hugh Montgomery, as already stated. He attached himself to the party of James the Fourth, and on the accession of that monarch to the throne in 1488, he was made by him one of his privy council. On the 14th October the same year, for the good services done to his majesty by him, particularly in the field of Sauchieburn near Stirling on the 11th of June, he obtained a remission for throwing down the house of Turnelaw, and carrying off goods from thence, and for all other offences committed by him previous to the 29th August preceding the said 14th of October In 1489 he obtained a grant of the constabulary of the royal castle of Rothesay, and on 4th July 1498, he had a charter of the offices of bailie of Cunningham and chamberlain of the town of Irvine, which offices had formerly belonged to his grandfather, Alexander Montgomery The grant of the office of bailiary of Cunningham produced a feud between the Eglinton and Glencairn families which occasionally led to deeds of violence, and caused tedious and fruitless appeals to umpires till after the union of the crowns. In 1507 Lord Montgomery was created earl of Eglinton After the fatal field of Flodden, 9th September 1513, he was one of the peers who met in parliament at Perth early in the following month, when the coronation of the infant king, James the Fifth, was fixed for the 21st of the same month, and he was nominated one of the queen mother's counsellors. On 28th October 1515, he was made keeper of the Isle of Little Cumray, for the preservation of the game there, till the king should be fifteen years of age, and on 21st February 1526–7, he was appointed justice general of the northern parts of Scotland, till James should attain the age of twenty-five years. After the young king's escape from the yoke of the Douglases in May 1528, the earl and his second son, Lord Montgomery, were among the nobles who attended the first free council held by his majesty at Stirling. In November of the same year the earl's house of Eglinton was burnt by William Cunningham, master of Glencairn and his accomplices, and in consequence of the charters, writs, and evidents of his lands being destroyed therein, the king granted him a new charter of them under the great seal, dated 23d January 1528–9 On the king's matrimonial excursion to France in 1536, the earl of Eglinton was appointed a member of the regency empowered to administer the government in his absence, the other members being Bethune, archbishop of St. Andrews, Dunbar, archbishop of Glasgow, the earls of Huntly and Montrose, and Lord Maxwell. On December 24, 1540, a remission was granted to Hugh, earl of Eglinton, his two sons, and thirty others, for abiding from the army at Solway He died in June 1545, in the 85th year of his age. He had lived in the time of five sovereigns of Scotland, having been born in the last year of King James the Second, and died in the third of Queen Mary With six daughters he had six sons Alexander, Lord Montgomery, his eldest son, died in 1498, unmarried, John, the second son, at first designed master of Eglinton, was after his brother's death, styled Lord Montgomery, Sir Niel, the third, was ancestor of the Montgomeries of Lainshaw, William of Greenfield, the fourth son, was ancestor of the Montgomeries of Auchenhood and other families of the name; Hugh, the fifth, married Jean, daughter and heiress of Lord Lisle, and Robert, the youngest, was bishop of Argyle, and had three sons, who were legitimated after his death.

John, the second but eldest surviving son, is designed master of Montgomery in the records of parliament, 12th July 1505. On 18th November of that year, he was summoned to underlie the law and censure of treason, for wounding William Cunningham of Craigends. In the famous street conflict at Edinburgh, between the earls of Arran and Angus, and their adherents, on 28th April 1520, he was killed on the side of Arran, in the lifetime of his father By his wife, Elisabeth, daughter of Sir Archibald Edmonstone of Duntreath, he had (with a daughter, Christian, married to Sir James Douglas of Drumlanrig, ancestor of the dukes of Queenberry) two sons, Archibald master of Eglinton, and Hugh, second earl. The name of the former occurs in the records of parliament, 21st November 1526, as having been on the king's side, but in reality on that of the Douglases, in the encounters with Scott of Buccleuch at Melrose, and the earl of Lennox at Linlithgow that year, and he died soon after without issue.

Hugh, second earl of Eglinton, succeeded his grandfather in June 1545, and died 3d September 1546 By his countess, Mariota, daughter of the third Lord Seton, he had, with two daughters, a son, Hugh, third earl, who was a minor when he succeeded to the honours and estates of his family In May 1561, with others of the nobility, he accompanied the Lord James Stewart, afterwards the regent Moray, when he went to France to invite the young queen, Mary, on the death of her husband, the French king, Francis, to return to Scotland, and on her voyage home, in August of that year, he was on board the only ship taken by the English fleet sent to intercept her, but soon after being carried to London, he was released. He adhered firmly to Mary, in all her troubles, and at the head of his retainers was personally engaged on her side at the battle of Langside, where he was taken prisoner In the parliament held by the regent Moray, 19th August 1568, he was declared guilty of treason He long continued faithful to the queen's cause but at last, in April 1571, by the persuasion of the earl of Morton, soon after elected regent, with the earls of Argyle and Cassillis, and other lords of the queen's party, he submitted to the king's authority, and appeared in the parliament held at Stirling in September of that year In the parliament held in the same place in July 1578, he was chosen one of the lords of the articles. He died in June 1585, having been twice married, first, to Lady Jean Hamilton, youngest daughter of the regent Arran, duke of Chatelherault, which marriage, on account of consanguinity, was dissolved in 1562 and, secondly, to Margaret, daughter of Sir John Drummond of Innerpeffry, by whom he had two sons and two daughters, namely, Hugh, fourth earl of Eglinton, and Robert of Giffen, who, by his wife, Margaret, daughter of Sir Mathew Campbell of Loudoun, had one daughter, his sole heiress, married to her cousin, Hugh, fifth earl of Eglinton; Margaret, the earl's elder daughter, was married to Robert earl of Wintoun, and carried on the line of this family The second daughter, Agnes, married Robert, fourth lord Semple.

Hugh, the fourth earl, a youth of great promise and singular endowments, enjoyed his inheritance only about ten months, having, on 19th April 1586, fallen the victim of his family's hereditary feud. As he was riding, after dinner on that day, attended only by his ordinary domestics, from his own castle of Eglinton towards Stirling, where the court then was, he was attacked in the low grounds near the bridge of Annock, by John Cunningham, brother of the earl of Glencairn, David Cunningham of Robertland, John Cunningham of Clonbeith, Alexander Cunningham of Corsehill, and others of the name, to the number of thirty-four, and his small retinue being dispersed or slain, he was himself shot dead by a pistol fired by Cunningham of Clonbeth He had dined at the house of Lainshaw, and it is said that the Cunninghams got notice of his being there by the Lady of Lainshaw, Margaret Cunningham, a daughter of Cunningham of Aiket, (others say, it was a servant of the name of Cunningham) hanging a white table napkin from the battlements, as a signal, most of the parties implicated in the murder residing within sight of it. The earl of Glencairn disclaimed all connexion with this foul act, and left his friends to the law In the meantime, the friends of the Eglinton family flew to arms, and killed every Cunningham that came in their way The laird of Aiket, one of the principal persons concerned in the bloody deed, was shot near his own house, Robertland and Corsehill escaped, Clonbeith, the actual murderer, was pursued by a party of Montgomeries, with the earl's brother, the master of Eglinton at their head, as far as Hamilton, and a house in which he had taken refuge being beset, he was discovered by John Pollok of that ilk, a bold daring man, son-in-law of the laird of Lainshaw, concealed in a chimney, on which he was cut to pieces on the spot. The lady of Lainshaw was forced to abscond, it was said to Ireland, but she was for a long time concealed in the house of one of her husband's tenants. Twenty years after this event, namely, on the 1st of July 1606 the feud between the Montgomeries and Cunninghams again broke out in a violent tumult at Perth, under the very eyes of the parliament and the privy council, and the matters in dispute between them having been referred by his majesty to six on either side, were finally settled by the active negociation of his majesty's commissioner, the earl of Dunbar, in the following February

Hugh, fifth earl, only son of the murdered nobleman, was an infant when deprived of his father, and in consequence was placed under the charge of his maternal uncle, Robert Boyd of Badenheath, his mother, the widowed countess, being Egidia, (or Giles,) eldest daughter of Robert fourth Lord Boyd He was in especial favour with King James the Sixth, who had planned a marriage between him and the Lady Gabriella Stuart, sister of the duke of Lennox, which, however, did not take place, owing, it is supposed, to the death of the lady He obtained a grant of all the lands and titles that had belonged to the dissolved abbey of Kilwinning, with the patronage of sixteen parish churches, all of which were erected into a temporal lordship, of which he had a charter under the great seal, 5th January 1603–4 He married his cousin, Margaret, daughter and sole heiress of Robert Montgomery of Giffen, an unhappy marriage, according to the

MS. history of the family, as it ended in a divorce, and the lady afterwards became the wife of the sixth Lord Boyd. Having no issue, he made a resignation and settlement of the earldom and entail on Sir Alexander Seton of Foulstruther, son of his aunt, Margaret, countess of Wintoun, (heir of line of the family,) and the heirs male of his body, he and they taking the name and arms of Montgomery; which settlement was confirmed by charter under the great seal, dated 28th November 1611, and his lordship died in the following year

He was succeeded as sixth earl by his cousin, the said Sir Alexander Seton, who, in accordance with the deed of adoption, changed his name to Montgomerie From King James the Sixth he obtained a charter, dated at Whitehall, 24th March 1615, ratifying and confirming all the honours, dignities and precedency, enjoyed by any former earl of Eglinton According to a family anecdote, his lordship of Kilwinning, that had been granted to the fifth earl by charter in January 1603–4, having been conferred by the king on Sir Michael Balfour, of Burleigh, the earl who, from his bold and undaunted character, had acquired the cognomen of Greysteel, remonstrated in strong terms against this invasion of his rights, but receiving no redress, after a tedious correspondence, he waited personally upon the king's favourite for the time, (Car, earl of Somerset,) and signified to him that though little acquainted with the intricacies of the law, or of court etiquette, he knew the use of his sword, and expected to have justice done to him The result was an immediate inquiry into the merits of the case, and his claims being found just, the property was restored to him, and a charter of confirmation of the former one granted 26th April 1615 For the delay that took place in the recognition of his titles, the continuator of Nisbet (System of Heraldry, vol ii p 59) endeavours to account by saying "Though Montgomerie, earl of Eglinton, could dispose of his estate, he could not make over his honours to Sir Alexander Seton and it was some time before King James the Sixth could be prevailed upon to confirm them, which was at last done by the intercession of the queen upon Seton's marrying Lady Anne Livingstone (daughter of Alexander first earl of Linlithgow) who was one of the queen's maids of honour and the titles and precedency of the earls of Eglinton were confirmed to him" This marriage however had taken place two or three years before, as it appears from the register of the parish of Tranent, that the eldest son was born on the 8th April 1613 Playfair (British Family Antiquity, vol iii p 277) says that the fifth earl had one son, Robert, who died before his father, in 1602 leaving a daughter, the wife of Robert, Lord Boyd, without issue and she, surviving her grandfather, immediately on his death assumed the titles of Eglinton as his heir of line but afterwards yielded them to Alexander, sixth earl, by a deed dated 4th March 1615. All this, however, is a manifest error It appears that it was through the influence of his uncle, the earl of Dunfermline, then lord chancellor, and of Lord Binning, afterwards earl of Melrose and Haddington, that he was at last allowed the earldom

The earl of Eglinton was one of the Scots nobles who attended the funeral of James the Sixth in Westminster Abbey on the 7th May 1625 On the rising of the Scots parliament, 28th May 1633, he carried the sword before King Charles the First, from the parliament-house Edinburgh, to Holyrood-house palace. On the 7th September 1641 he was admitted a member of his majesty's privy council. On the 13th November the same year, he was one of the councillors nominated by the Scots parliament, and also a commissioner for receiving brotherly assistance from the parliament of England and for serving the articles of the treaty with that nation. In 1642 he was a member of the General Assembly of the Church of Scotland, when the solemn league and covenant was resolved upon, and the same year he had the command of one of the regiments sent to Ireland, to suppress the rebellion there. In 1643 he was in the Scots army sent to the assistance of the English parliament, and was present at the battle of Marston Moor that year, when the royalists were defeated. In 1646 he was elected one of the committee of estates during the interval betwixt the sessions of parliament. In 1648 he opposed the "Engagement" to march into England, to attempt the relief of the king, and on the defeat of the duke of Hamilton at Preston being known in Scotland, a party of the western Covenanters, under the command of the earl's youngest son, Robert Montgomerie, attacked a troop of the earl of Lanark's horse, quartered in Ayrshire, killed some, and routed the rest. The committee of estates immediately ordered out all the fencible men in the kingdom to put down the rising, but at the head of a large body of Covenanters, with the lord chancellor Loudoun, and some ministers, the earl, who had joined the party of the marquis of Argyle, advanced to Edinburgh, which city they entered without opposition, the magistrates and ministers, on their approach, going out to welcome them After the disbanding of the two opposing armies, Argyle, the chancellor Loudoun, the earl of Eglinton and others, met at Edinburgh, and, under the title of the committee of estates, summoned a parliament on the 4th of January 1649 On King Charles the Second's arrival in Scotland in 1650, the earl was appointed colonel of his majesty's horse regiment of life-guards (Balfour's Annals, vol iv p. 85), and by his advice his majesty came from Stirling, on the 29th July, to visit the camp at Leith His lordship was present at Dunfermline, with Argyle, Lothian, Tweeddale, Lorn, and other heads of that party at the first council held by the king since his coming to Scotland, when the famous 'declaration' was presented to his majesty, which with some modification, was signed by Charles on the 16th of August. In the following year the earl raised a regiment for the king's service, but with his fourth son James, was surprised at Dumbarton, when in bed, by a party of English horse and sent prisoner first to Hull, and then to Berwick where he remained in confinement till the Restoration, when he was restored to all his estates and honours. He died 7th January 1661 in the 71st year of his age

His first countess died in 1632, and he married again, Margaret, eldest daughter of Walter, first Lord Scott of Buccleuch widow of Lord Ross, but by her he had no issue. By his first wife he had, with two daughters, five sons, namely, Hugh, seventh earl, the Hon Sir Henry Montgomerie of Giffen the Hon Alexander, who died in Ireland, the Hon Colonel James, of Coilsfield, immediate ancestor of the present earl, and the Hon General Robert Montgomerie, who was first engaged on the side of the parliament, in whose army he attained the rank of major-general, but on the arrival of Charles the Second in Scotland he repaired to the royal standard, and distinguished himself at the battle of Dunbar, 3d April 1650 Accompanying the king into England, he acted as major-general of his majesty's horse at the battle of Worcester in 1651, and after receiving several wounds he was taken prisoner, and confined in the castle of Edinburgh, whence he escaped in 1659 He afterwards joined Charles the Second on the continent, and was made one of the gentlemen of his bedchamber, returning with him at the Restoration. From his religious and conscientious disposition he was exposed to some suffering in the after persecutions of the period.

Hugh, seventh earl, born 8th April 1613, continued constant in his attachment to Charles the First, from the beginning of his troubles to the end. In 1643, when Lord Montgomerie, he raised a troop of horse at his own expense, and, marching into England with them, fought at their head on his majesty's side, at Marston Moor, when his father was in the opposite ranks. He was personally engaged in several other battles and skirmishes in support of the royal cause, for which he was particularly excepted out of Cromwell's act of indemnity in 1654. At the Restoration he had a large share of Charles' favour He died in 1669 He married, first, Anne, daughter of James, marquis of Hamilton, by whom he had an only daughter, Anne, secondly, Lady Mary Leslie, daughter of the fifth earl of Rothes, and had with her five daughters and two sons, Alexander, eighth earl, and the Hon Francis Montgomerie of Giffen, one of the lords of the privy council, and a commissioner of the Treasury in the reigns of King William and Queen Anne. He was for several years member for Ayrshire in the Scots parliament, and in 1705 was nominated one of the commissioners for the treaty of union He steadily supported that measure, and in February 1707, he was one of the members chosen to the parliament of Great Britain The daughters were all married, Lady Mary, to the third earl of Wintoun, Lady Margaret, to the second earl of Loudoun, Lady Christian, to the fourth Lord Balmerino, Lady Eleonora, to Sir David Dunbar of Balnoon, baronet, and Lady Anne, to Sir Andrew Ramsay of Abbotshall, baronet. It is recorded by Wodrow, to the honour of the fourth of these ladies, Lady Eleonora Dunbar, that, during the persecuting times, she concealed and sustained two Presbyterian ministers in a house in Kilwinning for several years. Indeed to the credit of the Eglinton family it may be stated that they never countenanced the oppressive measures of that period, and yet they lost none of their influence at court.

Alexander, eighth earl, was one of the early supporters of the Revolution, and on 1st May 1689 was sworn one of the lords of the privy council to King William In 1687, during the ascendency of the prelatic party in Scotland, he had influence enough to procure a license for a presbyterian minister to hold a meeting-house at Kilwinning, to which the gentry and others from the surrounding parishes resorted for baptism to their children, as appears in the session records of that parish. He died in 1701 He was twice married first, to Lady Elizabeth Crichton, eldest daughter of the second earl of Dumfries, by whom he had three sons and one daughter, and, secondly, in December 1698, to Catherine, daughter of Sir William St Quentin of Harpham, in the county of York, baronet. This lady had previously been thrice married, and was ninety years of age on her union with Lord Eglinton, and it is said survived him. The family tradition respecting this singular marriage is that, besides being uncommonly elegant in person and manners, she had, on some occasion, been instrumental in essentially promoting his lordship's interest in his early years.

His eldest son, Alexander, ninth earl, was one of the privy council of King William and a commissioner of the treasury In 1700, in his father's lifetime, he obtained the king's letter to sit and vote in the Scots parliament in place of the lord high treasurer, and, after succeeding to the title, he was, in 1711, elected one of the sixteen representative Scots peers and rechosen in 1713. He was one of Queen Anne's privy council, and one of the commissioners of the chamberlain court in 1711 During the rebellion of 1715, he actively promoted the training and disciplining of the fencible men of Ayrshire, and joined the earls of Kilmarnock and Glasgow and Lord Semphill at Irvine, 22d August that year, when six thousand men appeared in arms in support of the government. By his prudent management, his lordship cleared the estate of a large amount of debt, and made several purchases of land, and died in March 1729 He was thrice married first, in 1676, to Margaret, eldest daughter of Lord Cochrane, the son of the first earl of Dundonald, secondly, to Lady Anne Gordon, daughter of the earl of Aberdeen, high chancellor of Scotland, and, thirdly, to Susannah, daughter of Sir Archibald Kennedy of Culzean, baronet, celebrated for her personal beauty, and her patronage of the Scottish muses of her day It is stated that on her being brought to Edinburgh, just about the time of the Union, by her father, she was surrounded by wooers, of whom Sir John Clerk, baronet, of Pennycuik, was likely to be the successful one, when on consulting the earl, whose second countess was then alive, but in a long-continued state of ill health, as to the propriety of the match, his lordship said, "Bide awee, Sir Archie, my wife's verv sickly" He was little more than forty when he married this his third countess. To her the Gentle Shepherd, first published in 1725, is dedicated both in Allan Ramsay's prose and Hamilton of Bangour's flattering verse. Several other publications of the period were inscribed to her ladyship, and to her Ramsay dedicated the music of his first book of songs, a little work now very rare At a later period he presented to the countess the original manuscript of his great pastoral poem, which she afterwards gave to James Boswell, and it is now preserved in the library at Auchinleck, along with the presentation letter of the poet. She died in 1780, in the ninety-first year of her age.

By his first wife the earl had two sons and four daughters, namely, Hugh, Lord Montgomerie, who died while at the college of Glasgow in 1696, unmarried, and Alexander, who also died young The daughters were all well married The second daughter, 'Lady Effie,' or Euphemia, became the wife of George Lockhart of Carnwath, M P, commonly called 'Union Lockhart,' author of the 'Memoirs of Scotland,' and it is said proved an able auxiliary to him in many of his secret intrigues on behalf of the exiled Stuarts. Dr Daniel Wilson in his Memorials of Edinburgh, vol ii p 21, gives the following curious anecdote of her ladyship, which he says he obtained from a grandnephew of Lady Lockhart When not engaged in attending parliament, Mr Lockhart resided chiefly at his country seat of Dryden, while Lady Effie paid frequent visits to Edinburgh, disguised in male attire She used to frequent the coffeehouses, and other places of public resort, and joining freely in conversation with the Whig partisans, she often obtained important information It chanced on one occasion that Mr Forbes, a zealous Whig, but a man of profligate habits, had been intrusted with some important private papers implicating her husband to forward to government. Lady Euphemia dressed her two sons, fair and somewhat effeminate-looking youths, in gay female attire, and sending them out to the cross, they soon attracted the notice of the Whig gallant, and so won on him by their attentions that he was induced to accompany them to a neighbouring tavern, where the pretended courtezans fairly drank him below the table, and then rifled him of the dangerous papers.

By his second wife, the earl had one daughter, Lady Mary Montgomerie, whose beauty is celebrated in Hamilton of Bangour's poetry, married to Sir David Cunningham of Milnecraig, in Ayrshire, baronet, and by his third wife, the lovely Countess Susannah, he had three sons, James, Lord Montgomerie, who died under age, Alexander, tenth earl of Eglinton, and Archibald, eleventh earl, and seven daughters, who were all married but one To them their handsome mother transmitted a nobleness of mien, distinguished at the period as the "Eglinton air."

Alexander, tenth earl, was only three years of age when he succeeded his father in 1729. In the summer of the following year, a desolating storm of hail spread over three distinct baronies of the Eglinton estate, to the almost utter destruction of the crops. This gave rise to a lawsuit, and after several years' litigation, the court of session decided that the tenants were not that year liable in rent. Even the miller, to whose mill the corns were astricted, was allowed a deduction from his rent, on account of the defalcation in the multures. In 1748, under the act for abolishing the heritable jurisdictions, his lordship got seven thousand eight hundred pounds, in full of his claim of twelve thousand pounds, for the redeemable sheriffship of Renfrew, the bailiary of the regality of Kilwinning, and the regality of Cunningham. In 1759 he was appointed governor of the castle of Dumbarton, and on the accession of George the Third, in the following year, he was made one of the lords of the bedchamber, but resigned that appointment in 1767. In 1761 he was chosen one of the Scots representative peers, and in 1768 was re-chosen. To his patriotic exertions the country chiefly owes the act which abolished the optional clause of the Scots banks to refuse payment of their notes for no less than six months after demand. He first commenced that system of agricultural improvement, introducing a new mode of farming in his own estates, which was soon adopted in other parts of Ayrshire. He also instituted an agricultural society, over which he presided for several years. His death was a violent one, and at the time was considered a severe public loss. While riding on the 24th October 1769, near Ardrossan, his carriage and four servants following him, he met two men, one of whom, Mungo Campbell, an officer of excise at Saltcoats, had a gun in his hand, and alighting from his horse, his lordship desired him, as he had formerly been detected killing game on his estates, to deliver up his gun, which he refused, and, to intimidate him, the earl then ordered his fowling-piece, which was not loaded, to be brought from the carriage. In the scuffle that ensued, Campbell fired at Lord Eglinton, who was mortally wounded, and died about one o'clock the following morning, at Eglinton castle, where he had been carried. The murderer was tried before the high court of justiciary at Edinburgh, and condemned to death, but prevented a public execution by hanging himself in prison. Dying unmarried, the earl was succeeded by his brother, Archibald, eleventh earl, a general in the army and colonel of the 51st foot. He raised the 77th foot, Highlanders, of which he was made lieutenant-colonel-commandant, 4th January 1757, and accompanying that corps to America, served under General Amherst in the war which terminated in the peace of 1763. He was M P for the county of Ayr, and held the office of equerry to the queen from 1761 to his succession to the title. On 1st March 1764 he was appointed governor of the castle of Dumbarton, and in February 1766, deputy ranger of Hyde Park and St. James' Park. In 1776 he was elected one of the sixteen Scots representative peers, on a vacancy, and rechosen at the general elections 1780, 1784, and 1790. In 1782 he was appointed governor of the castle of Edinburgh, and in 1798 he raised a regiment of fencibles, of which his cousin, Hugh Montgomerie of Coilsfield, was appointed colonel. He was for some years colonel of the Scots Grey. He died 30th October 1796, having been twice married, and had two daughters, Lady Mary, the elder, married Archibald, Lord Montgomerie, eldest son of Hugh, twelfth earl of Eglinton, thus uniting the lineal and male branches of the family, and Lady Susanna, who died 16th November 1805, in her 18th year, unmarried.

On the death of the eleventh earl without male issue, a large proportion of the estates devolved upon his elder and only surviving daughter, Lady Montgomerie, while the titles, with about one-half of the lands, fell to the heir male, Hugh Montgomerie of Coilsfield, descended from Colonel James Montgomerie, fourth son of Sir Alexander Seton, sixth earl. The estate of Coilsfield had been purchased by Colonel Montgomerie from the family of Caprington.

Hugh, twelfth earl, a munificent and patriotic nobleman, born about 1740, entered the army in 1755, as an ensign in a regiment of infantry. He served in America during the greater part of the seven years' war, and was fourteen years captain in the first or royal regiment of foot. On the commencement of hostilities with France in 1778, he was appointed major in the Argyle or Western Fencibles, which had been raised in the western counties of Scotland, under the joint influence of the Argyle and Eglinton families, of which Lord Frederick Campbell was colonel. At the general election in 1780, Major Montgomerie was chosen M P for Ayrshire, in opposition to Sir Adam Ferguson of Kilkerran, baronet, the previous member. He succeeded his father in the estate of Coilsfield, on his death in 1788, and in 1784 was again returned for Ayrshire, but in 1789 vacated his seat on being appointed inspector of military roads, the duties of which office he performed for some years with great assiduity, travelling on foot over extensive tracts of rugged ground in the Highlands, for the purpose of ascertaining the proper courses for the roads. [Douglas's Peerage, Edited by Wood, vol. i p. 510.] On the declaration of war by the French convention against Great Britain and Holland in 1793, seven regiments of fencibles were ordered to be raised in Scotland, for the internal defence of the country. Of one of these, the West Lowland fencibles, raised chiefly in Ayrshire, Major Montgomerie was appointed colonel. Although a Lowland regiment, both in name and men, it wore the Highland dress. Soon after he raised a regiment of the line called 'the Glasgow regiment,' which was disbanded in 1795, the men being drafted into other regiments. About this time he was appointed lieutenant-governor of Edinburgh castle, in the room of Lord Elphinstone. In 1796 he was again returned member of parliament for the county of Ayr, but almost immediately thereafter he succeeded his cousin, Archibald, in the earldom of Eglinton.

In 1798 he was elected one of the representative peers of Scotland, on a vacancy, and rechosen at the general election in 1802. In 1806 he was raised to the British peerage by the title of Baron Ardrossan. He was also a Knight of the Thistle, lord-lieutenant of Ayrshire, and one of the prince of Wales' state councillors in Scotland.

Distinguished alike by his good taste and his public spirit, the twelfth earl continued the valuable improvements of his lands, especially in the neighbourhood of Kilwinning, which had been begun and carried on by his two immediate predecessors. He also rebuilt Eglinton castle, a magnificent edifice, situated on the banks of the Lugton, 2½ miles north of Irvine in Ayrshire, and 26 from Glasgow. It is of a castellated form, and was built about the year 1798. A spectator, looking upon it from any part of the lawns, has high conceptions of its grandeur, and of the taste and opulence of its proprietor. There is a large circular keep, and at the corners are circular turrets joined together by a curtain,—to use the language of fortification. The whole is pierced with modern windows, which in some degree destroy the castellated effect, but add to the internal comfort. The interior of the fabric corresponds with the magnitude and the beauty of the exterior From a spacious entrance-hall, a saloon opens, 36 feet in diameter, the whole height of the edifice and lighted from above; and from this the principal rooms enter All the apartments are spacious, well-lighted, and furnished and adorned in the most superb manner One of them in the front is 52 feet long, 32 wide, and 24 from floor to ceiling. Everything about the castle contributes to an imposing display of splendid elegance and refined taste Nor are the lawns around it less admired for their fine woods, varied surfaces, and beautiful scenery The park is 1,200 acres in extent, and has one-third of its area in plantation

In the improvement of the harbour of Ardrossan, at the mouth of the Clyde, the earl expended upwards of a hundred thousand pounds, and was obliged to sell several valuable portions of his estate, and to incur a heavy debt, without accomplishing his object. At his death the works were suspended He died on the 15th December 1819, aged eighty years. He had married his cousin Eleonora, daughter of Robert Hamilton of Bourtreehill, Ayrshire, by whom he had two sons and two daughters. The elder son, Archibald, Lord Montgomerie, a major-general in the army, died on the 4th January 1814, at Alicant in Spain, whither he had gone for the benefit of his health, having had by his wife, Lady Mary Montgomerie above mentioned, two sons, Hugh, who died when about six years of age, and to whose memory an elegant column of white marble was erected by his grandfather in a sequestered spot among the woods near Eglinton castle, and Archibald-William, thirteenth earl Their widowed mother took for her second husband on 13th January 1815, Sir Charles Montolieu Lamb, baronet, and died 12th June 1848. The Hon Roger Montgomerie, the earl's second son, a lieutenant in the navy, died of pestilential disease at Port Royal in Jamaica, in January, 1799, unmarried The elder daughter, Lady Jane, married in 1828, Edward Archibald Hamilton, Esq of Blackhouse, formerly of the Hon East India Company's service. They resided for a long time at Roselle, a seat of the earl of Eglinton, about two miles from Ayr Lady Jane Hamilton died in 1859 Lady Lilias, the younger daughter, married first in 1796, Robert Dundas Macqueen, Esq of Braxfield, who died in 1816, and secondly, in 1817, Richard Alexander Oswald, Esq of Auchincruive.

A portrait of the twelfth earl, in the costume of the West Lowland Fencibles, done by subscription, is placed in the Justiciary Hall of the County Buildings, Ayr It was painted by Sir Henry Raeburn, from the original in Eglinton castle. He was a brave soldier and a strict disciplinarian, but his oratorical powers were not of a high order His character has been thus correctly depicted by Burns in the 'Earnest Cry and Prayer,' as given in Cunningham's edition of his works

> "Thee, sodger Hugh, my watchman stented,
> If bardies e'er are represented,
> I ken, if that your sword were wanted,
> Ye'd lend your hand
> But when there's ought to say anent it
> Ye're at a stand."

In private life it is stated that the earl displayed much of the spirit and manners of the ancient baron He had the finest horses and equipages in the country He was greatly devoted to music, kept his family piper, and performed himself on the violin with considerable skill. He was the composer of the popular tunes called 'Lady Montgomerie's Reel,' and 'Ayrshire Lasses,' besides several other admired airs, a selection of which was published by Mr Turnbull of Glasgow

His grandson, Archibald-William Montgomerie, thirteenth earl, was born 29th December 1812, at Palermo in Sicily, where his father was at the time in the command of British troops. His mother, Lady Mary Montgomerie, was his father's cousin, and heiress of Archibald, the eleventh earl. In his early years he was intrusted to the care of his aunt, Lady Jane, and during his minority the Eglinton estate was relieved of many of the burdens on it. On obtaining the management of his own affairs in 1838, his lordship recommenced the works which had been so long suspended at Ardrossan, and that harbour, to the importance of which the railway betwixt Glasgow and Ayr adds considerably, is now in a prosperous condition A circular pier, 900 yards in length, covers the harbour on the south and west; while the Horse Isle—a rock presenting about twelve acres of good pasture—shelters it on the north-west, and the isthmus of Kintyre, and the island of Arran protect the channel from the violence of the Atlantic storms.

The Earl of Eglinton was, at one period, well known on the turf as an eminent supporter and patron of field sports. In August 1839 he got up at Eglinton castle a gorgeous pageant in imitation of the tournaments of the middle ages, one of the most distinguished actors in which was the prince Louis Napoleon elected 2d December 1852 emperor of the French. The Queen of Beauty on the occasion was Lady Seymour, youngest daughter of Thomas Sheridan, Esq, and granddaughter of the celebrated Richard Brinsley Sheridan, sister of the Hon Mrs. Norton Her ladyship married Lord Seymour, son and heir of the duke of Somerset, in 1830 In 1840 the earl of Eglinton was served heir male general of George, fourth earl of Wintoun (the fifth earl, who was attainted, having left no issue). On the accession to office of the earl of Derby's administration in February 1852, Lord Eglinton was appointed to succeed the earl of Clarendon as lord-lieutenant of Ireland, and remained in that high position until the earl of Aberdeen became Premier in the following December, he was reappointed in March 1858, when the earl of Derby resumed office, and continued in the post till a change of ministry in June 1859 In 1852 he was sworn a member of the privy council, and in November of the same year elected lord-rector of the university of Glasgow He is a doctor of laws and a doctor of civil law In 1842 he was appointed lord-lieutenant of Ayrshire, and was colonel of the Ayrshire militia from 1836 to 1852, when he resigned In 1853 he was made a knight of the Thistle, and in June 1859 created earl of Winton in the peerage of the United Kingdom He married, 1st in 1841, Theresa, daughter of Charles Newcomen, Esq, and widow of Richard Howe Cockerel, Esq, Commander, Royal Navy, by whom he had issue, Archibald-William, Lord Montgomerie, born in 1841; Lady Egidia, born in 1843, Hon. Seton-Montolieu, born in 1846, Hon George Arnulph, born in 1848. The countess died in 1853, and the earl married, 2dly, in 1858, when lord-lieutenant of Ireland, Lady Adela-Caroline Harriett Capel, born in 1828, daughter of Arthur Algernon, 6th earl of Essex, issue, two daughters. His 2d countess died Dec. 31st, 1860, after having given birth to a daughter on the 7th The earl himself died at St. Andrews, of apoplexy, Oct. 4, 1861 His eldest son, Archibald William, Lord Montgomerie, succeeded as 14th earl. His titles are, Baron Montgomerie (conferred before 1449), earl of Eglinton (before 1508), Baron Kilwinning (1615), in the peerage of Scotland, and Baron Ardrossan of Ardrossan (1806), and earl of Winton (1859) in the peerage of the United Kingdom The 13th earl was one of the most popular lords-lieutenant that Ireland ever possessed.

ELCHO, Lord, a title of the earl of Wemyss, usually borne by his eldest son. See WEMYSS, earl of.

ELDER, WILLIAM, an eminent engraver of the seventeenth century, was a native of Scotland, and excelled principally in heads He engraved a print of himself in a fur cap, and another in a wig Among his works are heads of Pythagoras, Dr Mayern, John Ray, Dr Morton, Archbishop Sancroft, George Parker, Charles Snell, writing-master, Admiral Russell, and Judge Pollexfen His best work was a plate of Ben Jonson He died about 1698

ELGIN, a surname derived from the parish or town of that name in the county of Moray or Elgin, which is generally supposed to have been so called from Helgy, one of the chiefs of the army of Sigurd the Norwegian earl of Orkney, who about 897 conquered Caithness, Ross, Sutherland, and Moray, and probably made a settlement at Elgin. As the word Helgyn is still used in the inscription on the incorporation seal of the town, it is probable that this etymology is correct.

ELGIN, Earl of, a title in the peerage of Scotland, possessed by a branch of the illustrious and royal house of Bruce, first conferred on 21st June 1633, by Charles the First on Thomas, third Lord Bruce of Kinloss, second son of the celebrated lawyer Sir Edward Bruce, created in 1602 Lord Bruce of Kinloss, a memoir of whom is given in the first volume of this work, page 423 The earl's elder brother, Edward, second Lord Bruce of Kinloss, one of the gentlemen of the bedchamber to King James the First of England, was killed in a duel near Bergen-op-Zoom, in August 1613, by Sir Edward Sackville, afterwards earl of Dorset The earl was, on 1st August 1641, created a peer of England by the title of Baron Bruce of Whorlton, in the county of York, and died on 21st December 1663, in the 65th year of his age.

His only son, Robert, second earl, was, with Thomas Wentworth, earl of Cleveland, appointed in 1660, lord lieutenant of the county of Bedford, and having given proofs of his loyalty to Charles the First, and been active in the restoration of Charles the Second, he was, 18th March 1663–4, created, in the English peerage, Baron Bruce of Skelton, in the county of York, Viscount Bruce of Ampthill, in the county of Bedford, and earl of Ailesbury, in the county of Buckingham He was afterwards constituted sole lord lieutenant of the county of Bedford, and in 1678 appointed one of the six peers who, with twelve members of the House of Commons, were nominated commissioners for taking the account of such monies as had been raised and assigned to his majesty during his war with the Dutch He was sworn of the privy council, 18th October 1673, and was one of the gentlemen of the bedchamber He was also a commissioner for executing the office of earl-marshal of England, as deputy of Henry, duke of Norfolk, and at the coronation of James the Second was one of the lords who carried St. Edward's staff On 30th July 1685 he was appointed lord chamberlain of the household. He died at Ampthill, 20th October 1685. Wood, in his Fasti Oxonienses, says that he was well versed in English history and antiquities, a lover of all such as were professors of those studies, and a curious collector of manuscripts, especially of those which related to England and English antiquities. He married Diana, daughter of Henry Grey, first earl of Stamford, by whom he had eight sons and nine daughters. Of the sons, five died young.

The sixth son, Thomas, third earl of Elgin and second of Ailesbury, by which title he is known in history, was amongst the first in 1688, to invite the prince of Orange to come to England, as a mediator between the king and the people, but on learning the prince's designs, he refused to sanction his dethronement of his father-in-law, and offered his services to King James, on the prince of Orange's embarking his troops for England. He accompanied the king in his barge on his departure for Rochester He never took the oaths to King William and Queen Mary, and on July 5, 1690, a proclamation was issued by the latter, during the absence of the king in Ireland, for his apprehension and that of several other persons who, like him, had incurred the suspicion of the government. His lordship, however, was not imprisoned on that occasion, and in 1691, King William gave the royal assent to an act to enable Thomas, earl of Ailesbury, and his countess, to make provision for payment of debts and to make leases of their estates. In 1695 the earl was accused of having been at a meeting held in May, at the Old King's Head Tavern, in Aldersgate Street, London, with other friends of the exiled family, for the purpose of consulting how to restore King James, whereupon he was committed to the Tower in February 1695–6 His countess, (Elizabeth Seymour, sister and heiress of William, duke of Somerset, with whom he got large estates in England,) was so afflicted at his confinement that she died in childbed soon after The earl was admitted to bail, on 12th February following, and obtained King William's permission to reside at Brussels. He there married, secondly, Charlotte, countess of Sannu, of the ancient and noble house of Argenteau, in the duchy of Brabant. He died at Brussels in November 1741, in the 86th year of his age. By his first wife he had four sons and two daughters, and by the second he had an only daughter, Charlotte Maria, married in 1722 to the prince of Horne, one of the princes of the empire. One of this lady's daughters, Elizabeth Philippina, married Prince Gustavus Adolphus of Stolberg Guedern, and was the mother of Louisa Maximiliana, the wife of the pretender, Prince Charles Edward Stuart.

The second and only surviving son, Charles, fourth earl of Elgin, and third of Ailesbury, was, on December 31, 1711, in the lifetime of his father, summoned by writ to the house of peers (being one of the twelve peers created and summoned that day, to secure a majority in the House of Lords for the Tory administration), by the title of Lord Bruce of Whorlton, and by letters patent, in 1746 he was created Lord Bruce of Tottenham in Wiltshire, to him and his heirs male, with limitation of that honour to his nephew, the Hon. Thomas Bruce, youngest son of George, earl of Cardigan, and the lady Elizabeth Bruce, his wife, the earl of Elgin's sister His lordship was thrice married, and by his first wife, Lady Anne Saville, eldest daughter and one of the coheiresses of William marquis of Halifax he had two sons, who both died young, and two daughters. By his second wife, a daughter of the earl of Burlington, he had no issue, and by his third countess, a daughter of the fourth duke of Argyle, he had a daughter, Lady Mary, who married Charles third duke of Richmond and Lennox.

In the fourth earl of Elgin ended the male line of Edward Lord Bruce of Kinloss, second son of Sir Edward Bruce of Blairhall, and by his leaving no male issue the title of earl of Ailesbury became extinct, and that of earl of Elgin devolved on the heir male, Charles Bruce, ninth earl of Kincardine in the Scottish peerage, [see KINCARDINE, earl of,] while the title of Lord Bruce of Tottenham reverted to his nephew, the Hon. Thomas Bruce Brudenell, already mentioned, created earl of Ailesbury 18th June 1776. The son of the latter was created marquis of Ailesbury, Earl Bruce, and Viscount Savernake in 1821.

Charles, fifth earl of Elgin, and ninth earl of Kincardine, (descended from Sir George Bruce of Carnock, third son of Edward Bruce of Blairhall, father of the first Lord Bruce of Kinloss,) was born about 1732, succeeded his father in the earldom of Kincardine in 1740, and his kinsman the earl of Elgin and Ailesbury, in his Scottish titles, in 1747, and was thenceforth styled earl of Elgin and Kincardine He was a nobleman distinguished by the goodness of his heart, his amiable manners, and many virtues. Residing almost constantly at his seat of Broomhall, in Fife, he devoted himself to the improvement of his lands, and was highly instrumental in promoting the agriculture of both parts of the United Kingdom Discovering a very extensive limestone rock on his estate, he employed about four hundred men in working it, built a town of a hundred houses for their accommodation, erected a number of kilns for burning the stone, and at a very considerable expense opened a fine harbour He married Martha, only child of Thomas White, Esq., an eminent merchant and banker, London, and had issue three daughters and four sons. His lordship died 14th May 1771 From the judicious manner in which his countess had educated her own children, she was selected to fill the important office of governess to the Princess Charlotte of Wales.

The eldest son, William Robert, sixth earl of Elgin and tenth of Kincardine, enjoyed the title only two months, dying at Broomhall 15th July 1771, in the eighth year of his age, and was succeeded by his next brother, Thomas, seventh earl The Hon Charles-Andrew Bruce, the third son of the fifth earl of Elgin, was placed on the Bengal civil establishment in 1783, and after being a senior merchant, second judge of the provincial court of appeal and circuit for the division of Calcutta, was appointed governor of Prince of Wales' Island, and died 27th December 1810 The Hon James Bruce, the fourth son, M P for Marlborough, and subsequently precis writer in the office of Lord Grenville, secretary of state, was drowned while crossing the Don in Yorkshire 10th July 1798, aged 28

The second son, Thomas, seventh earl of Elgin, and eleventh earl of Kincardine, celebrated as the collector of the Elgin marbles, was born 20th July 1766, and received his education at Harrow and Westminster schools, and at the university of St. Andrews. On leaving the university, he went to Paris, and for nearly two years studied there under a professor of public law He then proceeded to Germany, where he continued a considerable time, in the prosecution of military studies. In 1785 he entered the army as ensign in the third regiment of foot guards, and in 1789 he purchased a company in the 65th regiment of foot. In 1793, he had the brevet rank of major in the army, and, in 1795, was appointed major to the 12th regiment of foot. On raising a fencible regiment the same year he obtained the rank of lieutenant-colonel. In 1802 he became colonel, and on 25th October 1809, major-general. He attained to the full rank of general in 1837 He was also a lieutenant-general of the Royal Archers in Scotland

In 1790 Lord Elgin was sent on a special mission to Leopold the Second, emperor of Germany, whom, in the following year, he accompanied on a tour to his Italian dominions. When the British embassy quitted Paris in 1792, Lord Elgin was appointed envoy extraordinary to the court of Brussels, and when the French armies occupied the Netherlands in the end of that year, he was employed first at the court of the elector of Hesse Cassel, and afterwards with the Prussian army during their active operations in Germany, in the beginning of 1793. He was attached to the Austrian forces until the final evacuation of the Netherlands in 1794. In the following year he was appointed envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary to the king of Prussia. In 1799 he was constituted ambassador to Turkey, and he continued in the east till the French were finally driven out of Egypt. On that occasion he was invested with the Turkish order of the crescent.

His embassy to the Sublime Porte was the cause of his being able to preserve those magnificent relics of ancient Grecian sculpture to which his name has been given, and the removal of which to this country has been of so much service in promoting the study of the arts. On proceeding to Constantinople he visited Greece, which then formed part of the Turkish dominions, and anxious to rescue those beautiful remains of antiquity from that destruction to which they were evidently destined, availing himself of the opportunities of his station, he succeeded in forming, principally from the ruins of the Parthenon at Athens, a splendid collection of statues, basso-relievos, specimens of architecture, and other valuable fragments of ancient art, besides medals, and a very curious series of inscriptions, beginning with the famous Boustrophedon, which he was so fortunate as to procure at Cape Sigæum on the plain of Troy, containing specimens of all the variations in the Greek alphabet. These were safely brought over to England in 1814, and ultimately purchased by government for thirty-five thousand pounds, not half the sum spent by his lordship in collecting and transporting them to Great Britain, which, with the interest of the money expended, amounted to seventy-four thousand pounds. These invaluable specimens of art are now in the British Museum, under the name of the Elgin Marbles. When first brought over from Greece, they were placed in a stable-like apartment in the corner of Burlington House, London, where the kindness of his lordship admitted artists of all classes to view and draw from them

Much unmerited obloquy has been thrown on the earl of Elgin by Lord Byron and others, for removing these antiquities from Athens. 'The Curse of Minerva,' one of Lord Byron's most stinging satires, was especially directed against his lordship for this patriotic act. The noble poet also has an allusion to Lord Elgin's conduct in this respect, in his 'English Bards and Scotch Reviewers,' and he inserted some indignant remarks, on what he considered his plunder of the Parthenon, in a note to the second Canto of Childe Harold In an ode to 'The Parthenon,' in James and Horace Smith's series of poetical imitations, entitled 'Horace in London' published in 1813, Minerva is made to say in reference to Lord Elgin's removal of these ancient monuments of Athens and Lord Byron's satire

> "All who behold my mutilated pile,
> Shall brand its ravager with classic rage
> And soon a titled bard from Britain's isle
> Thy country's praise and suffrage shall engage
> And fire with Athens' wrongs an angry age.

But in despite of poetic ire the verdict of the public and of posterity on the subject is that Lord Elgin conferred a service on art, by bringing to England what has furnished, and will long continue to furnish, models of study for artists, of the very highest character Destruction would have been their fate had they not been removed by his lordship. Their removal was effected with the express sanction of the rulers of the country, and no dissatisfaction was evinced by the na tives. The dispersion of these invaluable remains, however, could only be prevented by their becoming the property of a nation, and the possession of them is a glory and an honour to Britain In the Vatican at Rome, in Wirtemberg, Russia, and other continental states, are casts in plaster of these superb relics of ancient Grecian art.

Lord Elgin established excellent schools at his lime and coal works in Fife, and somewhat embarrassed his fortune by improvements on his estate. He was one of the sixteen representatives of the Scottish peerage, having been first chosen at the general election of 1790. He was also president of the Society of Antiquaries in Scotland. He was twice married: first, 11th March 1799, to Mary, only child of William Hamilton Nisbet, Esq of Dirleton, Haddingtonshire, by whom he had issue two sons and three daughters. This marriage was dissolved in 1808, when Lady Elgin married Robert Fergusson, Esq of Raith His lordship married, secondly, 21st September 1810, Elizabeth, youngest daughter of James Townsend-Oswald, Esq of Dunikier, Fifeshire, and by her he had issue four sons and three daughters. He died 14th Nov 1841, and his two elder sons having predeceased him, he was succeeded by his eldest son by his second marriage.

This nobleman, James, eighth earl of Elgin and twelfth earl of Kincardine, born in Park Lane, London, 20th July 1811, was educated at Christ Church, Oxford, where he was first class in classics in 1832. He afterwards became a fellow of Merton. In August 1841 he was elected M P for Southampton, and succeeded his father as earl in November of the same year Governor-general of Jamaica from March 1842 to August 1846; governor-general of Canada 1846 to 1854 In March 1857 he was sent to China as plenipotentiary, and concluded there the treaties of 1858, Postmaster general in June 1859 Married, first, in April 1841, Elizabeth Mary, only child of Charles Lennox-Cumming-Bruce, Esq of Kinnaird and Roseisle, issue, a daughter, Lady Elma The countess died 7th July 1843. His lordship married, 2dly 7th Nov 1846, Lady Mary Louisa, a daughter of the earl of Durham, issue, four sons and a daughter ELIBANK, a title in the peerage of Scotland, conferred in 1643, on Sir Patrick Murray, descended from the Murrays of Blackbarony in Peebles-shire, who claim an ancient descent independent of all other families of the name, [see MURRAY, surname of,] and whose great ancestor is supposed to have been Johan de Morreff, in the Ragman Roll, one of those Scots barons who swore allegiance to Edward the First in 1296. William de Moray, conjectured to be his son, was one of the prisoners taken at the battle of Durham with King David the Second, 17th October 1346. John de Moravia or Murray, supposed to be this William's son, a man of distinguished rank and figure in the reigns of Kings Robert the Second and Third, is particularly mentioned in a charter of date 14th March 1409–10, as proprietor of the lands of Halton-Murray or Blackbarony From him descended in a direct line, Andrew Murray of Blackbarony, living in the sixteenth century, who by his second wife, Griselda, daughter of John Bethune of Creich, in Fife, relict of William Scott, younger of Branxholm, ancestor of the dukes of Buccleuch, had, with three daughters, Sir John Murray, his successor, from whom descended the Murrays of Blackbarony, baronets, of Ravelrig, Murrayshall, Cringletie, Henderland, and others of the name; Andrew, of whom there is no succession, Gideon, ancestor of the lords Elibank, and Sir William, of Clermont, in Fife, whose son, Sir William Murray of Clermont, was created a baronet of Nova Scotia, 1st July 1626, ancestor of Sir James Murray Pulteney, baronet, M P.

The third son, Sir Gideon Murray, an eminent lawyer, was appointed a lord of session, when he assumed the judicial title of Lord Elibank. In his youth he applied himself to the study of theology, but had the misfortune, in a quarrel, to kill a man of the name of Aitchison, for which he was imprisoned in the castle of Edinburgh. Having got into the good graces of the wife of Chancellor Arran, through her influence he procured his release and a remission. [Scott of Scotstarvet's Staggering State, p. 49] He now gave up all thoughts of the church, and became chamberlain to his nephew of the half-blood, Sir Walter Scott of Buccleuch. He was first designed of Glenpottie, and had a charter of the lands of Elibank, or Eliburn, in the county of Selkirk, with a salmon fishing in the Tweed, 15th March 1593–4. He is said to have carried the standard of Buccleuch, in a border conflict between the Scotts and the Johnstons, when Lord Maxwell was slain He was knighted by the earl of Dunfermline, lord chancellor, on 4th March 1605, and on 20th February 1610, he obtained a pension of twelve hundred pounds Scots from the earl of Dunbar, which was afterwards ratified by the estates. In 1611 the king presented him with what is described as a "guilt bassing (gilt basin), whiche was given to us by our burgh of Edinburgh, with thair propyne (gift) of money, at our first entrie of the said burgh, at our last being in our said kingdome. Togidder with two guilt cuppes, one of them in forme of a salmond, presented to us by our burgh of Glasgow, and another guilt cuppe, which was given us by the towne of Carliale. Togedder, also, with some remanent of musk and ambergreise which was unspent at our being thair, and lasthe, ane large iron chest, which did some time belong to the late earl of Gowrie." [Skene Papers, in Adv Lib. No. 21] In the parliament which met at Edinburgh, on 15th October 1612, he was member for the county of Selkirk, and was elected one of the lords of the articles for the small barons. He was also appointed a member of a commission for revising the penal statutes, and of another for settling the order of a taxation then granted to King James the Sixth, on the occasion of the marriage of his daughter, the princess Elizabeth When the king's favourite, Robert Kerr, (in England altered into Carr) afterwards earl of Somerset, was appointed lord high treasurer in 1613, he constituted Sir Gideon Murray his deputy, in which situation he was subsequently continued by the earl of Mar, when appointed to the same office. On the 2d November, the same year, he was admitted one of the lords of session. In 1616 his pension was augmented to two thousand four hundred pounds Scots, and extended to the lifetime of his two sons, and, at the same time, he received permission from the Lords of Exchequer, to import yearly thirty tons of wine free of duty which privilege was also extended to his sons. The entire management of the revenue of Scotland was in his lordship's hands, and it is acknowledged to have been so judicious that he was not only enabled to repair the palaces and royal residences of Holyroodhouse, Edinburgh castle, Linlithgow, Stirling castle, Dunfermline, Falkland, and Dumbarton castle, with the addition of new edifices to them all, but he had so much money in the treasury as to defray the expenses of James and his court on his visit to Scotland in 1617 The king had a very high sense of his services, and on one occasion, Sir Gideon happening, in the king's bedroom, to drop his chevron, his majesty, though both old and stiff, stooped down and gave him his glove, saying, "My predecessor, Queen Elizabeth, thought she did a favour to any man who was speaking with her, when she let her glove fall, that he might take it up, and give it to her, but, Sir, you may say a king lifted your glove." Yet for all this, James, in 1621, was induced, on an accusation made by James Stewart, Lord Ochiltree, of malversations in his office of treasurer depute, to order him to be sent a prisoner to Scotland, and a day was appointed for his trial. He was so much affected by this treatment that he took to bed, and abstained from food, believing, says Scotstarvet, [Staggering State, page 51,] that he had no money either to get meat or drink to himself, and, after an illness of twenty days, during the greater part of which he remained stupified and silent, he died on 28th June 1621. By Margaret Pentland, his wife, he had two sons and a daughter, Agnes, married to Sir William Scott of Harden, who was the eldest son of "The Flower of Yarrow." The second son was, in 1610, committed to the castle of Edinburgh for accepting of a challenge from the son of Lord Cranstoun, while the latter was sent to the castle of Blackness for sending it. Both youths being called before the privy council, a reconciliation took place, but Lord Cranstoun's son, for attempting to renew the quarrel, was banished the king's dominions till he could make his peace with his majesty. A curious letter on the subject, from the privy council to King James at London, under date 10th August 1610, is inserted in Pitcairn's Criminal Trials vol. iii. p. 505, quoted from the Denmylne MSS. in the Advocate's Library.

Sir Patrick Murray, the elder son, was appointed, in his father's lifetime, by a letter under the great seal, dated 27th June 1611, governor or keeper of the king's castle of Caerlaverock, with an annuity of fifty pounds sterling for life. He got several charters of land between 1613 and 1630, and was possessed of a large estate. On 16th May 1628 he was created a baronet of Nova Scotia, and in the parliament of June 1633 he was elected one of the lords of the articles for the barons. He was raised to the peerage by the title of Lord Elibank, by patent dated at Oxford, 18th March 1643, to him and his heirs male whatsoever. He adhered firmly to Charles the First during all the time of the civil war, and lent the king a large sum of money when at Oxford, his majesty's bond for which the family are said still to retain. He was one of the six peers who, in January 1647, opposed the delivering up of Charles to the parliament of England. He died 12th November 1649. His lordship was four times married, and had several children. One of his sons settled in Ireland, and was ancestor of the Murrays of Ravigny there.

His eldest son, by his second wife (Elizabeth, daughter of Sir James Dundas of Arniston) Patrick second Lord Elibank, joined the marquis of Montrose when he appeared in arms for Charles the First in 1644, and was fined twenty thousand merks by the committee of parliament in 1646. He died 13th February 1661. By his wife, Lady Elizabeth Stewart, second daughter of the second earl of Traquair, lord high treasurer of Scotland, he had, with one daughter two sons, Patrick, third lord, and the Hon. John Murray, a captain in the army, killed at the battle of Antrim, in Ireland.

Patrick, third lord, was a privy councillor to King James the Seventh, but in 1687 was laid aside for opposing the repeal of the penal laws, and died the same year. By his wife, Anne, daughter of Alexander Burnet, archbishop first of Glasgow, and afterwards of St. Andrews, and widow of the seventh Lord Elphinston, he had, with four daughters, one son, Alexander, fourth lord, born 9th March 1677. He was a minor at the time of his father's death, and on coming of age he took the oaths and his seat in the Scots parliament 19th July 1698. He supported the treaty of Union, and died in February 1736, in his fifty-ninth year. He married Elizabeth, daughter of Mr George Stirling, surgeon in Edinburgh, and M.P. for that city and by her he had, with several daughters, five sons.

II.

The Hon. Alexander Murray, the fourth son, was an ensign in the 26th foot or Cameroniana, his commission being dated 11th August 1737. He was so enthusiastic a Jacobite as to propose heading an insurrection in favour of the Pretender, and at the Westminster election of 1750, which was keenly contested, he was extremely active on the part of Sir George Vandeput, the candidate opposed to government. A complaint was preferred against him to the House of Commons by Peter Legh, high bailiff of Westminster, that Mr Murray had encouraged a mob to proceed to acts of violence against him, saying, with imprecations, "Will nobody knock the dog down? Will nobody kill the dog?" On this complaint he was ordered on 6th February 1751, to be committed close prisoner to Newgate, and as he refused to express contrition on his knees, he was detained in confinement till the succeeding June, when he was released by a prorogation of parliament. Accompanied by Lord Carpenter, and Sir George Vandeput in his coach, and the sheriffs of London in a chariot, Mr Murray went in procession, preceded by a great concourse of people, from Newgate to the house of his brother Lord Elibank in Henrietta Street, near Oxford Market, London, a flag being carried before him, inscribed, "Murray and Liberty." A mezzotinto print of him was engraved, and a pamphlet published, entitled 'The Case of Alexander Murray Esq., in an appeal to the people of Great Britain, more particularly to the inhabitants of Westminster.' As this pamphlet contained some severe reflections against a noble duke, the House of Commons, and the high bailiff of Westminster, a general search was made for it, and on the 2d July, the printer, Owen the publisher, and several booksellers were examined at the secretary of state's office, when the two former were ordered into custody and the rest discharged. Not choosing to place himself again in the power of the House of Commons, he went, in November of the same year, to reside in France, where he was styled Count Murray. At the meeting of parliament, 25th November, a motion was carried in the House of Commons for his being recommitted to Newgate, and a proclamation was issued offering a reward of five hundred pounds for taking him into custody. He was at Paris in 1768 when he made a conspicuous figure in the quarrel betwixt his friend Captain Forbes and the noted John Wilkes. He also proved extremely active in behalf of the pursuer in the great 'Douglas cause' against the duke of Hamilton. He remained in exile till April 1771, when he was recalled to England, by a letter from the privy council, and died, unmarried, in 1777.

The Hon. James Murray, the fifth son, a distinguished general, also attracted, during his life, a considerable share of public attention. He entered the army very young, and was one of the brigadiers of Wolfe's forces at the taking of Quebec, of which he was appointed governor, and distinguished himself by his defence of that city. In 1763, he was nominated governor of Canada. In 1774 he was appointed governor of Minorca, and in his defence of Fort St. Philip in 1781 and 1782, he displayed the most heroic traits of fidelity and valour. The fort having been for some time closely besieged by the combined forces of France and Spain, under the duke de Crillon, the most strenuous efforts were made to obtain possession of it, but the assailants being repulsed in all their attacks, the duke, despairing of success, took the opportunity of a communication relative to an exchange of prisoners, to offer General Murray one million of money with a foreign peerage, to surrender the place. General Murray immediately notified this disgraceful proposal in the orders to the garrison, and sent the following indignant letter to the commander of the allies: "Fort St. Philip, 16th October 1781.—When your brave ancestor was desired by his sovereign to assassinate the duke de Guise, he returned the answer which you should have done, when you were charged to assassinate the character of a man whose birth is as illustrious as your own, or that of the duke de Guise. I can have no further communication with you but in arms. If you have any humanity, pray send clothing for your unfortunate prisoners in my possession. Leave it at a distance to be taken up for them, because I will admit of no contact for the future, but such as is hostile to the most inveterate degree." To this the duke replied "Your letter restores each of us to our places; it confirms me in the high opinion I have always had of you. I accept your last proposal with pleasure."

The garrison, reduced to great extremities, three-fourths of the men being cut off by the scurvy, was at length compelled to capitulate, and they marched out with all the honours of war, declaring that the surrender was made to God alone. In his letter to the earl of Hillsborough, one of the secretaries of state, dated Minorca, 16th February 1782, giving an account of the surrender, General Murray says, "Perhaps a more noble nor a more tragical scene was never exhibited than that of the march of the garrison of St. Philip's through the Spanish and French armies. It consisted of no more than six hundred old decrepid soldiers, two hundred seamen, one hundred and twenty of the royal artillery, forty-five Corsicans, Greeks, &c. The two armies were drawn up in two lines, the battalions fronting each other, forming a way for us to pass through. They consisted of fourteen thousand men Such was the distressing figures of our men that many of the Spanish and French troops are said to have shed tears as they passed them For my own part I felt no uneasiness upon this occasion but what proceeded from the miserable disorder which threatened us with destruction Thanks to the Almighty, my apprehensions are now abated, the humanity of the duke de Crillon (whose heart was most sensibly touched with the misfortunes of such brave men) has gone even beyond my wishes, in providing everything which can contribute to our recovery" In consequence of some charges brought against General Murray in relation to the siege, by Sir William Draper, deputy governor of Minorca, the former was brought before a court martial at the Horse Guards, London, 12th November 1782, and acquitted of all, except two of the most trifling, for which he was adjudged to be reprimanded. Upon the judgment of the court being communicated to the king, the judge-advocate notified that his majesty approved of the opinion of the court martial, but that in consequence of the zeal, courage, and firmness with which General Murray had conducted himself in the defence of Fort St. Philip, as well as of his former long and approved services, his majesty had been graciously pleased to dispense with any other reprimand, in respect of the misconduct of which he has been in two instances found guilty, than that which the sentence of the court martial in itself virtually conveyed His majesty at the same time expressed much concern that an officer of Sir William Draper's rank and distinguished character should have exhibited charges against his superior officer which the court martial had deemed to be frivolous and ill-founded. As a duel was anticipated between the two officers, from some offensive expressions made use of by Sir William Draper to General Murray, and the latter's reply, on the interference of his majesty, Sir William, on the 6th February 1783, expressed his concern at having made use of words which he acknowledged were very improper and unjustifiable; and General Murray, on the 8th, declared that he thought himself unfortunate that any part of his conduct during his command in Minorca should have given offence to Sir William Draper; and so this disagreeable affair terminated. The general was afterwards prosecuted by Mr Sutherland, judge-advocate of Minorca, and had five thousand pounds damages awarded against him; but on the petition of the general, the House of Commons ordered that sum to be repaid to him out of the public money, 8th May 1785. General Murray died June 18, 1794. Of this heroic commander a woodcut is subjoined from an engraving by Neale:

The Hon Barbara Murray, eldest daughter of the fourth lord, married Sir James Johnstone of Westerhall, Dumfriesshire, and had fourteen children, (see JOHNSTONE.) whose third son, Sir William Johnstone Pulteney, father of Henrietta Laura Pulteney created in 1803 countess of Bath, died one of the richest subjects of Great Britain, 31st May 1805, aged eighty-five.

The eldest son, Patrick, fifth lord, a learned and accomplished nobleman, was born in February 1703, and admitted advocate June 22, 1723, but not with any view of practising at the bar The same year he entered the army, and in 1740, five years after he had succeeded to the title, with the rank of lieutenant-colonel he accompanied the expedition under Lord Cathcart to Carthagena, of which he wrote an account, still, we believe, remaining in manuscript in the library of the Board of Trade. After residing for some years in Cambridgeshire, his lordship returned to Edinburgh where he spent the latter period of his life. By the literati of that city he was much esteemed for the acuteness of his understanding, the agreeableness of his manners, and the extent and variety of his information. When Dr Johnson visited Edinburgh in 1773, Lord Elibank addressed a letter to him, and he had afterwards various conversations with the learned lexicographer, all of which are duly recorded by Boswell in his "Tour to the Hebrides." In politics his lordship belonged to the party in opposition to the government, and he is now known to have maintained a secret correspondence with the exiled house of Stuart. He married in early life the Dowager

Lady North and Grey, daughter of Cornelius de Young, lord of Elmeet, in Holland; and died, without legitimate issue, August 8, 1778, in the seventy-sixth year of his age.

He was the author of various publications, namely

Thoughts on Money Circulation, and Paper Currency Edin. 1758.

Inquiry into the Origin and Consequences of the Public Debts. Edin. 1759.

Queries, relating to the proposed Plan for altering Entails in Scotland. Edin. 1765.

A Letter to Lord Hailes, on his Remarks on the History of Scotland. Edin 1773.

Considerations on the present state of the Peerage in Scotland. Edin. 1774 This work related to the mode of electing the representative Scots peers, and attracted considerable notice at the time of its publication

George, sixth lord, born in 1706, an officer in the navy, was commander of the Trial sloop of war, one of the squadron under Commodore Anson, which in 1740 made the circumnavigation of the globe. At Madeira he was promoted to the Wager frigate with the rank of captain, 3d November, 1740, and in the following February he removed to the Pearl of 40 guns, but separating from the squadron in a gale of wind, off Cape Noir, he put back to the Brazils and returned to England. After having had the command of the Hampshire of 50 guns and the Revenge of 70, he was, in 1756, placed on the list of superannuated rear-admirals. In 1778 he succeeded his brother in the title and estates of Elibank, and died 12th November 1785 By his wife, Lady Isabel Mackenzie, eldest daughter of the attainted earl of Cromartie, he had two daughters Maria, married to Edward Hay, Esq of Newhall, brother of George, eighth marquis of Tweeddale, and Isabella, unmarried. On inheriting the Cromartie estates through their mother, they assumed the additional name of Mackenzie, as did also the husband of the elder daughter, Mr Edward Hay The sixth lord dying without male issue, the title devolved upon his nephew, Alexander, elder son of the Hon Gideon Murray, D D, prebendary of Durham, third son of the fourth lord.

Alexander, seventh lord, born 24th April 1747, an officer in the 3d regiment of foot-guards, previous to his succeeding his uncle, was M P for the county of Peebles. He was lord-lieutenant of that county and colonel of its local militia. He died 24th September 1820 He was twice married first, to his cousin-german, Mary-Clara-Montolieu, daughter of Baron de St. Hypolite, by whom he had three sons and two daughters, and, secondly, to Catherine, daughter of James Stewart, Esq., by whom he had three sons and four daughters. The Hon. George Murray, his third son by his first wife, was auditor of the exchequer in Scotland. James, his eldest son by his second marriage, an advocate at the Scottish bar, was killed at Borneo, 17th December 1844, aged thirty four

The eldest son, Alexander, eighth lord, born 26th February 1780, married 8th March 1808, Janet, daughter and heiress of John Oliphant of Bachilton, Perthshire, styled Lord Oliphant, by whom he had six sons and eight daughters. He died 9th April 1830 His second son, the Hon John Oliphant Murray, born 3d July 1808, is chamberlain to the king of Bavaria, and knight Grand Cross of the order of St. Michael of Merit.

The eldest son, Alexander-Oliphant, ninth lord born 23d May 1804, married August 6th 1838, Emily Maria, only daughter of Archibald Montgomery, Esq and niece of Sir James Montgomery of Stanhope, baronet, and has two sons and two daughters. The elder son, the Hon. Montolieu Fox Murray master of Elibank was born in Edinburgh in 1840

ELLIOT, ELIOT, or ELLIOTT, a surname of considerable antiquity both in Scotland and England, possessed by a border clan which resided chiefly in the eastern districts of the border Willis, the antiquary, mentions persons of this name having been seated in Devonshire about the reign of King John, and having branched out into several families, chiefly in the west of England. some of them being of importance in the reign of Edward the First. Of the same stock is descended the family of Eliot of Port Eliot in Cornwall, settled there about 1540 There were also families of this name in Suffolk and Surrey

The Scottish Elliots appear to have been originally settled on the river and village of Eliot or Elot, in Forfarshire, hence the word Arbarlot, a contraction of Aber-Eliot, the river entering the sea at the parish of that name. As most of the surnames in Scotland were local, it is probable, and this has ever been the opinion of the Elliots themselves, that they had their name from this river During the reign of Robert the Third, about the year 1395, they were induced to remove, in a body, into Liddesdale, by means of the family of Douglas, to strengthen their interest on the borders, towards England.

Elliott of Larriston, in Liddesdale, was unquestionably the original stock from which all of the name in Scotland, at least, are descended. The direct male line failed about the beginning of the eighteenth century, and the heir female was married to James Elliot of Redheugh, youngest son of the family of Stobs or Stobhouse, in Roxburghshire, who continued the line, and appears to have been the parent stock of those branches which have in modern times rendered themselves eminent.

The first of the family upon record appears to have been Gavin Elliot, of the Stobs, a second son of the laird of Larriston, in the year 1598.

His son, or grandson, was Gilbert Elliot of Stobs, commonly called "Gibby wi' the gouden gartins" He married Margaret, daughter of Walter Scott of Harden, known by the name of 'Maggy Fendy," and had by her six sons, namely William, his heir, Gilbert, of Craigend, Archibald, of Middlestead, Gavin, of Grange, ancestor of the family of Midlem or Middlemill and Lord Minto (see following page), John, of Godistree, and James, of Redheugh, who married the heiress of Larriston, as above stated.

The eldest son, William Elliot of Stobs, by his wife, Elizabeth, daughter of Sir James Douglas of Cowns, had three sons, and of the youngest, William, Sir John Elliot, of Peebles, baronet, an eminent physician of London, of whom a memoir is afterwards given in larger type, was heir male.

The eldest son, Sir Gilbert Elliot of Stobs, was for his distinguished bravery made a knight banneret in 1648, by King Charles the First in person He was afterwards, on 3d September 1666, created a baronet of Nova Scotia. He was twice married By his first wife, Isabella, second daughter of James, master of Cranstoun, he had an only son, William; and by his second wife, Magdaline, daughter of Sir Thomas Nicholson of Lasswade, baronet, he had two sons and a daughter

His eldest son, Sir William, second baronet, died in 1694 Sir William's son, Sir Gilbert, third baronet, married Eleanor, daughter of William Elliot of Wells, in Roxburghshire, by whom he had eight sons, the youngest of whom, George Augustus, the celebrated General Elliot, was created Lord Heathfield for his gallant defence of Gibraltar in 1787, a memoir of whom is given on a subsequent page of this volume. Sir Gilbert died in 1764 His son, grandson, and great-grandson, all succeeded to the title and estates. The latter, Sir William, sixth baronet, by his wife, daughter of John Russell,

Esq of Roseburn, had eight sons and two daughters, and died 14th May 1812 His eldest son, Sir William Francis Elliot of Stobs and Wells, seventh baronet, F R.S., and deputy-lieutenant of Roxburghshire, married, 2nd March, 1826, the only daughter of Sir Alexander Boswell of Auchinleck, baronet, and by her (who died in 1836) has issue. In 1818 he succeeded his cousin, the late Right Hon William Elliot, M P for Peterborough, in the estate of Wells and other lands in Roxburghshire, the second Lord Heathfield, on whom the estates were entailed, having previously died without issue

Gilbert Elliot, popularly called 'Gibbie Elliot,' an eminent lawyer and judge, the founder of the Minto family, was a younger son of Gawin Elliot of Midlem Mill, above mentioned He was born in 1651, and being educated for the profession of the law, he at first acted only as a writer in Edinburgh, in which capacity he was agent for the celebrated preacher, Mr William Veitch, and was successful in getting the sentence of death passed against the latter commuted to banishment, in the year 1679 His own zeal for the presbyterian cause and religious liberty caused him to be denounced by the Scottish privy council and 16th July, 1685, he was condemned for treason and forfeited for being in arms with the earl of Argyle He was soon, however, pardoned by the king, and in 1687 he applied to be admitted advocate He was one of the Scottish deputation to the prince of Orange in Holland, to concert measures for bestowing on him the British crown At the Revolution the act of forfeiture against him was rescinded, and he was appointed clerk to the privy council, which office he held till 1692 He was created a baronet in 1700, and was constituted a lord of session, and took his seat as Lord Minto, in 1705 At the same time he became a lord of justiciary He died in 1718, at the age of 67

The estate of Minto in Roxburghshire which originally belonged to the Turnbulls, he had purchased some time before his elevation to the bench, from the daughters, who were coheiresses, of the last possessor, Walter Riddell, Esq, second son of Walter Riddell of Newhouse. From King William he had a charter of the lands and barony of Headshaw and Dryden

Dr M'Crie in his 'Life of Veitch' relates the following amusing anecdote regarding this eminent personage and his former client. "When Lord Minto visited Dumfries, of which Mr Veitch was minister after the Revolution, he always spent some time with his old friend, when their conversation often turned on the perils of their former life On these occasions his lordship was accustomed facetiously to say, 'Ah! Willie, Willie, had it no been for me, the pyets had been pyking your pate on the Nether-Bow port" to which Veitch would reply 'Ah! Gibbie, Gibbie, had it no been for me, ye would hae been yet writing papers for a plack the page'"

His son, Sir Gilbert Elliot, the second baronet, was born in 1693 or 1694 He became a lord of session 4th June 1726, when he also assumed the judicial title of Lord Minto, a lord of justiciary 13th September 1733, and was afterwards appointed lord justice clerk. He likewise sat in parliament in 1725 Concurring in politics with the celebrated John duke of Argyle and Greenwich, he was much in that nobleman's confidence, and assisted him in the management of Scots affairs. Besides other improvements, he formed a large library at Minto-house, such as at that period was rarely to be met with in Scotland. He died suddenly at Minto in 1766 He is said to have been the first to introduce the German flute into Scotland about 1725 He married Helen, daughter of Sir Robert Stuart, baronet of Allanbank, by whom, besides other children, he had Gilbert, the third baronet, and his sister, Miss Jane Elliot, authoress of the 'Flowers of the Forest,' a memoir of whom is given below

Sir Gilbert, third baronet, author of the beautiful pastoral, beginning, "My sheep I've forsaken and broke my sheep-hook," was born in September 1722 Like his father and grandfather, he was educated for the bar, and passed advocate 10th December, 1748 He married, 15th December, 1746, Agnes Murray Kynnynmound, heiress of Melgund in Forfarshire and of Kynnynmound in Fifeshire, by whom he had a son, the first earl of Minto, of whom a notice follows. The father of this lady was Hugh Dalrymple, second son of the first baronet of Hailes, who inherited the estates of Melgund and Kynnynmound in 1786, in right of his mother, Janet, daughter of Sir James Rocheid of Inverleith and widow of Alexander Murray of Melgund, and he in consequence assumed the designation of Hugh Dalrymple-Murray-Kynnynmound He died in 1741 Sir Gilbert was a man of considerable political and literary abilities, and filled several high official situations. In 1754 he was elected member of parliament for Selkirkshire, and was again returned in 1761 In 1765, on a vacancy occurring in the representation of Roxburghshire, he resigned his seat for Selkirkshire, and was returned member for his native county, and also during the successive parliaments in 1768 and 1771 In 1763 he was appointed treasurer of the navy In April 1766 he succeeded his father in his title and estates, and subsequently obtained the reversion of the office of keeper of the signet in Scotland He was also one of the lords of the admiralty He died at Marseilles, whither he had gone for the recovery of his health, in January 1777 His Philosophical Correspondence with David Hume is quoted with commendation by Dugald Stewart, in his 'Philosophy of the Human Mind,' and in his 'Dissertation' prefixed to the seventh edition of the Encyclopedia Britannica Sir Gilbert was the writer of some pathetic elegiac verses on Colonel Gardiner, who fell at Preston, beginning, "'Twas at the hour of dark midnight." He is also supposed to have been the author of some beautiful lines in blank verse, entitled 'Thoughts occasioned by the Funeral of the Earl and Countess of Sutherland, at the Abbey of Holyrood House,' 9th July, 1766, inserted in the Scots Magazine for October of that year, where they are attributed to a person of distinction

His eldest son, Gilbert Elliot Murray Kynnynmond, fourth baronet, and first earl of Minto, a distinguished statesman, was born April 23, 1751 After receiving part of his education at a school in England, in 1768 he was sent to Christ Church Oxford. He subsequently entered at Lincoln's Inn, and was in due time called to the bar He afterwards visited the Continent, and on his return was, in 1774, elected M P for Morpeth At first he supported the Administration, but towards the close of the American war he joined himself to the opposition, and was twice proposed by his party as Speaker, but was both times defeated by the ministerial candidate. In January 1777, he had married Anna Maria, eldest daughter of Sir George Amyand, Bart., and soon after he succeeded his father as baronet. At the breaking out of the French Revolution, he and many of his friends became the supporters of the government. In July 1793 he was created by the university of Oxford doctor of civil laws. The same year he acted as a commissioner for the protection of the royalists of Toulon, in France. The people of Corsica having sought the protection of Great Britain, Sir Gilbert Elliot was appointed governor of that island, and in the end of September 1793 was sworn in a member of the privy council. Early in 1794 the principal strongholds of Corsica were surrendered by the French to the British arms the king accepted the sovereignty of the island, and on June 19, 1794, Sir Gilbert, as viceroy, presided in a general convention of Corsican deputies, at which a code of laws, modelled on the constitution of Great Britain, was adopted The French had still a strong party in the island, who, encouraged by the successes of the French armies in Italy, at last rose in arms against the British authority The insurrection at Bastia, the capital of the island, was suppressed in June 1796, but the French party gradually acquiring strength, while sickness and diversity of opinion rendered the situation of the British very precarious, it was resolved, in September following, to abandon the island. Sir Gilbert returned to England early in 1797, and in the subsequent October was raised to the peerage of the United Kingdom as Baron Minto, with the special distinction accorded him of bearing with his family arms in chief the arms of Corsica. In July 1799 his lordship was appointed envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary to Vienna, where he remained till the end of 1801 On the brief occupation of office by the Whigs in 1806, he was appointed president of the Board of Control He was soon after nominated governor general of India, and embarked for Bengal in February 1807 "When Sir Gilbert Elliot," says Mr MacFarlane, in his History of British India, "Lord Minto had been one of the bitterest enemies of Warren Hastings, and had taken a most active part on the impeachment and trial of that great man Like some of his predecessors, he had gone out to India impressed with the notions that the true policy of Britain was non-interference, that no attempt ought to be made to extend the limits of our possessions or to increase the number of our connections with the native princes. No man had inveighed more bitterly than he against the ambitious, encroaching, aggrandising spirit of Mr Hastings, or had dwelt more pathetically on the wrongs done to the native princes. Yet his lordship had not been many days on the banks of the Hooghly ere he confessed that the security of our empire depended upon the actual superiority of our power, upon the sense which the natives entertained of that power and upon the submissiveness of our neighbours." Under his administration many important acquisitions were made by the British arms. "If conquests and annexations," says Mr MacFarlane "were not made in Hindostan there was no lack of them in other directions. In fact, during the peaceful administration of Lord Minto, our conquests and operations in the Eastern Archipelago, or Insular India, were widely extended—so widely, indeed, that the forces and resources employed in this direction, would have made it difficult to prosecute any important war on the Indian continent." He accompanied in person the successful expedition against Java in 1811 For his services in India he received the thanks of parliament, and in February 1813 was created earl of Minto and Viscount Melgund. Towards the close of the same year he resigned his office and returned to England His lordship died June 21st, 1814 at Stevenage while on his way to Scotland He had three sons and three daughters.

His eldest son Gilbert, fifth baronet, and second earl of Minto, born in 1782, married in 1806, the eldest daughter of Patrick Brydone, Esq, of Lennel near Coldstream once well-known for his 'Tour through Sicily' by whom he had issue He assumed the names of Murray and Kynynmond by royal license, was M P for Ashburton in 1806-7 and ambassador at Berlin from 1832 to 1834 privy councillor 1832, G C B, 1834, first lord of the admiralty from September 1835 to September 1841 and lord privy seal from July 1846 to Feb 1852, and was sent on a mission to Italy and Switzerland in Sept. 1847 The countess died at Nervi, a short distance from Genoa, 21st July 1853. The earl died in 1859 His eldest son, William Hugh, third earl, born at Minto castle, Roxburghshire, in 1814, was, while Viscount Melgund, M P for Hythe from 1837 to 1841, for Greenock from 1847 to 1852, and for Clackmannan from April 1857 to May 1859, chairman of the General Board of Lunacy for Scotland from 1857 to 1859 He married in 1844, Emma-Eleanor Elizabeth, born in 1824, daughter of General Sir Thomas Hislop, Baronet issue Gilbert John Viscount Melgund, and three other sons.

ELLIOT, George Augustus, Lord Heathfield, the gallant defender of Gibraltar, ninth and youngest son of Sir Gilbert Elliot, the third baronet of Stobs, in Roxburghshire, by Eleanor, daughter of William Elliot, Esq of Wells, was born at Stobs in 1718 He was educated at home by a private tutor, and afterwards sent to the university of Leyden, where he made great progress in classical learning After attending the French military school of La Fere, in Picardy, he served for some time as a volunteer in the Prussian army He returned home in 1735, and became a volunteer in the 23d regiment of foot, or Royal Welsh fusileers, then lying in Edinburgh castle, but in 1736 he joined the engineer corps at Woolwich, where he continued till he was made adjutant of the second troop of horse grenadiers In May 1743 he went with his regiment to Germany, and was wounded at the battle of Dettingen In this regiment he successively purchased the commissions of captain, major, and lieutenant-colonel, when he resigned his commission as an engineer, and was soon after appointed aide-de-camp to George the Second In 1759 he quitted the second regiment of horse guards, being selected to raise, form, and discipline, the first regiment of light horse, called after him Elliot's He subsequently served, with the rank of brigadier-general, in France and Germany, from whence he was recalled, and was employed as second in command in the memorable expedition against the Havannah At the peace the king conferred on his regiment the title of royals, which it became the 15th, or king's royal regiment of light dragoons In 1775 General Elliot was appointed commander-in-chief of the forces in Ireland from whence, at his own request he was soon recalled, and sent to Gibraltar as governor of that important fortress took part in the struggle between Great Britain and her revolted American colonies, and, even before a declaration of war, laid siege to Gibraltar by sea and land That fortress was defended by General Elliot with consummate skill, during three years of constant investment by the combined French and Spanish forces In June 1782, the duke de Crillon, commander-in-chief of the Spanish army, who had recently taken the island of Minorca from the British, arrived at Gibraltar, with a reinforcement All the French princes royal were in the camp An army of 40,000 French and Spaniards were at the foot of the hill Floating batteries, with hanging roofs, were constructed to attack the fortifications, so carefully and strongly built, that neither balls nor bombs could injure them Twelve hundred pieces of heavy ordnance were collected, and the quantity of gunpowder was said to exceed eighty-three thousand barrels. In Miller's History of the Reign of George the Third is the following account of their final discomfiture "The thirteenth of September was fixed upon by the besiegers for making a grand attack, when the new invented machines, with all the united powers of gunpowder and artillery in the highest state of improvement, were to be called into action The combined fleets of France and Spain in the bay of Gibraltar amounted to forty-eight sail of the line Their batteries were covered with one hundred and fifty-four pieces of heavy brass cannon The numbers employed by land and sea against the fortress were estimated at one hundred thousand men With this force, and by the fire of three hundred cannon, mortars, and howitzers, from the adjacent isthmus, it was intended to attack every part of the British works at one and the same instant. The surrounding hills were covered with people assembled to behold the spectacle. The cannonade and bombardment were tremendous. The showers of shot and shells from the land batteries and the ships of the besiegers, and from the various works of the garrison, exhibited a most dreadful scene. Four hundred pieces of the heaviest artillery were playing at the same moment The whole peninsula seemed to be overwhelmed in the torrents of fire which were incessantly poured upon it. The Spanish floating batteries for some time answered the expectations of their framers. The heaviest shells often rebounded from their tops, while thirty-two pound shot made no visible impression upon their hulls. For some hours the attack and defence were so equally supported, as scarcely to admit of any appearance of superiority on either side. The construction of the battering ships was so well-calculated for withstanding the combined force of fire and artillery, that they seemed for some time to bid defiance to the powers of the heaviest ordnance. In the afternoon the effects of hot shot became visible At first there was only an appearance of smoke, but in the course of the night, after the fire of the garrison had continued about fifteen hours, two of the floating batteries were in flames, and several more were visibly beginning to kindle The endeavours of the besiegers were now exclusively directed to bring off the men from the burning vessels, but in this they were interrupted Captain Curtis, who lay ready with twelve gun-boats, advanced and fired upon them with such order and expedition, as to throw them into confusion before they had finished their business They fled with their boats, and abandoned to their fate great numbers of their people The opening of daylight disclosed a most dreadful spectacle Many were seen in the midst of the flames crying out for help, while others were floating upon pieces of timber, exposed to equal danger from the opposite element The generous humanity of the victors equalled their valour, and was the more honourable, as the exertion of it exposed them to no less danger than those of active hostility In endeavouring to save the lives of his enemies, Captain Curtis nearly lost his own. While for the most benevolent purpose he was alongside of the floating batteries, one of them blew up, and some heavy pieces of timber fell into his boat and pierced through its bottom By similar perilous exertions, near four hundred men were saved from inevitable destruction. The exercise of humanity to an enemy under such circumstances of immediate action and impending danger, conferred more true honour than could be acquired by the most splendid series of victories. It in some measure obscured the impression made to the disadvantage of human nature, by the madness of mankind in destroying each other by wasteful wars. The floating batteries were all consumed. The violence of their explosion was such as to burst open doors and windows at a great distance. Soon after the destruction of the floating batteries, Lord Howe, with thirty-five ships of the line, brought to the brave garrison an ample supply of every thing wanted, either for their support or their defence" He succeeded in landing two regiments of troops, and in sending in a supply of fifteen hundred barrels of gunpowder

So admirable and complete had been the measures taken by the governor for the protection and security of the garrison, while the latter was employed in defending the fortress and annoying the enemy, that its loss was comparatively light, and it was chiefly confined to the artillery corps The marine brigade, of course, being much more exposed, suffered more severely In the course of about nine weeks, the whole number slain amounted to only sixty-five, and the wounded to three hundred and eighty-eight, and it is a remarkable fact that the works of the fortress were scarcely damaged

George the Third sent General Elliot the order of the Bath, which was presented to him on the spot where he had most exposed himself to the fire of the enemy He also received the thanks of both houses of parliament for his eminent services, with a pension of fifteen hundred pounds per annum Elliot himself, with the consent of the king, ordered medals to be struck, one of which was presented to every soldier engaged in the defence

After the conclusion of peace General Elliot returned to England, and, June 14, 1787, was created Lord Heathfield, Baron Gibraltar In 1790 he was obliged to visit the baths of Aix-la-Chapelle for his health, and, when preparing to proceed to Gibraltar, died at Kalkofen, his favourite residence near the former place, of a second stroke of palsy, on the 6th of July of that year His remains were brought to England, and interred at Heathfield in Sussex A monument was erected to his memory in Westminster abbey at the public expense, and the king himself prepared the plan of a monument erected in honour of him at Gibraltar In the council chamber of Guildhall, London, is one of the most celebrated pictures by Mr John Singleton Copley, father of Lord Lyndhurst, representing the siege and relief of Gibraltar, and full of portraits, in which the figure of its heroic defender occupies the most conspicuous place, painted at the expense of the corporation.

Lord Heathfield was one of the most abstemious men of his age His diet consisted always of vegetables and water, and he allowed himself only four hours' sleep at a time He married Anne, daughter of Sir Francis Drake, of Devonshire, by whom he had a son, Francis Augustus, who succeeded to the title, which became extinct on his death in 1803

ELLIOT, JANE, authoress of one of the three exquisite lyrics known in Scottish song by the name of 'The Flowers of the Forest,' was the second daughter of Sir Gilbert Elliot, the second baronet of Minto, and the sister of the third Sir Gilbert, author of the fine pastoral song of "My sheep I neglected," and was born about 1727 Her beautiful song of 'The Flowers of the Forest' is the one beginning, with the fragment of the old words,

"I've heard them lilting, at the ewe-milking"

And she thus proceeds,

"Lasses a' lilting before dawn of day,
But now they are moaning on ilka green loaning,
The Flowers of the Forest are a' wede awae."

It is the only thing she ever produced, and is said to have been written about the year 1755 When first published, it passed as an old ballad, and long remained anonymous Burns was among the first to consider it modern "This fine ballad," he said, 'is even a more palpable imitation than Hardyknute. The manners are indeed old, but the language is of yesterday." Sir Walter Scott inserted it in the Border Minstrelsy in 1803, "as by a lady of family in Roxburghshire" It is stated that she composed it in a carriage with her brother, Sir Gilbert, after a conversation about the battle of Flodden, and a bet that she could not make a ballad on the subject. She had high aristocratic notions, and as a proof of her presence of mind, it is recorded that during the rebellion of 1745, when her father was forced to conceal himself among Minto Crags, from an enraged party of Jacobites, she received and entertained the officers at Minto House, and by her extreme composure, averted the danger to which he was exposed This accomplished lady was never married. From 1782 to 1804, she resided in Brown's Square, Edinburgh, in a house which, in the progress of local improvement, is now taken down She died at Mount Teviot, in Roxburghshire, the seat of her brother, Admiral Elliot, March 29, 1805

ELLIOT, Sir John, baronet, an eminent physician, was born at Peebles, some time in the first half of the eighteenth century He was of obscure parentage, but descended of a junior branch of the Stobs family, and received a good education, having become well acquainted with Latin and Greek He was first employed in the shop of an apothecary in the Haymarket, London, which he quitted to go to sea as surgeon of a privateer Being fortunate in obtaining prize-money, he procured a diploma, and settled in the metropolis as a physician Aided by the friendship and patronage of Sir William Duncan, uncle of the celebrated admiral, Adam, Viscount Duncan, he soon became one of the most popular medical practitioners in London, his fees amounted to little less than five thousand pounds a-year, and by the influence of Lord Sackville and Madame Schwellenberg, he was, in July 1778, created a baronet He was appointed physician to the prince of Wales became intimate with persons of rank, and was the associate of the first literary characters of the metropolis, among whom he was celebrated for his hospitality He died November 7th 1786, at Brocket Hall, Hertfordshire, from the rupture of one of the larger vessels, and was buried at Hatfield Dying unmarried, the baronetcy became extinct at his death He was the author of various popular works relative to medical science, of which a list follows

Elphinstone, anciently spelt Elfynyston, a surname assumed from the lands of Elphinstone in Mid Lothian.

According to tradition, the first of this name in this country was a German who came to Scotland in the reign of Robert the Bruce, and marrying Margaret, daughter of Sir Christopher Seton, by Lady Christian, his wife, the sister of King Robert, received with her lands in Mid Lothian, to which he gave his own name, Elvinton; but for this tradition there is no foundation Another version makes the Elphinstones to be descended from the counts of Helpheinstein in Germany

John de Elphinstone, possessor of the lands and barony of Elphinstone, the first of the name who appears on record, flourished under Alexander II and Alexander III

His grandson, Sir John de Elphinstone, married the lady above mentioned, Margaret de Seton, the niece of King Robert Bruce, and by her he had Alexander de Elphinstone, who took to wife Agnes de Airth, with whom he acquired Airth Beg, and several other lands in Stirlingshire.

Alexander's great-grandson, Sir Alexander Elphinstone, knight, was succeeded by his only child Agnes, who, marrying Sir Gilbert Johnston, second son of Adam Johnston of Johnston, carried the estate of Elphinstone, in Mid Lothian into that family

Her uncle Henry of Pittendreich, succeeded in the Stirlingshire property, which with lands in Perth and Aberdeenshire, was subsequently called the barony of Elphinstone the lordship of Kildrummie in the latter, which they held for nearly 200 years, came into this family on default of heirs of the old line of Mar 1457

Henry's nephew, by a younger brother, William, was bishop of Aberdeen and chancellor of Scotland

Sir Alexander Elphinstone, of Elphinstone, knight, the great-grandson of Henry, was at the baptism of Prince Arthur, in 1509, raised to the peerage by James the Fourth, by the title of Lord Elphinstone In September 1513 he accompanied James to Flodden, where he was slain He bore a striking resemblance to that monarch and is supposed to have been mistaken for him in that fatal field

His only son, Alexander, the second Lord Elphinstone, was slain in the battle of Pinkie, in 1547 By the Hon Catherine Erskine, daughter of John Lord Erskine, earl of Mar, he had five sons and three daughters.

The eldest son Robert, third Lord Elphinstone, married Margaret, daughter of Sir John Drummond of Inverpeffrey His third son, Sir James Elphinstone of Innernochtue, knight, created 20th February 1604 Lord Balmerinoch, was the ancestor of the noble house of Balmerino, forfeited in 1746, in the person of Arthur, the sixth lord (a notice of whom is given below), on account of his participating in the rebellion. The Balmerinoch branch of the Elphinstones has been already noticed. [See Balmerinoch, vol i pp. 228, 229]

Alexander, fourth Lord Elphinstone, the eldest son of the third lord, was in 1599 while still master of Elphinstone, appointed one of the lords of session, and lord high treasurer of Scotland. He succeeded his father in 1602, and died in 1648 By the Hon Jean Livingston, daughter of William, sixth Lord Livingston, he had four sons and five daughters.

His son, Alexander, fifth Lord Elphinstone, married Elizabeth Drummond, sister of James first earl of Perth, and had only one surviving daughter, Lilias. She married her cousin Alexander, sixth Lord Elphinstone, and was the mother of Alexander seventh lord, and of John, the eighth lord

The latter married Lady Isabel Maitland, daughter of Charles, 3d earl of Lauderdale, issue, 5 sons and 3 daughters.

The eldest son died in infancy The 2d son, Charles, 9th Lord Elphinstone, had 4 sons and 2 daughters.

His 3d son, Charles, succeeded as 10th Lord Elphinstone. He married Lady Clementina Fleming, only surviving child and heiress of John, 6th earl of Wigton issue, 4 sons and 4 drs. ELPHINSTON, WILLIAM, an eminent prelate, founder of King's college, Old Aberdeen, was born at Glasgow in 1431, or 1437 His father, Mr William Elphinston, was the first of the Elphinstons of Blythswood in Lanarkshire He became, at the age of 25, rector of the parish of Kirkmichael, where he remained four years, and then went to Paris, to study the civil and canon law Three years thereafter, he was appointed professor of law, first at Paris, and afterwards at Orleans In 1471 he returned home, and by Bishop Muirhead was made parson of Glasgow, and official of his diocese In 1473 he was appointed official of Lothian by the archbishop of St. Andrews, and admitted a member of the privy council He was afterwards sent on a political mission to the king of France, and on his return in 1479 was made archdeacon of Argyle, and soon after bishop of Ross In 1484 he was translated to the see of Aberdeen, and the same year was one of the commissioners from Scotland to treat of a truce with England, and a marriage between the son of James III and the Lady Anne, niece of Richard III On the accession of Henry VII he was again sent to London, with other ambassadors, to arrange the terms of a truce, which was accordingly concluded for three years, July 3, 1486 In February 1488 he was constituted lord-high-chancellor of the kingdom, a post which he enjoyed till James' death in the following June He was subsequently sent to Germany as ambassador to the emperor Maximilian, on a proposal of marriage betwixt his youthful sovereign and Margaret, the emperor's daughter, who, however, was united to the prince of Spain before his arrival in Vienna. On his return homeward, he concluded a treaty of peace between the States of Holland and Scotland In 1492 he was made lord privy seal In 1494 he obtained a Bull from Pope Alexander VI for founding a university at Aberdeen, and built the King's college in Old Aberdeen in 1500 Besides the erection and endowment of this college, Bishop Elphinston left large sums of money to build and uphold the bridge across the Dee After the death of James IV on the fatal field of Flodden, the venerable bishop quitted his diocese, and, anxious to assist with his advice in restoring peace to his distracted country proceeded to Edinburgh to attend parliament. But the fatigue of the journey exhausted his strength, and he died a week after his arrival in the capital, October 25, 1514

Bishop Elphinston wrote the Lives of Scottish Saints, which are now lost In the college of Old Aberdeen are two series of large MS folio volumes of his compilations on the canon law He also wrote a History of Scotland, which till lately was believed to be preserved among the Fairfax manuscripts in the Bodleian Library, at Oxford This manuscript history, which was early discovered to be a mere transcript of the Scotichronicon, with some interpolations, Lord Fairfax, in a note in his own hand-writing, states that he had got from the widow of Drummond of Hawthornden, and a memorandum in it attributes its authorship to Elphinston, but it is now believed not to have been his production at all An engraving of the bishop, from his portrait in the hall of King's college, Old Aberdeen, is given in Pinkerton's collection, of which a woodcut is subjoined

ELPHINSTONE, ARTHUR, sixth and last Lord Balmerino, was born in 1688. He had the command of a company of foot in Lord Shannon's regiment in the reign of Queen Anne, but at the accession of George the First resigned his commission, and joined the earl of Mar, under whom he fought at Sheriffmuir After that engagement he escaped out of Scotland, and entered into the French service, in which he continued till the death of his brother Alexander in 1738 His father, anxious to have him settled at home, obtained for him a free pardon from government, of which he sent notice to his son, then residing at Berne, in Switzerland He thereupon, having obtained the Pretender's permission, returned to Scotland, after an exile of nearly twenty years, and was joyfully received by his aged father When the young Chevalier arrived in Scotland in 1745, Mr Arthur Elphinstone was one of the first who repaired to his standard, when he was appointed colonel and captain of the second troop of life-guards attending his person He was at Carlisle when it surrendered to the Highlanders, marched with them as far as Derby, from whence he accompanied them in their retreat to Scotland, and was present, with the corps de reserve, at the battle of Falkirk He succeeded his brother as Lord Balmerino, January 5, 1746, and a few weeks thereafter was taken prisoner at the decisive battle of Culloden Being conducted to London, he was committed to the Tower, and brought to trial in Westminster Hall, July 29, 1746, along with the earls of Kilmarnock and Cromarty, both of whom pleaded guilty Before pleading to his indictment, Lord Balmerino stated that he was not at Carlisle at the time specified in it, being eleven miles off when that city was taken, and he requested to know if it would avail him anything to prove that fact Lord Hardwicke said that such a circumstance might, or might not, be of use to him, but he informed him that it was contrary to form to permit him to put any questions before pleading to the indictment, by saying whether he was guilty, or not guilty He was then desired to plead, when, apparently not understanding the meaning of that legal term, Balmerino exclaimed, with great animation, "Plead! why, I am pleading as fast as I can" The lord high steward having explained the import of the phrase, his lordship answered "not guilty" He was remanded to the Tower, and brought back next day, when, after a short trial, he was found guilty of high treason; and, on August 1, sentence of death was passed upon the two earls and his lordship The high-minded Balmerino disdained to compromise his principles by suing for pardon, and when he heard that his fellow-prisoners had petitioned for mercy, he sarcastically remarked that, as they must have great interest at court, they might have squeezed his name in with their own He never entertained any hopes of pardon, for he said he considered his case desperate, as he had been once pardoned before The earl of Cromarty obtained a pardon, but the other two suffered decapitation on Tower Hill, August 18, 1746 Lord Balmerino's behaviour at his execution was marked with unusual firmness and intrepidity His last words were—"Oh, Lord! reward my friends, forgive my enemies, bless King James, and receive my soul!" He had no issue by his wife Margaret, daughter of Captain Chalmers, who died at Restalrig, August 24, 1765, and at his death the male line of this branch of the Elphinstone family became extinct

ELPHINSTONE, JAMES, a miscellaneous writer, the son of an episcopalian clergyman of Edinburgh, was born in that city, December 6, 1721 He was educated at the high school and university of Edinburgh, on leaving which he was, in his 17th year, appointed tutor to Lord Blantyre When of age, he accompanied Thomas Carte, the historian, afterwards secretary to Bishop Atterbury, in a tour through Holland and the Netherlands, and at Paris acquired a thorough knowledge of the French language On his return home he became private tutor to the son of Mr Moray of Abercairney In 1750 he superintended an edition of the Rambler, published at Edinburgh, with English translations of the mottoes, which were approved of by Dr Johnson, who became the friend and correspondent of the author In 1751 he married Miss Gordon, niece of General Gordon of Auchintool, and in 1753, removing to London, established an academy, first at Brompton, and afterwards at Kensington In the year last mentioned he published a poetical translation of the younger Racine's poem of 'Religion,' and in 1763 he brought out 'Education,' a poem, neither of which works displayed talent above mediocrity An English grammar, which he composed for the use of his scholars, and afterwards enlarged and published in 2 vols. 12mo, was the most useful of his works, and received the approbation of Mr Walker, author of the 'Pronouncing Dictionary' In 1776 he retired from his school, and, losing his wife, in 1778 he visited Scotland, and delivered a course of lectures on the English language at Edinburgh and Glasgow In 1782 appeared his translation of Martial, in one volume 4to, which showed a total want of judgment, and was received with ridicule In 1786 he published 'Propriety ascertained in her Picture,' 2 vols. 4to, in which he endeavoured to establish a new mode of orthography, by spelling all words as they are pronounced, a project which he still farther explained and recommended in his 'English Orthography Epitomised,' and 'Propriety's Pocket Dictionary' In 1794 he brought out, in 6 vols 4to, a Selection of his Letters to his Friends, with their Answers, entirely spelt in the new way, the reading of which was so difficult and tiresome that the work found few purchasers Mr Elphinstone married, a second time, a niece of Bishop Falconer, and died at Hammersmith, October 8, 1809 His sister was the wife of Mr William Strahan, the celebrated printer, who, at his death, left him a small annuity

ELPHINSTONE, GEORGE KEITH, VISCOUNT KEITH, a distinguished naval commander, fourth son of Charles, tenth Lord Elphinstone, was born in 1747, and entered the navy early in life In 1773 he was promoted to the rank of commander, and in 1775 made post-captain In the same year he was returned member of parliament for Dumbartonshire, in which county his family possessed considerable property During the American war, Captain Elphinstone served with great credit at the attack on Mud island and Charlestown, and in 1778 commanded the Berwick, 74, in the action off Brest In 1782 he was again on the American station, when he captured l'Aigle, a French frigate of 40 guns and 600 men In August 1793 he assisted Rear-admiral Goodall in the reduction of Toulon, and received the red riband of the Bath as a reward for his services In 1795 he was made vice-admiral, in which year he commanded the fleet destined for the capture of the Cape of Good Hope, in the object of which expedition he not only succeeded, but compelled the

Dutch, who advanced to the relief of the colony, to surrender at discretion, without firing a gun. On this occasion, he was rewarded with an Irish barony, by the title of Baron Keith, of Stonehaven-Marischal, March 7, 1797 His services on other occasions were highly important and meritorious, and his gallant exertions in the Foudroyant, on the coast of Egypt, during the campaign of 1801, which year he was promoted to the rank of admiral of the Blue, caused his elevation to the peerage of the United Kingdom in 1803, by the title of Baron Keith of Banheath, in the county of Dumbarton In 1814 he was created a viscount Lord Keith died in the spring of 1823, and was succeeded by his only daughter, Margaret Mercer, married to the count de Flahault, in France

ELPHINSTONE, William George Keith, C B, a major-general in the army, was the third son of the Hon William Fullerton Elphinstone, and Elizabeth, daughter of William Fullerton of Carstairs in Lanarkshire, and grandson of the tenth Lord Elphinstone He was born in 1782, and early in life he entered the army as ensign in the 24th regiment of infantry After serving with much distinction in various parts of the globe, he became lieutenant-colonel of the 33d foot in 1813, and being present with his regiment at the battle of Waterloo, his services were rewarded by his being created a commander of the Bath He was also a knight of the order of St Wilhelm of Holland In 1837 he was promoted to the rank of major-general, and was commander-in-chief of the Bengal army when the British arms received so disastrous a check in Afghanistan in 1841 He was at this period enfeebled by long service and by the climate of India, and was, moreover, almost helpless from the effects of gout He was to be tried by court martial, had not his death taken place while proceedings were pending He died April 23, 1842, aged 60

Enrie, Earl of, a secondary title of the marquis of Huntly, see Huntly, marquis of

ERIGENA, John Scotus, a celebrated scholar and metaphysician, was born about the beginning of the ninth century. Some authors contend that he was a native of Ireland, and others of Ergene, on the borders of Wales, but the received opinion is, that his birth-place was in Ayrshire Animated by an uncommon desire for learning, at a period when it was not to be obtained in his own country, he travelled, when very young, to Athens, where he spent some years studying the Greek, Chaldaic, and Arabic languages, and became well-versed in logic and philosophy He was afterwards invited to the court of France by Charles the Bald, who, on account of his wisdom and learning, treated him with great familiarity, calling him his master, and encouraged him in the production of several works of scholastic divinity, which gave great offence to the church by his bold notions on the subjects of predestination and transubstantiation A treatise on the Eucharist, which he wrote in answer to a book by Paschasius Radbertus, a Benedictine monk, who first introduced the false doctrine of transubstantiation, was two centuries later, that is, in 1059, condemned by the council of Rome to be burnt

Having, at the desire of the French king, translated from the Greek into Latin certain theological works attributed to Dionysius the Areopagite, the supposed first Christian preacher in France, Erigena was visited with the displeasure of the Roman pontiff, Nicholas I, who in a threatening letter to Charles, peremptorily ordered him to be sent to Rome In preference, however, to delivering him up to papal vengeance, that enlightened monarch connived at his escape into England, where, according to Cave and Tanner, he was gladly received by Alfred the Great who, at that time engaged in compiling a code of laws and furthering the introduction of learning into his kingdom, placed him at the head of the establishment recently founded by him at Oxford then called the "King's Hall," and now Brazen-nose college Here he lectured for three years on mathematics, logic, and astronomy, but disputes arising among the gownsmen, he relinquished his professorship, and retired to the abbey of Malmesbury, where he opened a school Tradition states that the harshness and severity of his discipline caused his scholars to stab him to death with the iron stiles or bodkins then used in writing, an event which is variously said to have occurred in the years 874, 884, and 886 It is, however, asserted, with more probability, that the jealousy of the monks, rather than the insubordination of his pupils, was the real cause of his death Some writers are of opinion that the English historians have confounded John Scotus Erigena with another John Scot, abbot of Ethelingay, who taught at Oxford In proof of this latter supposition, Mackenzie, in his Scottish Writers, quotes a letter from Anastasius, the librarian to Charles the Bald, written in 875, which speaks of Erigena as then dead Dr Henry, in his History of Great Britain, thinks it probable that he died in France A treatise written by him with great acuteness and metaphysical subtilty, 'De Divisione Naturæ,' was published at Oxford, in folio, by Dr Thomas Gale, in 1681 Of this singular work, Mr Turner, in his History of the Anglo-Saxons, gives an interesting account Erigena is said to have been as celebrated for his wit as for his learning A number of works are attributed to him, and he translated four of the works of Dionysius the Areopagite into Latin for the king of France

ERROL, Earl of, a title in the peerage of Scotland, first conferred by King James the Second, on 17th March 1452-3, with that of Lord Hay, on Sir William Hay, of Errol, descended from William de la Hava, principal butler at the court of King Malcolm the Fourth and witness to many of his charters. According to tradition, Hay, a brave rustic in the reign of Kenneth the Third, by whose exertions the Danes were defeated about 980, was the founder of the noble family of Errol, but Douglas, in his Peerage, asserts that the Havs of Scotland are certainly a branch of the Anglo Norman Havs, who came into Britain with William the Conqueror The story of Hay is simply this —The Danes having landed in Aberdeenshire, ravaged the country as far as the town of Perth King Kenneth hastened to give them battle, and the hostile armies met at Loncarty, in Perthshire The Scots at first gave way and fled through a narrow pass, where they were stopped by a countryman of great strength and courage, and his two sons, who had no other weapons than the yokes of their ploughs, they having been at work in a field not far from the scene of action Upbraiding the fugitives for their conduct in flying from the field, these peasants succeeded in rallying them The Scots turned upon their conquerors, and after a second rencounter, still more furious than the first, they gained a complete victory It is said that after the Danes were defeated, the old rustic, lying on the ground wounded and fatigued, cried, "Hay! Hay!" which word became the surname of his posterity The king rewarded him with as much land in the Carse of Gowrie as a falcon should fly over before she settled, and a falcon being accordingly let off, flew over an extent of ground six miles in length, afterwards called Errol, and lighted on a stone, still styled the Falcon-Stone. The king also raised him to the dignity of nobility, and assigned to him and his family armorial bearings in accordance with the signal service which he and his two sons had rendered to their country It appears from many histories that there were families of the name of Hay both in Italy and France even before the era of the battle of Loncarty [See HAY, surname of]

Sir Gilbert de la Haya, a descendant in the fifth generation from the above Sir William de la Haya, living in the time of Malcolm the Fourth, was by Robert the Bruce created high constable of Scotland. By charter dated 12th November 1314, (No. 45 in Anderson's Diplomata,) the office became hereditary in the family He also conferred on him the lands of Slains in Aberdeenshire.

William, first earl of Errol, got charters under the great seal of various lands in 1446 and 1450 In 1457 he was one of the Scots commissioners that concluded a treaty with the English, and died soon afterwards. His office of lord high constable was one of the best in point of revenue in the kingdom, among the various perquisites that were attached to it were the hostilagia, which by some have been held to imply "free lodging in every place where the king might reside," while others believe that it referred to a hearth-tax levied for the constable from every "reeking house in Scotland, of sax pennies Scots" During the great rebellion of the Douglases, when James the Second had thoughts of quitting the kingdom, his affairs appearing for a time desperate, the first earl of Errol resigned great emoluments, namely constable fees, which had previously been levied on everything brought to market in the time of parliament, both small and great, as the act recites, a sacrifice which is supposed to have been intended to gain the king popularity with his discontented subjects From time to time indemnification to the family was proposed, but nothing was ever done towards it, nor any settled revenue assigned to the high constable.

His eldest son, Nicol, second earl, died in 1470, and was succeeded by his brother William, third earl, who was one of the privy council of James the Third, and in 1472 was nominated a commissioner to treat of a peace with England He died in 1506

His eldest son, William, fourth earl, was sheriff of Aberdeen, and had great dependences and bonds of manrent from some of the principal families in the country He accompanied James the Fourth to the fatal battle of Flodden, where he was slain 9th September 1513

His son, William, fifth earl, was, according to Calderwood, a man well "learned both in humanitie and divinitie, and specialllie weill versed in the New Testament. He would rehearse word by word the choicest sentences, specialllie suche as served to establishe solid comfort in the soule by faith in Christ. Much suffered he for the cause of Christ. Mr Robert Alexander, advocate, who had been his schoolmaster, set forth his testament in Scottish metre, which was printed after in Edinburgh, anno 1571, by Thomas Bassandine, printer It was dedicated to Lilias Ruthven, Ladie Drummond" The dedicatory epistle is inserted in Calderwood's Hist. of the Kirk of Scotland, vol. i. p 184 He was one of the privy council to James the Fifth, and in 1515 was one of the commissioners sent to France, to endeavour to get the Scots included in their treaty with the English He was also, in the following year, with others, sent by the estates of Scotland to the king of England with their refusal to comply with his desire, in removing the duke of Albany from the guardianship of their young king Dying without surviving male-issue, before the year 1585, in him ended the male line of William fourth earl of Errol The earldom, constabulary, &c., therefore, devolved upon George, son of the Hon Thomas Hay of Logie-Almond, second son of the third earl, who got that estate by marrying Margaret Logie, heiress thereof

George, sixth earl, obtained from King James the Fifth a charter under the great seal, dated 18th December 1541, of the whole estate and heritable constabulary, as next heir male to William, the last earl The narrative bears that the king was desirous that the earldom of Errol and constabulary of Scotland should remain and continue. He was one of the lords who signed the bond of consent to the marriage betwixt Queen Mary and the earl of Bothwell, and died after 1574.

His eldest son, Andrew, seventh earl, married Lady Jean Hay, only daughter and heiress of William fifth earl of Errol, whereby the collateral heir male and the heir female of line of this noble family were united. He was one of the privy council of Queen Mary, to whom he was always faithful and loyal. He died in 1585 By his first countess he had three sons and one daughter, namely, Alexander, who died before his father, Francis, who became eighth earl; Thomas, who died without issue; and the lady Eleanor, married to the earl of Linlithgow By his second wife, Lady Agnes Sinclair, daughter of the earl of Caithness, he had a son, the Hon Sir George Hay of Killour, whose grandson succeeded as eleventh earl.

Francis, eighth earl, was one of the heads of the popish faction which, in 1589, entered into a treasonable correspondence with Philip of Spain and the duke of Parma, and with the earls of Crawford, Huntly, and Bothwell, broke out into rebellion. On the king's advance against them, however, they surrendered at Aberdeen, but, after a few months' confinement, were set at liberty by his majesty amidst the rejoicings on account of his approaching marriage. On 31st July 1592 the earl was committed to the castle of Edinburgh but soon released, and again entered into a treasonable correspondence with Spain, a part of which was intercepted He was summoned before parliament, 8th January 1592-3, and on his refusal to appear was denounced rebel on the 8th February. On the 25th of the following September he and the earls of Angus, Huntly, and others, were formally excommunicated by the provincial synod of Fife convened at St Andrews. On the 17th October he appeared in the king's presence with Huntly and Angus, and offered to submit to a legal trial. A day was fixed, and on 26th November it was finally settled that the three earls and their associates should be exempted from prosecution, provided that before the 1st February 1594 they should either submit to the church and renounce the errors of popery, or remove out of the kingdom To these conditions they refused to accede, and levying a formidable force, at the battle of Glenlivet, 3d October 1594, they defeated the king's troops, under the earl of Argyle, though the latter were far superior in number He afterwards went to the Continent, and in 1596 having obtained permission to return, he landed at Stonehaven on 20th September, and in the following year was formally 'relaxed' from the horn but was not absolved from the excommunication till the year 1617 Having become reconciled to the court, he got so much in favour with James the Sixth that the latter appointed him one of the commissioners to treat of a union with England, one of James' favourite projects, 11th July 1604. He died at Slains castle 16th July 1631, and is celebrated by Arthur Johnston, in an epitaph He was three times married. By his first two wives, the one a daughter of the earl of Athol, and the other of the regent Murray, he had no issue, but by his third wife, Lady Elizabeth Douglas, daughter of the earl of Morton, he had three sons and eight daughters.

His eldest son, William, ninth earl, having been brought up at court, and educated in the protestant religion, was in great favour with King Charles the First, and acted as lord high constable at the coronation of that ill-fated monarch at Holyroodhouse abbey, 18th June 1633. From his splendid style of living he was obliged to sell the old paternal estate of the family in the carse of Gowrie, which had been granted to his ancestors by King William the Lion, reserving only some superiorities. He died 7th December 1636.

His only son, Gilbert, tenth earl, was too young to be engaged in the beginning of the troubles of King Charles the First's reign, but was a staunch loyalist, and had a pension settled on him in 1639 In 1648 he was colonel of horse for Aberdeenshire, in the duke of Hamilton's 'Engagement' for the rescue of Charles the First. In 1650 he waited on Charles the Second at Aberdeen, and was most graciously received. He raised a regiment for his majesty's service at his own charge, and immediately after the coronation of the king at Scone, he stated to his majesty, in a memorial, the claims of his family for compensation for the great sacrifices made by the first earl in the time of King James the Second, for the public good. In answer, a letter from the king to the earl (preserved in the family archives) thus concludes: "And we do promise, in verbo principis that as soon as it shall please Almighty God to put an end to the present troubles, the claims of our said cousin the earl of Errol, shall be favourably considered, and justice done, so that he may see how highly we esteeme that ancient family, and the valne we set upon his present services." In 1661 he was appointed one of the king's privy council. He married Lady Catherine Carnegie, daughter of James earl of Southesk, by whom he had no issue, upon which he made a resignation of his whole estates, honours, dignities, hereditary constabulary, &c., failing himself, in favour of Sir John Hay of Killour, his cousin, and nearest male heir, and the heirs male of his body, which failing, to his own nearest and lawful heirs whatever with power of nomination, on which a charter was passed under the great seal, 13th November 1666 On his death in 1674, the male line of the first marriage of Andrew, eighth earl of Errol, ended, and the estate and honours devolved upon the next male heir, Sir John Hay of Killour, grandson of Sir George, before mentioned.

John, eleventh earl, married Lady Anne Drummond, daughter of James third earl of Perth, by whom he had Charles, twelfth earl, and two other sons, who both died young, with two daughters, Mary, who succeeded her brother as countess of Errol, and Margaret, married to James fifth earl of Linlithgow, and fourth earl of Callendar (attainted in 1715), to whom she had only one daughter, Lady Anne Livingston, undoubted heir of line of the noble and ancient family of the Livingstons, earls of Linlithgow and Callendar This lady married the last earl of Kilmarnock, (who was beheaded and attainted in 1746,) to whom she had three sons, the eldest of whom, James Lord Boyd, succeeded as thirteenth earl of Errol

The eleventh earl died 30th December 1704, and was succeeded by his eldest son, Charles, twelfth earl, who, in the Scots parliament of 1706, opposed the Union with all his power and interest, considering it derogatory to the honour and independence of Scotland, and entered a solemn protest against it. He was considered so disaffected that on the alarm of the French invasion in 1708 he was apprehended, and though in a bad state of health, was for some time kept closely confined in the castle of Edinburgh. He died, unmarried in 1717, and was succeeded by his elder sister, Lady Mary, countess of Errol, who married Alexander, son of Sir David Falconer 1st president of the court of session in 1682 At the coronation of George the Second, her ladyship claimed to act by deputy as high constable of Scotland, which claim was allowed, and the duke of Roxburghe officiated for her on the occasion. Under the act for abolishing heritable jurisdictions she obtained for the regality of Slains twelve hundred pounds sterling, in full of her claim of five thousand pounds. On her death, without issue, 19th August 1758, the estate and titles devolved, as above shown, on James, Lord Boyd, the grandson of her sister.

James, thirteenth earl, would have united in his own person the four earldoms of Errol, Kilmarnock, Linlithgow, and Callendar, had the three last not been attainted (see these titles), as well as the ancient dignity of lord high constable of Scotland, which had been entailed on the earl of Errol by the articles of Union of the two kingdoms and by the act of the British parliament of 1748, for abolishing the heritable jurisdictions of Scotland. The earl was born 20th April 1726, and was educated at the school of Dalkeith and the university of Glasgow. In 1745 he had a commission in the 21st regiment of foot, and at the battle of Culloden was on the king's side, when his father and next brother were on that of the Pretender. After his father's execution he claimed his estate, and his claim was allowed by the court of session in 1749, and by the House of Lords in 1751. At the coronation of George the Third in 1761, he officiated as constable of Scotland, and neglecting, by accident, to pull off his cap, when the king entered, he apologised for his negligence in the most respectful manner, but his majesty entreated him to be covered, for he looked on his presence at the solemnity as a very particular honour. In 1767 he was appointed one of the lords of police, and in 1770 elected a Scots representative peer. He died 3d July 1778. He married, first, in 1749, Rebecca, daughter of Alexander Lockhart, Esq., a lord of session by the title of Lord Covington, by whom he had a daughter, Mary, married to General John Scott of Balcomie. He married, secondly, in 1762, Isabella, daughter of Sir William Carr, baronet, of Etal, in Northumberland, by whom he had three sons and nine daughters. George and William, the two eldest sons, were successively earls of Errol. James, the youngest, an officer in the navy, was accidentally drowned in 1797. The thirteenth earl of Errol is mentioned with high praise in Forbes' Life of Beattie, and in Dr Anderson's 'Bee,' vol. v. there is a biographical sketch of him.

The eldest son, George, fourteenth earl, an officer in the army, married in 1790, Elizabeth-Jemima, second daughter of Joseph Blake, Esq. of Ardfry in Galway, Ireland, sister of the first Lord Wallscourt, but had no issue. At the general election 30th June 1796, he was chosen one of the Scots representative peers, but the earl of Lauderdale protested and petitioned the House of Lords against his return, on the ground that he was not the male descendant of the original earls; but, on the charter of 1666, his election and title were declared valid by the House of Lords 19th May 1797. He died 14th June, 1798, aged 32. He had accompanied the expedition against Ostend the previous year. He was then labouring under the disease which terminated his existence, and was subject to occasional attacks of delirium, in one of which he is said to have disclosed the object of the expedition prematurely.

His brother, William, born 12th March 1772, succeeded as fifteenth earl. He had assumed, 28th March, 1795, the additional surname and arms of Carr. In 1805 he was appointed knight marechal of Scotland, and in 1806, chosen a representative peer. He was also for several years lord high commissioner to the Church of Scotland. He was three times married. By his first wife, Jane, daughter of Matthew Bell, Esq., he had an only daughter, married to the Rev. C. W. Wodehouse. By his second wife, Alicia, youngest daughter of Samuel Elliot, Esq. of Antigua, he had James, Lord Hay, killed at Waterloo, 18th June 1815, William-George, sixteenth earl; Samuel, a captain in the army, and four daughters; and by his third countess, Harriet, the sister of Lord Somerville, he had a son and two daughters. He died 26th January 1819.

William-George, sixteenth earl, K.T. and G.C.H., born 21st February 1801, married 4th December 1820, Elizabeth Fitzclarence, the third of the natural daughters of William the Fourth, and by her had a son and three daughters. He was lord steward of the household, and afterwards master of the buckhounds, and was created a baron of the United Kingdom, 31st May 1831, by the title of Baron Kilmarnock of Kilmarnock. In 1832 he was constituted knight marechal of Scotland. He was also lord-lieutenant of Aberdeenshire. He died in 1846.

His son, William-Harry, 17th earl, a major in the rifle brigade, 1855, born 3d May 1823, married 1848, Elisa-Amelia, eldest daughter of Major-general the Hon. Charles Gore, a son of 2d earl of Arran in Ireland, issue, Charles Gore, Lord Kilmarnock, born 1852, and Hon. Arthur, born 1855. Was wounded in the hand at the battle of the Alma.

The seventeenth earl of Errol is the twenty second lord high constable of Scotland and as such is by birth the first subject in the kingdom after the blood royal, having a right to take precedence of every hereditary honour. The houses of Tweeddale and Errol claim a common progenitor (see TWEEDDALE, marquis of).

ERSKINE, anciently spelled Areskin, and sometimes Irskyn, a surname of great antiquity, and one which has been much distinguished in all periods of Scottish history, was originally derived from the lands and barony of Erskine in Renfrewshire, situated on the south side of the Clyde, the most ancient possession of the noble family who afterwards became Lords Erskine and earls of Mar.

An absurd tradition asserts that at the battle of Murthill fought with the Danes, in the reign of Malcolm the Second, a Scotsman having killed Enrique, a Danish chief, cut off his head, and with the bloody dagger in his hand, showed it to the king, saying in Gaelic, Eris Skene, alluding to the head and dagger, on which Malcolm gave him the name of Erskine. In those remote times, however, surnames were usually assumed from lands, and all such traditions referring to the origin of the names of illustrious families are seldom to be depended upon. The appearance of the land justifies the derivation of the name from the British word ir-ugyn, signifying the green rising ground. The earliest notice of the name is in a confirmation of the church of "Irschen" granted by the bishop of Glasgow in favour of the monastery of Paisley, betwixt the years 1202 and 1207 [Chartulary of Paisley, p. 113]. In 1703, the estate of Erskine was purchased from the Hamiltons of Orbiston by Walter, master of Blantyre, afterwards Lord Blantyre, in which family the property remains.

Henry de Erskine was proprietor of the barony of Erskine so early as the reign of Alexander the Second. He was witness of a grant by Amelick, brother of Maldwin, earl of Lennox, of the patronage and tithes of the parish church of Roseneath to the abbey of Paisley in 1226.

His grandson, 'Johan de Irskyn,' submitted to Edward the First in 1296.

Johan's son, Sir John de Erskine, had a son, Sir William, and three daughters, of whom the eldest, Mary, was married, first to Sir Thomas Bruce, brother of King Robert the First, who was taken prisoner and put to death by the English, and secondly to Sir Ingram Morville, and the second, Alice, became the wife of Walter, high steward of Scotland.

Sir William de Erskine, the son, was a faithful adherent of Robert the Bruce, and accompanied the earl of Moray and Sir

James Douglas in their expedition into England in 1822. For his valour he was knighted under the royal banner in the field. He died in 1329

Sir Robert de Erskine, knight, his eldest son, made an illustrious figure in his time, and for his patriot[illegible]services, was, by David the Second, appointed constable, keeper, and captain of Stirling castle. He was one of the ambassadors to England, to treat for the ransom of that monarch, after his capture in the battle of Durham in 1846. In 1350 he was appointed by David, while still a prisoner, great chamberlain of Scotland, and in 1357 he was one of those who accomplished his sovereign's deliverance, on which occasion his eldest son, Thomas, was one of the hostages for the payment of the king's ransom. On his restoration, David, in addition to his former high office of chamberlain, appointed Sir Robert justiciary north of the Forth, and constable and keeper of the castles of Edinburgh and Dumbarton In 1358 he was ambassador to France, and between 1360 and 1366 he was five times ambassador to England In 1367 he was warden of the marches, and heritable sheriff of Stirlingshire In 1371 he was one of the great barons who ratified the succession to the crown of Robert the Second, grandson, by his daughter Marjory, of Robert the Bruce, and the first of the Stuart family To his other property he added that of Alloa, which the king bestowed on him, in exchange for the hunting district of Strathgartney, in the Highlands. He died in 1385

His son Sir Thomas Erskine, knight, succeeded his father, as governor of Stirling castle, and in 1892 was sent ambassador to England By his marriage with Janet Keith, great-grand-daughter of Gratney, eleventh earl of Mar, he laid the foundation of the succession on the part of his descendants to the earldom of Mar and lordship of Garioch.

Sir Robert Erskine, knight, his son, was one of the hostages for the ransom of James the First in 1424 On the death of Alexander, earl of Mar, in 1435, he claimed that title in right of his mother, and assumed the title of earl of Mar but the king unjustly kept him out of possession He died in 1453.

Sir Thomas Erskine, his son, was dispossessed of the earldom of Mar by an assize of error, in 1457, but in 1467 he was created a peer under the title of Lord Erskine

This family were honoured for several generations with the duty of keeping, during their minority, the heirs apparent to the crown.

Alexander, the second Lord Erskine, had the charge of James the Fourth, when prince of Scotland, and ever after continued in high favour with him He died in 1510

John, the fourth Lord Erskine, had the keeping of James the Fifth during his minority On his coming of age he was sent by James in 1534 ambassador to France, to negociate a marriage with a daughter of the French king, and afterwards he was sent ambassador to England On the death of James, in conjunction with Lord Livingston, he had committed to him the charge of the infant queen Mary He kept her for some time in Stirling castle, and afterwards removed her to the priory of Inchmahome, situated on an island in the lake of Monteith, in Perthshire, which priory had been bestowed upon him by James the Fifth, as commendatory abbot. Subsequently, for greater security, he conducted the youthful Mary to France. He died in 1552. Margaret Erskine, daughter of this nobleman, was the mother, by James the Fifth, of the regent Murray

His eldest son, the master of Erskine, was killed at the battle of Pinkie in 1547. He was the ancestor, by an illegitimate son, of the Erskines of Shielfield, near Dryburgh, of which family the famous Ebenezer and Ralph Erskine, the originators of the first secession from the Church of Scotland, were cadets. Memoirs of them are given below The fourth son, the Hon. Sir Alexander Erskine of Gogar, was the ancestor of the earls of Kellie. [See KELLIE, earl of.]

The second son, John, the fifth Lord Erskine, succeeded his father as governor of Edinburgh castle. Although a Protestant himself, he preserved a strict neutrality in the struggles between the Lords of the Congregation and the queen regent, Mary of Guise, while he upheld the authority of the latter, to whom, when hard pressed by her enemies, he gave protection in the castle of Edinburgh, where she died in June 1560 On the return of Queen Mary from France in 1561 he was appointed one of her privy council In the following year he submitted his claim to the earldom of Mar to parliament, and was successful in establishing his right as the descendant, in the female line, from Gratney, eleventh earl of Mar [See MAR, earl of.] In consequence of Lord Erskine being confirmed earl of Mar, the queen's natural brother, afterwards regent, who then bore the title, was styled earl of Moray instead. On the birth of James the Sixth in 1566, the new earl of Mar was intrusted with the keeping of the young prince, and on the death of the earl of Lennox in 1571 he was chosen regent in his stead. He died in the following year, leaving a high reputation for integrity and honesty of purpose. From a portrait of the regent Mar in Pinkerton's Scottish Gallery the subjoined woodcut is taken

The first of the family of Erskine, barons of Dun as separated from that of Erskine of Erskine, the original stock, was John the son of Sir Thomas Erskine of that ilk, who had a charter from King Robert the Second of the barony of Dun, near the town of Montrose, in Forfarshire, dated November 8, 1376. The name of Dun is Gaelic, and signifies a hill or rising ground.

This Sir Thomas was twice married, first to Janet Keith, by whom he had Sir Robert Erskine, and a daughter, married to Duncan Weems, younger of Lochar Weems: and secondly, to Jean Barclay, by whom he had John Erskine, already mentioned, who succeeded to the lands of Dun, as appears by a charter to him, from King Robert the Third, of these lands, dated October 25, 1398

The next in succession in the lands of Dun was Alexander Erskine, supposed to be the son of John He resigned the lands of Dun, reserving his own liferent, to his son, John the second, who received from King James the Second a charter to the same, of date January 28, 1449 The vesting the fee of the property in the eldest son, while the father retained the liferent, became afterwards a practice in the family

John Erskine of Dun, the second of that name, had three sons John, his heir, Thomas, and Alexander He resigned his lands of Dun to his eldest son in 1478, retaining the liferent, and died March 15, 1508.

John Erskine of Dun, the third of that name, had several sons, of whom Thomas Erskine of Brechin, the second son, was secretary to King James the Fifth He fell on the fatal field of Flodden, September 9, 1513 This John Erskine, laird of Dun, treated the inhabitants of Montrose in the most tyrannical manner, and in consequence of his oppressive conduct and that of his family the town applied to the king for redress. A summons of spulzie was accordingly issued against him and four of his sons, 4th October 1493

Sir John Erskine, the fourth of that name, married Margaret Ruthven, daughter of William first Lord Ruthven, widow of the earl of Buchan, by whom he had John Erskine of Dun, knight, one of the principal leaders of the Reformation in Scotland, and afterwards superintendent of Angus, of whom a memoir is afterwards given in larger type

A succeeding proprietor of Dun, John by name, was poisoned on the 23d May, 1613, by his uncle Robert. The trial of the latter, as well as that of his three sisters, by whom he was instigated to the atrocious deed, will be found in Pitcairn's Criminal Trials, vol iii. pp 261—266

Of the later lairds of Dun the only other personage of public note was David Erskine Lord Dun, a judge of the court of session, of whom also a notice is afterwards given

The estate of Dun came into possession of the noble family of Kennedy by the marriage on June 1, 1793, of Archibald, 12th earl of Cassillis, and first marquis of Ailsa, with Margaret, 2d daughter of John Erskine, Esq of Dun Their 2d son, John, born June 4, 1802, on inheriting the property, assumed the additional surname of Erskine. He married, in 1827 Lady Augusta Fitzclarence, 4th daughter of William IV., and died at Pisa, March 6, 1831 His widow married again, in 1836 Lord John Frederick Gordon Hallyburton of Pitcur, 3d son of 9th marquis of Huntly Mr Kennedy Erskine, with two daughters, left one son, William Henry, born July 1, 1828, at one time a captain 17th lancers, unmarried The elder daughter, Wilhelmina, married, in 1855, her cousin, 2d earl of Munster, the younger, Millicent Ann Mary, became the wife of J Hay Wemyss, Esq of Wemyss Castle, Fifeshire.

Alexander Erskine, plenipotentiary for Sweden at the treaty of Munster, a distinguished officer in the army of Gustavus Adolphus, was of the family of Erskine of Kirkbuddo in Fife, sprung from the Erskines of Dun Ennobled in Sweden, some of his descendants were settled at Bonne in Germany

The Erskines of Alva (represented by the earl of Rosslyn) are sprung from a branch of the noble house of Mar, descended from Hon Charles Erskine, 5th son of John, 7th earl of Mar His eldest son, Charles Erskine of Alva was created a baronet of Nova Scotia, 30th April, 1666. Sir Charles had four sons and one daughter Charles, Lord Tinwald his third son, a lord of session, and afterwards lord justice clerk, was father of James Erskine, Lord Alva, also a lord of session.

The grandson of the first baronet, Lieutenant-general Sir Henry Erskine, distinguished himself as a minor song writer The second son of Sir John Erskine of Alva, second baronet, he succeeded to the baronetcy, on the death of his elder brother, in 1747 He was for many years M P for the Anstruther district of burghs. He early entered the army, but in 1756 he lost his rank, on account of his opposition to the importation of the Hanoverian and Hessian troops into this country After the accession of George III in November 1760, he was restored to his rank in the army, and appointed colonel of 67th foot. He married at Edinburgh, in 1761, Janet, only daughter of Peter Wedderburn, Esq of Wedderburn, a lord of session, under the name of Lord Chesterhall Sir Henry was deputy quarter-master-general, and succeeded his uncle, Hon General St Clair, in the command of the Royal Scots in 1762 He was the author of the song, 'In the garb of old Gaul,' the air of which was composed by the late General Reid He died at York, 9th August 1765 His eldest son, Sir James Erskine, also in the army, assumed the surname of St. Clair, and on the death of his uncle, Alexander Wedderburn, earl of Rosslyn, in 1805, became 2d earl of Rosslyn, and died 8th June 1837 [See ROSSLYN, earl of.]

There is also the family of Erskine of Cambo in Fife, on which a baronetcy was conferred in 1821 Sir David, the first baronet, was the grandson of the tenth earl of Kellie. He died in 1841 His son, Sir Thomas, the 2d baronet, born in 1824, is an officer in the army, and married, with issue.

ERSKINE, JOHN, of Dun, knight, one of the principal promoters of the Reformation in Scotland, was born in 1508, at the family seat of Dun, near Montrose His grandfather, father, uncle and granduncle, fell at Flodden, and he succeeded to the estate of Dun when scarcely five years old. By the care of his uncle, Sir Thomas Erskine of Brechin, secretary to King James the Fifth, he received a liberal education, but had scarcely attained to the years of majority, when he appears to have killed Sir William Froster, a priest of Montrose The document which preserves the record of this fact, and of the assythment or manbote paid by him to the father of the deceased, dated 5th February 1530, is inserted among the Dun papers in the Miscellany of the Spalding Club, vol fourth None of the circumstances are given, except that the deed was committed in the Bell Tower of Montrose He studied at a foreign university, and he has the merit of being the first to encourage the acquisition of the Greek language in Scotland, having, in 1534, on his return from abroad, brought with him a Frenchman capable of teaching it, whom he established in Montrose He seems about this time to have married Lady Elizabeth Lindsay, daughter of the earl of Crawford This lady died 29th July 1538, and he subsequently married Barbara de Beirie

On the 10th of May, 1537, he had a license from James V for himself, his son John, and other relatives, permitting them "to pas to the partis of France, Italie, or any uthiris beyond se, and thair remane, for doing of thair pilgramagis, beaynes, and uthir lefull erandis, for the space of thre yeiris" His uncle, Sir Thomas Erskine of Brechin, had obtained from the same monarch a gift of the office of constabulary of Montrose, which he conveyed by a charter, dated 9th February 1541, to John Erskine of Dun, the subject of this notice, in liferent, and to his son and heir apparent, John Erskine, in fee In April 1542 he and his cousin, Thomas Erskine of Brechin, and John Lamble of Duncarry, had a license to travel into France, Italy, and other places, for two years [Dun Papers in Spalding Club Miscellany, vol 4]

Having early become a convert to the Reformed doctrines, he was a zealous and liberal encourager of the Protestants, especially of those who were persecuted, to whom his house of Dun was always a sanctuary, as he was a man of too much power and influence for the popish bishops to interfere with In his endeavours, however, to promote the Reformation, he did not neglect his other duties During the years 1548 and 1549 he supported the queen dowager and the French party in opposing the English forces, and we learn from the histories of the time that in 1548, some English ships having landed about eighty men in the neighbourhood of Montrose, for the purposes of plunder, Erskine of Dun collected a small force from the inhabitants of that town, of which he was then provost, and had for some years been constable, and fell upon them with such fury, that not a third of them regained their ships Among the Dun papers which have been published, are several letters to the laird of Dun from Mary, the queen dowager These refer to the passing events of the period, and show the high estimation in which he was held by her One of them, dated 29th August, 1549, relates to the coming to Montrose of the French Captain Beauschattel, and his company, regarding which Erskine seems to have remonstrated, dreading some attempts against his rights, as her majesty assures him that there was "na entent bot till kepe the fort, and nocht till hurt you in your heretage or ony othir thing" It appears that a small hill, close to the river, was called the Fort, or Constable Hill [Bowick's Life of Erskine, page 62, quoted in the Spalding Club Miscellany, vol 4, preface, page xii, note], and it has been conjectured that Erskine may have thought the occupation of this fort by the French captain derogatory to his rights as constable, and so made it subject of complaint He was considered not only by his own countrymen, but by foreigners, as one of the most eminent heroes which the Scottish nation had produced in that age, so fertile in great men, and M Beauge, in his History of the Campaigns in Scotland of 1548 and 1549, makes frequent and honourable mention of him and his exploits at that time

At Stirling, March 10, 1556, the laird of Dun and some others, signed a "call" to John Knox, then at Geneva, to return to Scotland, and promote the Reformation On Knox's arrival, that year, Erskine, being in Edinburgh, was one of those who used to meet in private houses to hear him preach It was at supper in the laird of Dun's house, that all present there with Knox resolved, that, whatever might be the consequence, they would wholly discontinue their attendance at Mass On his invitation, the Reformer followed him to Dun, where, on this, as well as on a subsequent visit, he preached almost daily, and made many converts On the 3d December 1557 Erskine of Dun subscribed the first Covenant at Edinburgh, along with the earls of Argyle and Glencairn, and other noblemen and gentlemen, and thus became one of the lords of the congregation

In the parliament which met December 14, 1557, he was appointed, under the title of "John Erskine of Dun, knight, and provost of Montrose," to go to the court of France, as one of the commissioners, to witness the young Queen Mary's marriage with the dauphin "Of which trust he acquitted himself with great fidelity and honour, and was approved by the parliament on his return." On his return, he found the Reformation making great progress in Scotland, and when the Protestants, encouraged by their increase of numbers, and the accession of Queen Elizabeth to the English throne, petitioned the queen regent, more boldly than formerly, to be allowed the free exercise of their religion, the laird of Dun was one of those who joined in the prayer, but he seems to have used milder language, and been more moderate in his demands than the others. So far, however, from granting the toleration requested, the queen regent issued a proclamation requiring the Protestant ministers to appear at Stirling on May 10, 1559, to be tried as heretics and schismatics The lords of the congregation, and other favourers of the Reformation, seeing the danger to which their preachers were exposed, resolved to accompany and protect them Anxious to avoid bloodshed, Erskine of Dun left his party at Perth, and, with their consent, went forward to Stirling, to have a conference with the queen, who acceded to his advice, and agreed that the ministers should not be tried He accordingly wrote to those who were assembled at Perth to stay where they were, as the queen regent had consented to their wishes But while many of the people dispersed on receiving this intelligence, the barons and gentlemen, rightly distrusting the regent's word, resolved to remain in arms till after the 10th of May And well was it that they did so, for the queen had no sooner made the promise than she perfidiously broke it The preachers not appearing on the day named, were denounced rebels, which so incensed and disgusted the laird of Dun that he withdrew from court, and joined the lords of the congregation at Perth, when he explained to them that in giving his advice to disperse he had himself been deceived by the regent He therefore recommended them to provide against the worst, as they might expect no favour, and a civil war ensued, which lasted for some time, and ended at last, first in the deposition, October 23, 1559, and secondly in the death of the queen regent, June 10, 1560, in favour of the Protestants

The laird of Dun, previous to that event, had relinquished his armour, and become a preacher, for which he was, from his studies and disposition, peculiarly qualified In the ensuing parliament, he was nominated one of the five ministers who were appointed to act as ecclesiastical superintendents, the district allotted to him being the counties of Angus and Mearns This appointment took place in July 1560, and he was installed in 1562 by John Knox. The superintendents were elected for life, and though their authority was somewhat similar to that of a bishop, they were responsible for their conduct to the General Assembly The other four superintendents were, Mr John Spottiswood of Spottiswood, the father of Archbishop Spottiswood, of Lothian, John Willocks, formerly a Dominican friar, of Glasgow, John Winram, formerly subprior of St. Andrews, of Fife, and John Carsewell, of Argyle and the Isles The laird of Dun not only superintended the proceedings of the inferior clergy, but performed himself the duties of a clergyman He was appointed moderator of the ninth General Assembly at Edinburgh, December 25, 1564, also of the eleventh the same day and place, 1565, also of the twelfth at Edinburgh, June 25, 1566, and of the thirteenth at Edinburgh, December 25, 1566 In January 1572 he attended the convention held at Leith, where episcopacy was established His gentleness of disposition recommended him to Queen Mary, who, on being requested to hear some of the Protestant preachers, answered, as Knox relates. "That above all others she would gladly hear the superintendent of Angus, Sir John Erskine, for he was a mild and sweet-natured man, and of true honesty and uprightness"

In 1569, by virtue of a special commission from the Assembly, he held a visitation of the university of Aberdeen, and suspended from their offices, for their adherence to popery, the principal, sub-principal, and three regents or professors of King's college, Aberdeen In 1571 he showed his zeal for the liberties of the church, in two letters which he wrote to his chief, the regent earl of Mar, the first of which will be found in Calderwood, vol 3 They are written, says Dr M'Crie, "in a clear, spirited, and forcible style, contain an accurate statement of the essential distinction between civil and ecclesiastical jurisdiction, and should be read by all who wish to know the early sentiments of the Church of Scotland on this subject" In 1577 he assisted in compiling the 'Second Book of Discipline' Besides the duties belonging to his spiritual charge, he was frequently called upon to execute those belonging to his military character as a knight, thus, on the 20th of September 1579, he was required, by a warrant from the king, to recover the house of Redcastle from James Gray, son of Patrick Lord Gray, and his accomplices, by whom it had been seized and retained, and deliver it to John Stewart, the brother of the Lord Innermeith Notwithstanding that the reformation had, in his day, made so great progress in Scotland, and that he himself had been one of the principal promoters of it, he was it seems not altogether divested of some of the superstitious observances of popery In the 'Spalding Miscellany,' vol iv mention is made of a license from the king, signed James R., with consent of his privy council, of date February 25, 1584, to John Erskine of Dun, to eat flesh all the time of Lent, and as oft as he pleases on the forbidden days of the week, to wit, Wednesday, Friday, and Saturday, noted upon the back, with the same hand, a license to your L—— to eat flesh, he being then past the age of seventy-six In 1580, four years before this, he had received a license, wherein he, and three in company with him, are allowed to eat flesh from February 13 to March 26

From the laird of Dun's conciliatory disposition, as well as his high intelligence, his advice and assistance were valued by all parties, as appears by various letters in the 'Spalding Miscellany,' vol iv Perhaps one of the most important of these, in its bearing on the church, is one addressed to him by the earl of Montrose and the secretary Maitland on 18th November 1584, which seems to have been written with the view of obtaining Erskine's assent to certain statutes, then recently passed in parliament, at the king's instance, declaring his supremacy in all ecclesiastical matters, which were obnoxious to the leading clergy of the time The ministers were required to subscribe an "obligation," recognising his majesty's supremacy, under pain of deprivation of their benefices, and the proceedings which ensued on the proclamation for the fulfilment of these enactments are minutely detailed in 'Calderwood's Church History,' vol iv, page 209, et seq

In consequence of the part taken by Erskine in prevailing on the ministers within his bounds to subscribe "the obligation," he acquired some unpopularity among them, in the expressive words of Calderwood, "the laird of Dun was a peat then to the ministers in the north." A letter from Patrick Adamson, titular archbishop of St. Andrews, to Erskine, dated 22d January 1585, inserted among the Dun papers in the 'Spalding Miscellany,' seems intended to give explanations about "the obligation," as he says "the desyr of his Maiesties obligatioun extendis no forthir bot to his hienes obedience, and of sik as bearis charge be lawfull commission in the cuntrie, quhairof his Maiestie hes maid ane speciall chose of your lordship as for the diocese of Dunkeld, I think your lordship will vnderstand his Maiesties meining at your cuming to Edinbrught, and as ffor sik pairtis as is of the diocese of Sanct Androwis in the Merns and Anguse, I pray your lordship to tak ordour thairin for thair obedience and conformitie, as your lordship hes done befoir, that they be nocht compellit to travell forthir, bot thair suspendis may be rathir helpit nor hinderit," with more to the same purpose It appears from a summons, at the instance of the laird of Dun, for payment of his stipend as superintendent of Angus and Mearns, dated 9th September 1585, that the whole amount of it in money and victual, did not much exceed £800 The portion paid in money was £337 11s 6d [Miscellany of Spalding Club, vol iv, Editor's preface] He died March 12, 1591, in the 82d year of his age Buchanan, Knox, Spottiswood, and others, unite in speaking highly of his learning, piety, moderation, and great zeal for the Protestant religion Spottiswood says of him that he governed that portion of the country committed to his "superintendence with great authority, till his death, giving no way to the novations introduced, nor suffering them to take place within the bounds of his charge, while he lived A baron he was of good rank, wise, learned, liberal, and of singular courage, who, for diverse resemblances, may well be said to have been another Ambrose He left behind him a numerous posterity, and of himself and of his virtues a memory that shall never be forgotten." —Miscellany of the Spalding Club —Scott's Lives of Reformers —M'Crie's Lives of Knox and Melville —Calderwood's History

ERSKINE, DAVID, LORD DUN, an eminent lawyer, of the same family as the superintendent, was born at Dun, in Forfarshire, in 1670. From the university of St Andrews he removed to that of Paris, and having completed the study of general jurisprudence, he returned to Scotland, and was, in 1696, admitted advocate He was the staunch friend of the nonjurant episcopal clergy, and in the last Scottish parliament zealously opposed the Union In 1711 he was appointed one of the judges of the court of session, and in 1713 one of the lords of justiciary In 1750 his age and infirmities induced him to retire from the bench In 1754 he published a small volume of moral and political 'Advices,' which bears his name. He died in 1755, aged 85 By his wife, Magdalen Riddel, of the family of Riddel of Haining in Selkirkshire, he left a son, John, who succeeded him in the estate of Dun, and a daughter, Anne, married first to James, Lord Ogilvy, son of David, third earl of Airly, and secondly to Sir James Macdonald of Sleat —Scots Mag 1754

ERSKINE, HENRY, Rev, a divine of considerable eminence, the ninth of twelve children,—not thirty-three, as has been generally stated,—of Ralph Erskine of Shielfield, in Berwickshire, descended from the noble house of Mar, was born at Dryburgh, Berwickshire, in 1624 He studied at the university of Edinburgh, where he took the degree of M A, and was soon after licensed to preach the gospel In 1649—as stated by Wodrow, but according to Dr Harper, in his Life of Ebenezer Erskine, more probably ten years later, viz in 1659, as stated by Calamy and Palmer—he was, by the English Presbyterians, ordained minister of Cornhill, in the county of Northumberland, where he continued till he was ejected by the act of Uniformity, August 24, 1662 He was thus minister of Cornhill for three years [Calamy's Continuation, Palmer's Noncon Memorial] He now removed with his family to Dryburgh, where he appears to have resided for eighteen years, and where he occasionally exercised his sacred office In the severe persecution to which the Presbyterians in Scotland were at that period subjected, this faithful minister could not of course expect to escape, and, accordingly, on Sabbath, April 28, 1682, a party of soldiers came to his house, and, seising him while worshipping God with his family, carried him to Melrose a prisoner Next day he was released on bond for his appearance when required, and soon after was summoned to appear before the council at Edinburgh, to answer charges of sedition and disobedience, because he presumed to exercise his ministry without conforming to the new order of things On his refusal to swear that he had not altogether refrained from the duties of his ministry, and to "give bond that he would preach no more at conventicles," he was ordered to pay a fine of 5,000 merks, and committed to the Tolbooth of Edinburgh, to be afterwards sent to the prison of the Bass till the fine was paid, but, on petition, he obtained a remission of his sentence on condition of leaving the kingdom One account states, that he took refuge in Holland, whence the want of the necessaries of life induced him to return to Scotland, when he was imprisoned in the Bass for nearly three years, but this statement rests on questionable authority It is certain that he resided for some time at Parkbridge, in Cumberland, and afterwards at Monilaws, about two miles from Cornhill, in Northumberland, whence he had been ejected On July 2, 1685, he was again apprehended, and kept in prison till the 22d, when he was set at liberty, in terms of the act of Indemnity passed at the commencement of the reign of James II In September 1687, after the toleration granted by King James' proclamation of indulgence, Mr Erskine became minister of Whitsome, on the Scots side of the Border, and it was under his ministry, at this place, that the celebrated Thomas Boston received his first religious impressions He remained at Whitsome till after the Revolution, when he was appointed minister of Chirnside, in the county of Berwick He continued minister of that place till his death, August 10, 1696, aged sixty-eight He left several Latin manuscripts, among others, a Compend of Theology, explanatory of some difficult passages of Scripture, none of which were ever published He was twice married His first wife, who died in 1670, was the mother of eight children, one of whom, Philip, conformed to the Church of England, and, receiving episcopal orders, held a rectory in the county of Northumberland Another child of the first marriage became afterwards well-known as Mrs Balderstone of Edinburgh, a woman of superior intelligence and of devoted piety By his second wife, Margaret Halcro, a native of Orkney, a descendant of Halero, prince of Denmark, and whose great grandmother was the Lady Barbara Stuart, daughter of Robert, earl of Orkney, son of James V, he was the father of Ebenezer and Ralph Erskine, the founders of the Secession in Scotland

The death of Mr Henry Erskine took place in the midst of his family, and the circumstances of it as related by Dr Calamy [Continuation] are peculiarly interesting, from the impression which they appear to have made on the young hearts of his two celebrated sons, Ebenezer and Ralph Long after, remarks Dr Harper, the scene was referred to by them as one of their hallowed recollections "The Lord helped me," says Ebenezer on one occasion, "to speak of his goodness, and to declare the riches of his grace in some measure to my own soul He made me tell how my father took engagements of me on his deathbed, and did cast me upon the providence of his God" Ralph, in like manner, more than thirty years after the event, put on record, "I took special notice of the Lord's drawing out my heart towards him at my father's death"—Memoir of Rev H Erskine—Dr Harper's Life of Ebenezer Erskine

ERSKINE, EBENEZER, the founder of the Secession church in Scotland, fourth son of the preceding, was born June 22, 1680 Some accounts say his birth-place was the prison of the Bass, but this is evidently erroneous His biographer, the Rev Dr Fraser of Kennoway, thinks it probable that he was born at the village of Dryburgh, in Berwickshire, and in confirmation of this the Rev Dr Harper of Leith, in his Life of Ebenezer Erskine, gives the following extract from a small manuscript volume belonging to Mr Henry Erskine, Ebenezer's father, in possession of the Rev Dr Brown of Broughton Place church, Edinburgh "Eben-ezer was borne June 22d, being Tuesday, at one o'clock in the morning, and was baptized by Mr Gab Semple July 24th, being Saturnday, in my dwelling house in Dryburgh 1680" He appears to have received the elements of his education at home, under the superintendence of his father, and in his fourteenth year he was sent to the university of Edinburgh, where he held a bursary on the presentation of Pringle of Torwoodlee, and where he prosecuted his studies for a period of nine years, four of which were devoted to the classics and philosophy, and five to theology In June 1697, he took his degree of M A., and on leaving college he became tutor and chaplain in the family of the earl of Rothes. He was licensed to preach by the presbytery of Kirkaldy on the 11th February 1703, and in the succeeding September was ordained minister of Portmoak, Kinross-shire It was not till after his ordination that his heart appears to have received its first powerful impressions of evangelical and vital religion, and a corresponding change to the better of spirit and style took place in his public ministrations Exemplary in the discharge of his ministerial duties, and devoted to his people, he soon became popular amongst them "Nor," says Dr Harper, "was Mr Erskine's popularity and usefulness confined to Portmoak and its immediate vicinity From all parts of the country, in every direction, sometimes at the distance of sixty miles, eager listeners flocked to his preaching On sacramental occasions particularly, the gatherings were great From all accounts of the sacred oratory of the man, there is no doubt that there was in it much to impress a promiscuous audience His bodily presence was commanding,—his voice full and melodious,—his manner grave and majestic,—and after the fulness and fervour of his heart broke through the trammels of his earlier delivery, his bearing in the pulpit combined ease with dignity in an unwonted degree But to whatever extent these external advantages commended him to the people, it is gratifying to remark the most unequivocal proofs that the great charm—the element of power which signalized Mr Erskine as a preacher,—was the thoroughly evangelical matter and spirit of his discourses." [Life of Ebenezer Erskine by Dr Harper, pp 20, 21]

In the various religious contests of the period he took an active part, particularly in the famous Marrow controversy, which commenced in 1719, and in which he came forward prominently in defence of the doctrines, which had been condemned by the General Assembly, contained in the work entitled 'The Marrow of Modern Divinity.' He revised and corrected the Representation and Petition presented to the Assembly on the subject, May 11, 1721, which was originally composed by

Mr Boston; and drew up the original draught of the answers to the twelve queries put to the twelve brethren, along with whom he was, for their participation in this matter, solemnly rebuked and admonished by the moderator This took place in the Assembly of 1722 The twelve representers submitted to the authority of the supreme court, but accompanied their submission with a protest against the deed, and their claim of liberty "to profess, preach, and still bear testimony to the truths condemned" In the cases, too, of Mr Simson, professor of divinity at Glasgow, and Mr Campbell, professor of church history at St Andrews, who, though both had been proved to have taught heretical and unscriptural doctrines, were very leniently dealt with by the Assembly, as well as on the question of patronage, he distinguished himself by his opposition to the proceedings of the church judicatories

The high estimation in which Mr Erskine was held procured him at different times the honour of a call from Burntisland, Tullibllan, Kirkcaldy, and Kinross, but the church courts, in full concurrence with his own views and inclinations, decided against his removal in all these cases, although party feeling, particularly as regards Kirkcaldy, had its influence in preventing his translation In May 1731 he accepted of a call to the third charge, or West church, at Stirling, and, in September of that year, he was settled one of the ministers of that town Having always opposed patronage, as contrary to the standards of the Church, and as a violation of the treaty of Union, he was one of those who remonstrated against the act of Assembly of 1732 regarding vacant parishes As moderator of the Synod of Perth and Stirling, he opened their meeting at Perth, on October 10th of that year, with a sermon from Psalm cxvm 24, in which he expressed himself with great freedom against several recent acts of the Assembly, and particularly against the rigorous enforcement of the law of patronage, and boldly asserted and vindicated the right of the people to the election of their minister Several members of Synod immediately complained of the sermon, and, on the motion of Mr Mercer of Aberdalgie, a committee was appointed to report as to some "unbecoming and offensive expressions," alleged to have been used by the preacher on the occasion Having heard Mr Erskine in reply to the charges contained in the report of the committee, the Synod, after a keen debate of three days, by a majority of not more than six, "found that he was censurable for some indecorous expressions in his sermon, tending to disquiet the peace of the Church," and appointed him to be rebuked and admonished From this decision twelve ministers and two elders dissented Mr Erskine, on his part, protested and appealed to the next Assembly To his protest, Messrs William Wilson of Perth, Alexander Moncrieff of Abernethy, and James Fisher of Kinclaven, ministers, adhered

The Assembly, which met in May 1733, refused to hear the reasons of protest, but took up the cause as it stood between Mr Erskine and the Synod, and, after hearing parties, "found the expressions vented by him, and contained in the minutes of Synod, and his answers thereto, to be offensive, and to tend to disturb the peace and good order of the Church, and therefore approved of the proceedings of the Synod, and appointed him to be rebuked and admonished by the moderator at their bar, in order to terminate the process" Against this decision Mr Erskine lodged a protest, vindicating his claim to the liberty of testifying against the corruptions and defections of the Church upon all proper occasions To this claim and protestation the three ministers above named adhered, and along with Mr Erskine, withdrew from the court On citation they appeared next day, when a committee was appointed to confer with them, but, adhering to their protest, the further proceedings were remitted to the Commission, which met in the ensuing August, when Mr Erskine and the three ministers were suspended from the exercise of their office, and cited to appear again before the Commission in November At this meeting the four brethren were, by the casting vote of the moderator, declared to be no longer ministers of the Church of Scotland, and their relationship with their congregations formally dissolved When the sentence of the Commission was intimated to them, they laid on the table a paper declaring a secession from the prevailing party in the established church, and asserting their liberty to exercise the office of the Christian ministry, notwithstanding their being declared no longer ministers of the Church of Scotland

On the 5th day of the subsequent December, the four ejected ministers met together at the Bridge of Gairney, near Kinross, and after two days spent in prayer and pious conference, constituted themselves into a presbytery, under the designation of the "Associate Presbytery" Mr. Erskine was elected the first moderator, and from this small beginning the Secession Church took its rise.

The General Assembly of 1734, acting in a conciliatory spirit, rescinded several of the more obnoxious acts, and authorised the Synod of Perth to restore the four brethren to communion and to their respective charges, which was done accordingly by the Synod, at its next meeting, on the 2d July The seceding ministers, however, refused to accept the boon, and published their reasons for this refusal On forming themselves into the "Associate Presbytery," they had published a 'Testimony to the Doctrine, Worship, and Discipline of the Church of Scotland' In December 1736 they published a Second Testimony, in which they condemned what they considered the leading defections of both Church and State since 1650 In February 1737 Mr Ralph Erskine, minister of Dunfermline, brother to Ebenezer, and Mr Thomas Mair, minister of Orwell, joined the Associate Presbytery, and soon after two other ministers also acceded to it

In the Assembly of 1739 the eight brethren were cited to appear, when they gave in a paper called 'The Declinature,' in which they denied the Assembly's authority over them, or any of their members, and declared that the church judicatories "were not lawful nor right constituted courts of Jesus Christ" In the Assembly of 1740 they were all formally deposed from the office of the ministry. In that year, a meeting-house was built for Mr Erskine by his hearers at Stirling, where he continued to officiate to a very numerous congregation till his death During the rebellion of 1745, Mr Erskine's ardent loyalty led him to take a very active part in support of the government Animated by his example the Seceders of Stirling took arms, and were formed into a regiment for the defence of the town. Dr. Fraser, his biographer, relates that one night when the rebels were expected to make an attack on Stirling, Mr Erskine presented himself in the guardroom fully accoutred in the military garb of the times. Dr John Anderson, late professor of natural philosophy in the university of Glasgow, and Mr John Burns, teacher, father of the Rev. Dr Burns, Barony parish in that city, happened to be on guard the same night, and, surprised to see the venerable clergyman in this attire, they recommended him to go home to his prayers as more suitable to his vocation "I am determined," was his reply, "to take the hazard of the night along with you, for the present crisis requires the arms as well as the prayers of all good subjects" [Life by Fraser, p 439] When Stirling was taken possession of by the rebel forces, Mr Erskine was obliged, for a short period, to retire from the town, and his congregation assembled for worship on Sundays, in the wood of Tullibody, a few miles to the north of Stirling So great, indeed, was the zeal displayed by him in the service of the government that a letter of thanks was addressed to him by command of the duke of Cumberland

When the controversy concerning the lawfulness of swearing the religious clause contained in the Burgess oath led, in April 1747, to the division of the Secession church, Mr Erskine was one of those who adhered to the Burgher portion of the synod In consequence of Mr Moncrieff of Abernethy, who held the office of professor of divinity to the associate presbytery, adhering to the Antiburgher portion of the Secession, the Burgher portion was left destitute of a professor, and Mr Erskine consented, at the request of his brethren, to fill the office, but, at the end of two years, he resigned it on account of his health in 1749. He died June 2, 1754, aged 74 He had been twice married, first, in 1704, to Alison Turpie, daughter of a writer in Leven, by whom he had ten children, and who died in 1720, and, secondly, in 1724, to Mary, daughter of the Rev James Webster, minister of the Tolbooth church, Edinburgh, by whom also he had several children His eldest daughter, Jean, was married to the Rev James Fisher of Glasgow. "During the night on which he finished his earthly career,

Mrs. Fisher, having come from Glasgow to visit her dying father, was sitting in the apartment where he lay, and engaged in reading Awakened from a slumber, he said, 'What book is that, my dear, you are reading?' 'It is your sermon, father,' she replied, 'on that text, I am the Lord thy God.' 'O woman,' said he then, 'that is the best sermon ever I preached' The discourse had proved very refreshing to himself, as well as to many of his hearers. A few minutes after that expression had fallen from his lips, he requested his daughter to bring the table and candle near the bed, and having shut his eyes, and laid his hand under his cheek, he quietly breathed out his soul into the hands of his Redeemer, on the 2d of June, 1754 Had he lived twenty days longer, he would have finished the seventy-fourth year of his age, and had he been spared three months more, he would have completed the fifty-first of his ministry, having resided twenty-eight years at Portmoak, and nearly twenty-three at Stirling" [Life, by Dr Fraser] He published at Edinburgh, in 1739, 'The Sovereignty of Zion's King,' in some discourses upon Psalm ii 6 12mo In 1755 appeared a collection of his Sermons, mostly preached upon Sacramental occasions, 8vo, and in 1757, three volumes of his Discourses, also 8vo Four volumes of his Sermons were printed at Glasgow in 1762, and a fifth at Edinburgh in 1765 "Besides at least six volumes on 'Catechetical Doctrine,'" says Dr Fraser, "written at Portmoak between 1717 and 1723, inclusive, he left in all forty-seven notebooks of evangelical, sacramental, and miscellaneous sermons, fifteen of which books were composed subsequently to his translation to Stirling Most of them consist of 220 pages, and all of them, with the exception of a few words in common hand interspersed, are written in shorthand characters Each may contain on an average about thirty-six sermons of an hour's length He left also several volumes of expository discourses, including a series of lectures on the Epistle to the Hebrews, studied and delivered immediately after his admission to his second charge." [Life, page 341] The following is a list of his printed discourses

ERSKINE, RALPH, one of the founders of the Secession Church, third son of the Rev Henry Erskine, minister of Chirnside, by his second wife, Margaret Halcro, was born at the village of Monilaws, Northumberland, March 15, 1685 He was educated, with his brother, Ebenezer, in the university of Edinburgh, where he took the degree of M A in 1704 During his first session at college, in the winter of 1699–1700, a great fire took place in the Parliament-square, and the house in which he lodged being in that square he narrowly escaped being burned to death He had to force his way through the flames, carrying a number of his books Referring to this deliverance a number of years afterwards, he mentions, in his diary, that on a day set apart for private humiliation and prayer, he made it the subject of grateful acknowledgment to God "I took special notice," says he, "of what took place upon my first going to Edinburgh to the college, in the burning of the Parliament close, and how mercifully the Lord preserved me, when he might have taken me away in my sin, amidst the flames of that burning, which I can say my own sins helped to kindle" While engaged prosecuting his theological studies, a considerable part of his time was spent in the family of Colonel Erskine of Cardross, in the capacity of tutor In June 1709 he was licensed to preach by the presbytery of Dunfermline, and, in 1711, he received a unanimous call from the parish of Tullialian to become their minister, and nearly at the same time he was unanimously called to become the second minister in the collegiate charge of Dunfermline The latter he accepted He was ordained on the 7th August of that year, and about four years and a half after his ordination, Mr Thomas Buchanan his colleague died, and he was promoted to the first charge

In the controversy regarding the Marrow of Modern Divinity, Mr Ralph Erskine took a deep interest The synod of Fife, of which he was a member, were peculiarly strict in enforcing compliance with the act of Assembly, passed in 1720, prohibiting all ministers from recommending the Marrow. As Mr Erskine did not choose to comply with this prohibition, he was formally arraigned before the synod for noncompliance, and strictly charged to be more obedient for the future, on pain of being subjected to censure The synod farther required that he, as well as the other Marrowmen within their bounds, should subscribe anew the Confession of Faith, in a sense agreeably to the Assembly's deed of 1720 Mr Erskine refused to submit to this injunction, but professed his readiness to subscribe anew the Confession of Faith, as received by the Church of Scotland in 1647 [Supplement to M'Kerrow's History of the Secession Church, page 837] In the famous controversy with the General Assembly, which led to the Secession, concerning the act of Assembly of 1732, with respect to the planting of vacant churches, as related in the life of Ebenezer Erskine, his brother Ralph Erskine adhered to all the protests that were entered in behalf of the four brethren, and was present at Gairney Bridge, in December 1733, when the latter formed themselves into the Associate Presbytery, although he took no part in their proceedings On the 18th of February, 1737, he formally joined himself to the Seceders, and was accordingly deposed by the General Assembly, along with the other Seceding brethren, in 1740

Soon after entering on the ministry, he composed his 'Gospel Sonnets,' which have often been reprinted About 1738 he published his poetical paraphrase of 'The Song of Solomon' Having frequently been requested by the Associate Synod to employ some of his vacant hours in versifying all the Scripture songs, he published, in 1750, a new version of the Book of Lamentations He had also prepared 'Job's Hymns' for the press, but they did not appear till after his decease When the rupture took place in the Associate Synod in 1747 on account of the Burgess oath, Mr Erskine joined the Burgher section, while his son Mr John Erskine, minister at Leslie, adhered to the Antiburghers His son James became colleague and successor to his uncle, Ebenezer, at Stirling in January 1752

Mr Erskine died of a nervous fever, November 6, 1752. He was twice married, first, to Margaret daughter of Mr Dewar of Lassodie, by whom he had ten children, and, secondly, to Margaret, daughter of Mr. Simpson, writer to the signet, Edinburgh, by whom he had four children. It is related that the only amusement in which this celebrated divine indulged was playing on the violin He was so great a proficient on this instrument, and so often beguiled his leisure hours with it, that the people of Dunfermline believed he composed his sermons to its tones

His son, Henry, in a letter addressed to a relative, giving an account of his father's death, says "He preached here last Sabbath save one with very remarkable life and fervency He spoke but little all the time, that the disease did not evidently appear to be present death approaching, the physicians having ordered care to be taken to keep him quiet. But after he had taken the remarkable and sudden change to the worse, which was not till Sabbath, he then spoke a great deal, but could not be understood Only among his last words he was heard to say, 'I will be for ever a debtor to free grace'" Mr Whitefield, giving an account of the last expressions of several dying Christians, in a sermon preached from Isa lx. 19, says, "Thus died Mr Ralph Erskine His last words were, 'Victory, victory, victory!'" Mr Erskine, as a preacher, is said to have had a "pleasant voice, an agreeable manner, a warm and pathetic address" In his public appearances, he endeavoured to adapt himself to the capacity of his audience, and, instead of using the 'enticing words of man's wisdom,' he addressed to them the truths of the gospel in their genuine purity and simplicity His style was strictly evangelical and experimental

On the 27th of June, 1849, a monument to his memory was formally inaugurated at Dunfermline The monument, which consists of a statue of the venerated Seceder, modelled and sculptured in Berry law stone by Mr Handyside Ritchie, is placed on an appropriate pedestal in the area in front of the Queen Anne Street church, of the congregation attending which Mr Ralph Erskine was minister The figure is of large monumental size, and represents Erskine in the dress of the period in which he lived—the full skirted coat, with large cuffs, breeches, and stockings, the clerical costume of the middle of the 18th century

The greater part of Ralph Erskine's works were originally printed in single sermons and small tracts. The following is a list of them

ERSKINE, Henry, third Lord Cardross, an eminent patriot, eldest son of David, second Lord Cardross, by his first wife, Anne, fifth daughter of Sir Thomas Hope, king's advocate, was born in 1650, and succeeded to the title in 1671 He had been educated by his father in the principles of civil and religious liberty, and he early joined himself to the opposers of the earl of Lauderdale's administration, in consequence of which he was exposed to much persecution In 1674 he was fined £5,000 for the then serious offence of his lady's hearing divine worship performed in his own house by her own chaplain Of this fine he paid £1,000, and after six months' attendance at court, in the vain endeavour to procure a remission of the rest, he was, on August 5, 1675, imprisoned in the castle of Edinburgh, wherein he continued for four years In May of that year, while his lordship was at Edinburgh, a party of soldiers went to his house of Cardross at midnight, and after using his lady with much rudeness and incivility, fixed a garrison there to his great loss In 1677 his lady having had a child baptized by a non-conforming minister, he was again fined in £3,000, although it was done without his knowledge, he being then in prison In June 1679 the king's forces, on their march to the west, went two miles out of their road, in order that they might quarter on his estates of Kirkhill and Uphall, in West Lothian

On July 30, 1679, Lord Cardross was released, on giving bond for the amount of his fine, and, early in 1680, he repaired to London, to lay before the king a narrative of the sufferings which he had endured, but the Scottish privy council, in a letter to his majesty, accused him of misrepresentation, and he obtained no redress His lordship now resolved upon quitting his native country, and accordingly proceeded to North America, and established a plantation on Charlestown Neck, in South Carolina In a few years he and the other colonists were driven from this settlement by the Spaniards, when his lordship returned to Europe, and arriving at the Hague, attached himself to the friends of liberty and the Protestant religion, then assembled in Holland He accompanied the prince of Orange to England in 1688, and having, in the following year, raised a regiment of dragoons for the public service, he was of great use under General Mackay in subduing the opposition to the new government In the parliament of 1689 he obtained an act restoring him to his estates He was also sworn a privy councillor, and constituted general of the mint He died at Edinburgh May 21, 1693, in the 44th year of his age

ERSKINE, John, eleventh earl of Mar, or Marr, as it was originally spelt, eldest son of Charles, tenth earl of the name of Erskine, and Lady Mary Maule, daughter of the earl of Panmure, was born at Alloa, in February 1675 He succeeded his father in 1689, and, on coming to the title, found the family estates much involved Following the footsteps of his father, who joined the revolution party, merely because he considered it his interest so to do, the young earl, on entering into public life, attached himself to the party then in power, at the head of which was the duke of Queensberry, the leader of the Scottish whigs He took the oaths and his seat in parliament in Sept 1696, was sworn in a privy councillor the following year, and was afterwards appointed to the command of a regiment of foot, and invested with the order of the Thistle In 1704, when the whigs were superseded by the country party, the earl, pursuant to the line of conduct he intended to follow, of making his politics subservient to his interest, immediately paid court to the new administration, by placing himself at the head of such of the duke of Queensberry's friends as opposed the marquis of Tweeddale and his party In this situation he showed so much dexterity, and managed his opposition with so much art and address, that he was considered by the tories as a man of probity, and well inclined to the exiled family Afterwards, when the whig party came again into power, he gave them his support, and became very zealous in promoting all the measures of the court, particularly the treaty of union, for which he presented the draught of an act in parliament, in 1705 To reward his exertions, he was, after the prorogation of the parliament, appointed secretary of state for Scotland, instead of the marquis of Annandale, who was displaced, because he was suspected of holding a correspondence with the squadron, who were inclined to support the succession to the crown without, rather than with, the proposed union His lordship was chosen one of the sixteen representative peers in 1707, and re-elected at the general election the following year, and in 1710 and 1713 By the share he had taken in bringing about the union, Mar had rendered himself very unpopular in Scotland, but he endeavoured to regain the favour of his countrymen, by attending a deputation of Scottish members, consisting of the duke of Argyle, himself, Cockburn, younger of Ormiston, and Lockhart of Carnwath, which waited on Queen Anne in 1712, to inform her of their resolution to move for a repeal of the union with England When the earl of Findlater brought forward a motion for repeal in the house of lords, Mar spoke strongly in favour of it, and pressed the dissolution of the union as the only means to preserve the peace of the island He was made a privy-councillor in 1708, and on the death of the duke of Queensberry in 1713, the earl was again appointed secretary of state for Scotland, and thus for the second time joined the tory party

On the death of Queen Anne, on the 1st of August 1714, the schemes of the Bolingbroke ministry having been baffled by the activity of the leaders of the whigs, his lordship, secretary of state, signed the proclamation of George I., and in a letter to the king, then on his way through Holland, dated Whitehall, August 30, made protestations of his loyalty, and reference to his past services to the government He likewise procured a letter to be addressed to himself by some of the heads of the Jacobite clans, said to be drawn up by Lord Grange, his brother, but evidently his own composition, declaring that as they had always been ready to follow his lordship's directions in serving Queen Anne, they were equally ready to concur with him in serving his majesty A loyal address of the clans to the king to the same effect was drawn up by his brother, Lord Grange, which, on his majesty's arrival at Greenwich, he intended to present But the king was too well aware that, in order to ingratiate himself with Queen Anne, he had procured from the same parties an address of a very opposite character only a few years previous He was accordingly unnoticed on presenting himself to the king on his landing, and dismissed from office within eight days afterwards

Though not possessed of shining talents, he made ample amends for their deficiencies by artifice and an insinuating and courteous deportment, and managed his designs with such prudence and circumspection as to render it extremely difficult to ascertain his object when he desired concealment, by which conduct "he showed himself," in the opinion of a contemporary, "to be a man of good sense, but bad morals" [Lockhart, vol 1, p 436] The versatility of his politics was perhaps owing rather to the peculiar circumstances in which he was placed than to any innate viciousness of disposition He was a Jacobite from principle, but as the fortunes of his house had been greatly impaired in the civil war by its attachment to the Stuarts, and, as upon his entrance into public life, he found the cause of the exiled family at a low ebb, he sought to retrieve the losses which his ancestors had sustained, while, at the same time, he gratified his ambition, by aspiring to power, which he could only hope to acquire by attaching himself to the existing government The loss of a place of five thousand pounds a-year, without any chance of ever again enjoying the sweets of office, was gall and wormwood to such a man This disappointment, and the studied insult he had received from the king, operating upon a selfish and ambitious spirit, drove him into open rebellion, with no other view than the gratification of his revenge But whatever were his qualifications in the cabinet, he was without military experience, and consequently unfit to command an army, as the result showed

As early as May 1715, a report was current among the Jacobites of Scotland, of the design of the Chevalier de St George to make a descent on Great Britain, in order to recover the crown, in consequence of which they began to bestir themselves, by providing arms, horses, &c. These and other movements indicated to the government that an insurrection was intended Bodies of armed men were seen marching towards the Highlands, and a party of Highlanders appeared in arms near Inverlochy, which was, however, soon dispersed In this situation of matters, the lords-justices sent down to Scotland a considerable number of half-pay officers, to officer the militia of the country, under the direction of Major-General Whitham, then commander-in-chief in Scotland These prompt measures alarmed the Jacobites, who, after several consultations, returned to their homes As the lords-justices had received information that the chevalier intended to land in North Britain, they offered a reward of £100 000 sterling for his apprehension

On the eve of Mar's departure from England, to place himself at the head of the intended insurrection in Scotland, he resolved to show himself at court, and, accordingly, he appeared in the presence of King George on the first of August, 1715, with all the complaisance of a courtier, and with that affability of demeanour for which he was so distinguished

Having matured his plans and apprised his confederates, he disguised himself by changing his usual dress, and on the following day embarked at Gravesend on board a collier bound for Newcastle On arriving there he went on board another vessel bound for the Frith of Forth, and was landed at Elie, a small port on the Fife coast, near the mouth of the Frith Visiting various Jacobite friends on his way, he reached his seat of Kildrummy in the Braes of Mar on the 18th, and on the following day summoned a meeting of the neighbouring noblemen and gentlemen to a grand hunting match at Aboyne on the 27th, which was numerously attended, and where he addressed them in a regular and well ordered speech. The result was an unanimous resolution to take up arms According to arrangements at a subsequent meeting at the same place on 3d September, he on the 6th set up the standard of the Pretender at Castletown of Braemar, assuming the title of lieutenant-general of his majesty's forces in Scotland The Chevalier was about the same time proclaimed king, under the name of James VIII, at Aberdeen, and various other towns The earl immediately marched to Dunkeld, and, after a few days' rest, to Perth, where he established his head-quarters Finding his army increased to about 12,000 men, he resolved to attack Stirling, and accordingly left Perth on November 10, but encountered the royal army, under the command of the duke of Argyle, at Sheriffmuir, near Dunblane, on the 13th, when the advantage was on the side of the king's troops, the rebels being compelled to return to Perth

The unfortunate and ill-advised James having landed at Peterhead from France, December 22, 1715, the earl, now created by him duke of Mar, hastened to meet him at Fetteresso, and attended him to Scone, where he issued several proclamations, distinguished, like all his previous ones, by great ability, including one for his coronation on January 23, but soon after they removed to Perth, where it was resolved to abandon the enterprise The Pretender, with the earl of Mar, Lord Drummond, and others, embarked at Montrose, February 4, in a French ship which had been kept off the coast, and were landed at Waldam, near Gravelines, February 11, 1716 For his share in this rebellion, the earl was attainted by act of parliament, and his estates forfeited

His lordship accompanied the Pretender to Rome, and remained in his service for some years, having the chief direction of his affairs Having, soon after his return, been violently accused by Bolingbroke—his former superior in the English ministry—with regard to the conduct of the rebellion in 1715, he, in order to revenge himself on his rival, prevailed on the duke of Ormond to report, in presence of the Chevalier, certain abusive expressions which Bolingbroke, when in a state of intoxication, had uttered in disparagement of his master Bolingbroke was, in consequence, deprived of the seals, then possessed by him He thereupon proffered his services to King George, and some years afterwards obtained a pardon and had his estates restored to him In 1721 the earl of Mar left Rome, and, after a short residence in Geneva, where he was subjected to a brief confinement at the instance of the British government, he took up his residence at Paris as minister of James at the French court During his residence in Geneva, he applied for and received a loan from the earl of Stair, the British ambassador at Paris, and soon thereafter accepted a pension of two thousand pounds from the British government, which, at the same time, allowed his countess and daughter one thousand five hundred pounds annually, of jointure and aliment, out of the produce of his estate

These relations with the British ministry, however, induced James gradually to withdraw his confidence from him, and being involved in disputes with parties connected with the household, and accused by Bishop Atterbury of having betrayed the secrets of his master to the English ministry, he was in 1724 dismissed from his post as minister at Paris, and finally broke with the Stuarts in 1725 He prepared a narrative in exculpation, and although his justification is far from complete, it is evident that there exist no sufficient data on which to found a charge of deliberate treachery His negociations with the earl of Stair, the British ambassador in France, for a pardon, which, however, were unsuccessful, are printed in the Hardwicke Collection of State Papers In 1729, on account of the bad state of his health, he went to Aix-la-Chapelle, where he died in May 1732 His lordship was twice married, first, to Lady Margaret Hay, daughter of the earl of Kinnoul, by whom he had two sons, and, secondly, to Lady Frances Pierrepont, daughter of Evelyn, duke of Kingston, by whom he had one daughter His principal occupation in his exile was the drawing of architectural plans and designs His forfeited estates were bought of government for his son Lord Erskine, by the uncle of the latter, Erskine of Grange.

ERSKINE, JOHN, of Carnock, an eminent lawyer, son of the Hon Colonel John Erskine of Carnock, third son of Lord Cardross by his second wife Anne, eldest daughter of William Dundas of Kincavel, was born in 1695 His father, from his conscientious support of the presbyterian church, and the civil and religious liberties of the country, during the arbitrary reign of James the Second of England, was obliged to retire to Holland, where he obtained the command of a company in a regiment of foot, in the service of the prince of Orange He was one of the most zealous supporters of the revolution of 1688, and on the occurrence of that event he accompanied the prince to England As a reward for his service and attachment, he was appointed lieutenant-governor of Stirling castle, and a lieutenant-colonel of a regiment of foot, and afterwards received the governorship of the castle of Dumbarton In the last Scottish parliament, he was representative of the town of Stirling, and was a great promoter of the union In 1707 he was nominated to a seat in the united parliament of Great Britain, and at the general election in the following year he was chosen member for the Stirling district of burghs He died at Edinburgh, January 1748, in the 82d year of his age His son John, the subject of this notice, became a member of the faculty of advocates in 1719, and, in 1737, on the death of Professor Bayne, succeeded him as professor of Scots law in the university of Edinburgh In 1754 he published his 'Principles of the Law of Scotland,' which thenceforth became a manual for students In 1765 he resigned the professorship, and retired from public life, occupying the next three years chiefly in preparing for publication his 'Institute of the Law of Scotland,' which, however, did not appear till 1773, five years after his death The Institute continues to be regarded as the standard book of reference in the courts of law of Scotland

Mr Erskine died March 1, 1768, at Cardross, the estate of his grandfather, Lord Cardross. He was twice married, first, to Margaret, daughter of the Hon James Melville of Balgarvie, Fifeshire, of the noble family of Leven and Melville, by whom he had the celebrated Dr John Erskine, one of the ministers of Edinburgh, the subject of the following notice, and secondly, to Anne, second daughter of Mr Stirling of Keir, by whom he had four sons and two daughters

The following is a list of his works —

The Principles of the Law of Scotland, in the order of Sir George Mackenzie's Institutions of that Law Edin 1754, 1757, 1764, 8vo. With Notes and Corrections by Gillon 1809, 8vo.

Edin 1804, fol Enlarged with additional Notes, and improved by Gillon 1805, fol New edition with Additional Notes by James Ivory, advocate, 1828, 2vols. fol

ERSKINE, JOHN, D D, eldest son of the preceding, was born June 2, 1721 He received the rudiments of his classical education, assisted by a private tutor, at the school of Cupar in Fife, and at the high school of Edinburgh, and entered the university there in the winter of 1734-35 Among his contemporaries at college was Robertson the historian, afterwards principal of the university, with whom he formed an intimate friendship which, notwithstanding their difference of opinion in matters of church polity in after years continued to be cherished through life with unabated sincerity At that period several of the chairs in the university of Edinburgh were occupied by men of considerable eminence Sir John Pringle who was afterwards president of the Royal Society of London, was professor of moral philosophy while Mr Stevenson ably filled the chair of logic and Dr Erskine derived considerable benefit from their lectures He was originally destined for the bar, a profession in which his father had acquired distinguished reputation, and in which, had he applied himself to it, he had every reason to expect its emoluments and honours With this view, after his course of philosophy was finished, he attended some of the law classes His own inclination, however, led him to prefer the church Possessed of an uncommon seriousness of temper, and a quiet meditative disposition, his attachment to the ministry of the gospel overcame the pride of family, the love of honour, and the temptation of riches His resolution to study theology met with the most determined opposition from his family, but his path had been chosen, and at last, but with great difficulty, he obtained his father's consent, and after attending the divinity classes, he was, in 1743, licensed to preach by the presbytery of Dunblane He preached his first public sermon in the church of Torryburn, of which parish he was afterwards patron, from Psalm lxxxiv. 10, a passage remarkably suitable to his own circumstances In 1741, before he was twenty years of age, Mr Erskine had written, and published anonymously, a pamphlet, entitled 'The Law of Nature sufficiently propagated to the Heathen World, or an Enquiry into the ability of the Heathens to discover the Being of a God, and the Immortality of Human Souls,' being intended as an answer to the erroneous doctrines maintained by Dr Campbell, professor of divinity in the university of St Andrews, in his treatise on 'The Necessity of Revelation' Having sent a copy of his pamphlet to Dr Warburton and Dr Doddridge, they both expressed their high approval of it, in a correspondence which it was the means of opening up between them

In May 1744 Mr Erskine was ordained minister of Kirkintilloch, in the presbytery of Glasgow In 1754 he was translated to the parish of Culross, in the presbytery of Dunfermline, and in June 1758 he was called to the New Greyfriars church, Edinburgh His 'Theological Dissertations' appeared in 1765, and in November 1766, the university of Glasgow conferred on him the degree of D D In July 1767, he was united with his early friend Dr Robertson in the collegiate charge of the Old Greyfriars parish of that city, a connexion which subsisted till the death of Dr Robertson in 1793 It is not easy to conceive two individuals who differed more in spirit, preaching, and various parts of Christian character, than these two men, both eminent, though in very different respects Dr Robertson, a man of the finest taste and talents, and of the most winning and courteous manners, was devoted to the pursuit of literary renown He was the leader of the anti-evangelical or extreme moderate party in the church, and was more prominent as such than, with all his genius, distinguished as a preacher of the gospel Dr Erskine, on the other hand, was a man deeply versed in religious knowledge, devoted to his Master's work, and alive to everything which involved his glory, who regarded Christianity as a revelation which chiefly relates to things invisible and eternal. Dead to the world, and ambitious only of the approbation of God, he was looked up to as the father of the orthodox clergy, and as the friend of all good men In every point of view, it was a singular combination That Dr Erskine had some way of reconciling his mind to the propriety of a situation, the irksomeness of which he must have felt, in which he every Lord's day listened to doctrines very different from his own, and had to co-operate where there could be no cordial agreement, we are bound to believe But it often gave rise, it is said, to rather awkward collisions The story is told that his colleague one morning had given his audience a very flattering picture of virtue, concluding with declaring his conviction, that if ever perfect virtue should appear on the face of the earth, the world would fall down and worship it Dr Erskine took an opportunity, as it is reported, of adverting to the same subject in the afternoon, and with equal confidence, and much greater truth, declared, that when the most perfect virtue that ever adorned humanity, descended to the earth, the world, instead of admiring it, cried, 'Crucify it! Crucify it!'

His great desire to obtain the most authentic information as to the state of religion in the provinces of North America, as well as on the continent of Europe, led him into an extensive correspondence with divines and eminent men in all parts of the world With America, we are told, his intercourse began at a very early period, and there were few of its more celebrated writers or preachers with whom he did not exchange books and letters This practice, we are told, added much to his labour, not only by an increased and voluminous epistolary intercourse, but in "being called upon, by the friends of deceased divines, to correct and superintend the publication of posthumous works." The celebrated Jonathan Edwards was one of his earliest and most esteemed transatlantic correspondents To assist him in carrying on the Arminian controversy, Dr Erskine sent him many useful books, and by his advice and exhortations powerfully contributed to the production of some of his most valuable publications. The greater part of the works of President Edwards, Dickenson, Stoddart, and Fraser of Alness, were edited by him at the request of the relatives of these distinguished men, which necessarily entailed upon him an amount of labour that, though very great, was cheerfully undertaken by him

For more than half a century Dr Erskine was the centre of one of the most extensive religious circles in Great Britain, or perhaps anywhere else; and such was his anxiety to be informed of the state of religion, morality, and learning on the continent, that at an advanced period of his life he made himself master of the Dutch and German languages In 1790 he published the first volume of his valuable 'Sketches and Hints of Church History and Theological Controversy, chiefly translated or abridged from modern foreign writers,' the second volume of which appeared in 1799 His zeal in the cause of religious truth led him to take a principal share in the business of the Society for Propagating Christian Knowledge, of which, so long as his strength remained, he was an active and useful member In the Church courts he was for many years the leader of the popular party, while his colleague, Dr Robertson, with whom he always continued on terms of intimate friendship, was the head of the moderate side of the Church

In political matters Dr Erskine entertained bold and independent opinions, which he did not scruple to express freely when occasion demanded The breach with the American colonies he viewed with much concern, and considered the war which followed as on both sides unnatural, unchristian, and impolitic He published several pamphlets on the subject, before its commencement, and during its progress, which are written with ability and candour One of these, a discourse, entitled 'Shall I go to War with my American Brethren?' is said to have given so great offence to those in power, that no bookseller would run the risk of its publication, and it appeared at London in 1769, without any publisher's imprint being attached to it The discourse, however, was reprinted at Edinburgh in 1776, with the author's name, and the addition of a preface and appendix, even more in opposition to the views of government than the discourse itself He was opposed to the constitution given to Canada, conceiving that the Roman Catholic religion had been too much favoured. He dreaded the progress of popery, both at home and abroad, and thought it his duty to warn his countrymen against its dangerous doctrines, and insidious wiles In 1778, when an attempt was made to repeal certain enactments against the Roman Catholics of Great Britain, he entered into a correspondence with Mr Burke, on the subject, which was afterwards published. The bill of 1780, for relieving the Roman Catholics, was also opposed by him However tolerant his sentiments, and anxious to admit all classes to equal liberty of worship, he could not but consider popery in its political as well as religious aspect, and as a system of persecution and superstition he utterly condemned it On the subject of the Catholic controversy, Dr Campbell of Aberdeen took the opposite side to Dr Erskine, and published an ably written 'Address to the People of Scotland, upon the alarms that have been raised in regard to Popery' The General Assembly, on the other hand, supported the views of Dr Erskine, and deliberately decided against the Catholic claims

He had been from his infancy of a weak bodily constitution, and as old age approached his appearance was that of a man whose strength was gone For several winters he had been unable to preach regularly, and for the last sixteen months of his life he had preached none at all, his voice having become so weak as to be incapable of making himself heard His mental faculties, however, remained unimpaired to the last Since 1801 he had commenced a periodical publication, five numbers of which were published, entitled 'Religious Intelligence from Abroad,' and, the week previous to his death, he sent his bookseller notice that he had materials collected for another number On Tuesday, January 18, 1803, he was occupied till a late hour in his study About four o'clock of the morning of the 19th he was taken suddenly ill, and almost immediately expired, in the eighty-second year of his age Besides the works already mentioned, and various others of less general interest, Dr Erskine was the author of two volumes of sermons, the one published by himself in 1798, and the other edited after his death by the late Rev Sir Henry Moncreiff, and published in 1804 In Guy Mannering, Sir Walter Scott has taken occasion to introduce a graphic and interesting description of the person and manner of preaching of this celebrated divine "His external appearance," he says, "was not prepossessing A remarkably fair complexion, strangly contrasted with a black wig, without a grain of powder, a narrow chest and a stooping posture, hands which, placed like props on either side of the pulpit, seemed necessary rather to support the person than to assist the gesticulation of the preacher, a gown (not even that of, Geneva), a tumbled band, and a gesture, which seemed scarcely voluntary, were the first circumstances that struck a stranger" The annexed woodcut is a faithful representation of his attitude in the pulpt on commencing his discourse

His body was interred in the Greyfriars churchyard By his wife, the Hon Christian Mackay, third daughter of George third Lord Reay, he had a family of fourteen children, but only four survived him, namely, David Erskine, Esq of Carnock, and three daughters, one of whom was the mother of James Stuart, Esq of Dunearn, who shot Sir Alexander Boswell in a duel in 1822.

Dr Erskine was remarkable for his simplicity of manners, unaffected humility, and kindly and benevolent disposition His temper was ardent, his affections warm, and his attachments, like his piety, constant and sincere. Of his good nature the following anecdote is told For several Sundays he had returned from church without his pocket handkerchief, and could not account for the loss Mrs Erskine, suspecting an elderly-looking poor woman who constantly occupied a seat on the stair leading to the pulpit, sewed a handkerchief to the pocket of Dr Erskine's Sunday coat On the following Sunday, the doctor was proceeding in his usual manner towards the pulpit, when, on passing the suspected person, he felt a gentle tug from behind The minister turned gently round, and, clapping her on the head, merely remarked, "No the day, honest woman, no the day" [Kay's Edinburgh Portraits]

During the disturbances in Edinburgh in 1778, occasioned by the bill for the repeal of the penal statutes against the Roman Catholics, a furious mob, incensed at the support which his colleague, Principal Robertson, had given to that obnoxious measure, assembled in the college yard, for the purpose of demolishing the house of the latter, which they would, in all probability, have done, in defiance of the military who had been called to the spot, had not Dr Erskine appeared, and exhorted them to disperse quietly So great was his influence and popularity that they immediately obeyed On the death of the principal, Dr Erskine preached his funeral sermon, and did ample justice to his great talents, and many estimable qualities

In the years 1741 and 1742, when Dr Erskine was a student at college, Mr Whitefield, the founder of the Calvinistic Methodists, visited Scotland, and excited unusual attention by his powerful eloquence, and the doctrines which he taught Among the warmest admirers of this celebrated preacher was the subject of this notice, and his merits and character having become the subject of discussion in a literary society, of which Erskine and his friend and fellow-student Dr Robertson were members, the debate was conducted with so much warmth and asperity on both sides that it is said to have led to the dissolution of the society, and Erskine and Robertson having taken opposite views, a temporary breach of their friendship and intercourse was the consequence. In 1748 when Whitefield again came to Scotland, and visited the west country, he was, as on the former occasions, admitted to the pulpits of many of the established clergy, and among the rest to that of Dr Erskine, who was then minister of Kirkintilloch, as well as to the churches of some of his friends who held similar views to his in ecclesiastical matters This liberality was not relished by some of his clerical brethren, and at a meeting of the synod at Glasgow in October 1748, a motion was made with special reference to Mr Whitefield, who had just been in that district, "That no minister in their bounds should employ a stranger of doubtful character, till after consulting his presbytery" This produced an animated and prolonged debate, in which Dr Erskine took an active part, and of which he afterwards published a short account, without his name

Of Mr Wesley's doctrines he was not so great an admirer as he had been of those of Mr Whitefield Some time previous to his being translated to the Old Greyfriars parish of Edinburgh, he became engaged in a controversy with Mr John Wesley He published anonymously a small pamphlet entitled, 'Mr Wesley's principles detected,' in which he endeavoured to expose the enthusiasm, the erroneous views, and religious management of that gentleman Mr Wesley was too prudent to enter the lists of theological warfare with Dr Erskine, but endeavoured to smooth over the affair by a very flattering and complimentary letter to him

Dr Erskine's learning was extensive, various, and solid, though he never employed it, nor his natural talents, which were very great, for the purpose of display As a public speaker he was too little attentive to those external recommendations, which give the great charm to many preachers His pronunciation was uncommonly broad, and his gestures and action extremely awkward Neither were his sermons distinguished by studied elegance of language, or by the higher graces of eloquence, but they possessed what was of far greater value, a native simplicity of style, an energy of sentiment, a richness in scriptural illustration, and a purity of doctrine, which were scarcely excelled by those of any minister of his day. The character of his pulpit oratory is well described by Sir Walter Scott in that passage of Guy Mannering, a small portion of which has been already quoted "A lecture was delivered," says the novelist, in this case depicting faithfully, "fraught with new, striking, and entertaining views of scripture history—a sermon in which the Calvinism of the kirk of Scotland was ably supported, yet made the basis of a sound system of practical morals, which should neither shelter the sinner under the cloak of speculative faith or of peculiarity of opinion, nor leave him loose to the waves of unbelief and schism Something there was of an antiquated turn of argument and metaphor, but it only served to give zest and peculiarity to the style of elocution The sermon was not read—a scrap of paper, containing the heads of the discourse, was occasionally referred to, and the enunciation, which at first seemed imperfect and embarrassed, became, as the preacher warmed in his progress, animated and distinct, and although the discourse could not be quoted as a correct specimen of pulpit eloquence, yet Mannering had seldom heard so much learning, metaphysical acuteness, and energy of argument brought into the service of Christianity" An 'Account of the Life and Writings of Dr Erskine,' by the late Rev Sir Henry Moncrieff Wellwood, baronet, minister of St Cuthberts, was published in 1818, 8vo, which presents much interesting and valuable information relative to the ecclesiastical state of Scotland during the eighteenth century

The following is a list of Dr Erskine's works, besides the various publications edited by him, or for which he wrote prefaces —

ERSKINE, DAVID STEUART, eleventh earl of Buchan, [counting from 'Hearty James,' the uterine brother of King James the Second, on whom the title was conferred in 1466,] a nobleman distinguished for his patronage of literature, was born June 1, 1742 He was educated in the university of Glasgow, where he applied himself ardently to study, and also devoted some time to the arts of designing, etching, and engraving, in the academy of Robert Foulis the printer An etching by him of the abbey of Icolmkill, with an account of that island, is inserted in the first volume of the Transactions of the Society of Scottish Antiquaries, published in 1792 In the same volume also appeared the following papers from his pen, viz Memoirs of the Life of Sir James Steuart Denham, Account of the parish of Uphall, and a Life of Mr James Short, Optician On leaving college he entered the army, but never rose higher than a lieutenant He afterwards entered the diplomatic department under the celebrated Lord Chatham, and in 1766 was appointed secretary to the British embassy in Spain

On the death of his father in 1767, he succeeded to the earldom, and, returning to Scotland, devoted the remainder of his life to the study of the history and antiquities of his native country Although the impaired fortunes of his family led him to adopt a plan of the most rigid economy, it is highly honourable to his memory that he not only voluntarily took upon himself the payment of his father's debts, but was at the principal charge of the education of his two younger brothers, the Hon Henry Erskine, and Thomas, afterwards lord high chancellor of Great Britain He also distinguished himself by patronising public works and institutions. He offered premiums for competition between the students of the high school of Edinburgh and those of the university of Aberdeen, and to his exertions the Society of Antiquaries at Edinburgh is indebted for its existence, having been originated by him on November 14, 1780 He was the friend and patron of Burns, the poet, Barry, the painter, Pinkerton, the historian, and other men of talent In 1791 he instituted an annual festival in commemoration of Thomson, the author of 'The Seasons,' at Ednam, in Roxburghshire, the poet's native place, and on his grounds at Dryburgh, he erected an Ionic temple, with a statue of Apollo in the inside, and a bust of the bard of 'The Seasons' surmounting the dome He also raised a colossal statue of Sir William Wallace, on the summit of a steep and thickly planted hill, which was placed on its pedestal September 22, 1814, the anniversary of the victory at Stirling bridge in 1297 "It occupies so eminent a situation," says Mr Chambers, "that Wallace, frowning towards England, is visible even from Berwick, a distance of more than thirty miles" Dryburgh abbey and the estate, which he had become possessed of in 1785, originally belonged to the Haliburtons of Merton

His lordship has given a long account of the abbey in Grose's Antiquities Lord Buchan died at an advanced age, in April 1829, at his seat of Dryburgh abbey, Berwickshire He had married in 1771 his cousin, Margaret, eldest daughter of William Fraser, Esq of Fraserfield, Aberdeenshire, but by her, who died 12th May 1819, he had no issue He was succeeded by his nephew, Henry David, eldest son of his brother the Hon Henry Erskine He had a natural son, Captain David Erskine, at one time a professor in the Military College at Sandhurst, who was knighted by William IV soon after his accession to the throne Sir David died at Dryburgh abbey in 1838. The earl of Buchan was an industrious contributor to 'The Bee,' 'The Gentleman's Magazine,' and other publications, and, in 1812, published at Edinburgh his 'Anonymous and Fugitive Essays, collected from various periodical works.' His principal publications consist of a 'Speech intended to have been Spoken at the Meeting of the Peers of Scotland in 1780,' 'An Account of the Life, Writings, and Inventions of Napier of Merchiston,' written in conjunction with Dr Walter Minto, 1787; and an 'Essay on the Lives and Writings of Fletcher of Saltoun and the Poet Thomson,' 1792. In this last year, his lordship had sent, by the hands of Mr Archibald Robertson, a portrait painter, who then visited America, to the president of the United States an elegantly mounted snuff-box, made from the tree which sheltered Wallace. The box had been presented to Lord Buchan by the goldsmiths of Edinburgh in 1782, from whom he obtained leave to transfer it to "the only man in the world to whom he thought it justly due."

Lord Buchan's residence was for many years in Edinburgh, but in 1787 he retired, on account of his health, to Dryburgh abbey, a property he had acquired by purchase. The most prominent feature of his character was vanity, of which many amusing anecdotes are told. A remarkable instance of it is narrated by Mr Lockhart, in his Life of Sir Walter Scott. In 1819 when Scott was lying very ill, in his house in Castle Street, Edinburgh, the earl of Buchan, hearing that he was at the point of death, proceeded to the house of the great novelist, and found the knocker tied up. He then descended to the area door, and was there received by Peter Matheson, the coachman of Scott, whose face confirmed the woful tidings of his master's illness. "Peter told his lordship" continues Mr Lockhart, "that he had the strictest orders to admit no visitor, but the earl would take no denial, pushed the bashful coachman aside, and elbowed his way up stairs to the door of Scott's bedchamber. He had his fingers on the handle before Peter could give warning to Miss Scott, and when she appeared, to remonstrate against such an intrusion, he patted her on the head like a child, and persisted in his purpose of entering the sick-room so strenuously, that the young lady found it necessary to bid Peter see the earl down stairs again, at whatever damage to his dignity. Peter accordingly, after trying all his eloquence in vain, gave the tottering, bustling, old meddlesome coxcomb a single shove,—as respectful, doubt not, as a shove can ever be,—and he accepted that hint, and made a rapid exit. Scott, meanwhile, had heard the confusion, and at length it was explained to him, when, fearing that Peter's gripe might have injured Lord Buchan's feeble person, he desired James Ballantyne, who had been sitting by his bed, to follow the old man home, make him comprehend, if he could, that the family were in such bewilderment of alarm that the ordinary rules of civility were out of the question, and, in time, inquire what had been the object of his lordship's intended visit. James proceeded forthwith to the earl's house in George Street, and found him strutting about his library in a towering indignation. Ballantyne's elaborate demonstrations of respect, however, by degrees softened him, and he condescended to explain himself. 'I wished,' said he, 'to embrace Walter Scott before he died, and inform him that I had long considered it as a satisfactory circumstance that he and I were destined to rest together in the same place of sepulchre. The principal thing, however, was to relieve his mind as to the arrangements of his funeral—to show him a plan which I had prepared for the procession—and, in a word, to assure him that I took upon myself the whole conduct of the ceremonial at Dryburgh.' He then exhibited to Ballantyne a formal programme, in which, as may be supposed, the predominant feature was not Walter Scott, but David earl of Buchan. It had been settled, inter alia, that the said earl was to pronounce an eulogium over the grave, after the fashion of the French Academicians in the Pere la Chaise. "And this silliest and vainest of busybodies," adds Lockhart, "was the elder brother of Thomas and Henry Erskine!" But the story is well-known of his boasting one day to the late duchess of Gordon of the extraordinary talents of his family—when her unscrupulous Grace asked him, very coolly, whether the wit had not come by the mother, and been all settled on the younger branches." Scott outlived the earl, and formed one of the company at his lordship's funeral ten years after the scene above described had taken place. Under date April 20, 1829, he has the following entry in his diary. "Lord Buchan is dead, a person whose immense vanity, bordering on insanity, obscured, or rather eclipsed, very considerable talents. His imagination was so fertile, that he seemed really to believe in the extraordinary fictions which he delighted in telling His economy, most laudable in the early part of his life, when it enabled him, from a small income, to pay his father's debts, became a miserable habit, and led him to do mean things He had a desire to be a great man and a Mecænas—a bon marché The two celebrated lawyers, his brothers, were not more gifted by nature than I think he was, but the restraints of a profession kept the eccentricity of the family in order Both Henry and Thomas were saving men, yet both died very poor The latter at one time possessed £200,000, the other had a considerable fortune The earl alone has died wealthy It is saving, not getting, that is the mother of riches They all had wit The earl's was crackbrained, and sometimes caustic, Henry's was of the very kindest, best-humoured, and gayest sort that ever cheered society, that of Lord Erskine was moody and muddish, but I never saw him in his best days" Lord Buchan's personal vanity was also exhibited in the numerous portraits and busts of him which were taken during his lifetime. An excellent painting, by Sir Joshua Reynolds, adorns the hall of the Scottish Antiquaries Another, by Alexander Runciman, is in the Museum of the Perth Antiquarian Society He also presented to the faculty of Advocates a portrait in crayons, with an inscription written by, and highly complimentary to, himself When Napoleon threatened to invade this country, Lord Buchan, with his pen, endeavoured to promote union among his countrymen, and like other patriotic noblemen and gentlemen of the time, he buckled on his sword, ready, should they have landed, to have repelled the invaders by force of arms His political principles, however, were opposed to those of the government of that day, and when the influence of the ruling powers had destroyed all form of freedom in the election of the Scottish peers, he stood forward singly in defence of the privileges of his order, and after a long and unaided contest, at last succeeded in securing their independence.—Douglas' Peerage, edited by Wood —New Scots Mag —Lockhart's Life of Scott —Kay's Edinburgh Portraits

ERSKINE, the Hon Henry, a distinguished advocate and wit, second son of Henry David, tenth earl of Buchan, and brother of the preceding, was born at Edinburgh, November 1, 1746 He was educated at the universities of St Andrews, Edinburgh, and Glasgow, and, while prosecuting his legal studies, he attended the Forum debating society established at Edinburgh, where he cultivated with success those powers of extempore speaking which afterwards brought him into such high eminence as a pleader He was in 1768 admitted a member of the faculty of advocates, and his transcendent talents and great legal knowledge, together with his quickness of perception, playfulness of fancy, and professional tact, soon placed him at the head of the Scottish bar The forensic eloquence of Scotland was at that period by no means of a high order, and the then forms of court seemed contrived to prevent anything like oratory on the part of the pleaders. Young Erskine, however, rose above all the trammels that bore repressingly on his brethren at the bar, and introduced a style of pleading, animated and graceful beyond anything that had yet been witnessed in the court of session He and Robert Blair, afterwards president of the court of session, were generally engaged as opposite counsel, as the two most eloquent and able members of the bar, and the clear reasoning and sound law of the latter were not always a match for the wit and felicity of remark of his opponent The subjoined woodcut represents Erskine in the act of pleading

to be found in Scotland," and an arena where Henry Dundas, Lord Melville, trained himself for the debates of the senate, Mr Erskine had opportunities of displaying his oratorical powers to great advantage. He advocated from principle and with great consistency the interests of the Evangelical or popular party, as it was called, in that court, and in the memorable struggle for the office of its clerk between Professor Dalzell and Dr Carlisle of Invereak in 1789, the successful issue in favour of the former gentleman, their candidate —the subject of several humorous caricatures by Kay—was due to his judicious precaution of having it provided, before proceeding to the election, that there should be a retrospective scrutiny of the votes He had, about ten years previous (1779), nearly achieved for it an earlier triumph in his own person, in the election of procurator of the church of Scotland, when, after a keen contest, William (afterwards Lord) Robertson, son of the eminent historian, his opponent, obtained it by a narrow majority

At the bar his talents were as much at the service of the poor gratuitously as they were at the command of the rich, who could amply remunerate him for his exertions He was ever ready to rescue innocence from persecution, and to vindicate the cause of the oppressed One remarkable instance of this, (but little known to the public,) was on behalf of Donald M'Arthur, a poor Baptist missionary preacher, the pastor of a small congregation at Port Bannatyne in Bute, who was violently seized, on the 20th October 1805, while celebrating divine service, by one of the local magistrates, and sent as an impressed seaman into his majesty's navy Mr Erskine not only effected his release, after he had been conveyed with rapidity to Ireland, in order to defeat an interdict obtained in the Scotch courts, and thence to the Downs, in order to frustrate an application for a writ of habeas corpus in that kingdom, by an order from the admiralty served after he had passed from one to another of various ships of war,—but obtained a certificate that he should never again be impressed, and instituted a civil process of damages at his own risk, which resulted in a composition of, it is said, £500 to escape a heavier penalty. To his generous interference in this case, the friends of civil and religious liberty are greatly indebted, as since that time, no one has ventured in Scotland to interfere with the persons of those who are engaged in religious instruction, however humble or unprotected [Buchanan's Reports, pp. 60—72] So well, indeed, was this generous trait in his character known, that a poor man, in a remote district of the country, when advised by his solicitor not to enter into a lawsuit with a wealthy neighbour, on account of the expense in which it would involve him, at once replied— "Ye dinna ken what ye say, master, there's nae a puir man in Scotland need to want a friend, or fear an enemy, while Harry Erskine lives!"

Mr Erskine, like his elder brother, had early embraced Whig principles, and, on the accession of the Coalition ministry in 1783, he succeeded Mr Dundas, afterwards Lord Melville, as lord advocate On the morning of the appointment he had an interview with Dundas, in the Outer House, when, observing that the latter had already resumed the ordinary stuff gown which advocates are in the custom of wearing, he said gaily that he "must leave off talking, to go and order his silk gown," the official robe of the lord advocate and solicitor-general "It is hardly worth while," said Dundas, drily, "for the time you will want it—you had better borrow mine" Erskine's reply was exceedingly happy—"From the readiness with which you make the offer, Mr Dundas, I have no doubt that the gown is a gown made to fit any party, but, however short my time in office may be, it shall never be said of Henry Erskine that he put on the abandoned habits of his predecessor" The new administration, however, was soon broken up, when he resumed his station at the bar Mr Erskine was succeeded, as lord advocate, by Ilay Campbell, Esq, afterwards lord president, to whom he said, upon resigning his gown, "My lord, you must take nothing off it, for I'll soon need it again" Mr Campbell replied, "It will be bare enough, Harry, before you get it" In 1786 he was elected dean of the faculty of advocates, but on account of his liberal politics, was defeated in an election for the same office, some years afterwards

On the return of the liberal party to power in 1806, he once more became lord advocate, and was returned member for the Dumfries district of burghs, in the room of major general Dalrymple. On the dissolution of the Whig administration soon after, he again lost his office and his seat in parliament In consequence of declining health, he retired, in 1812, from public life to his beautiful seat of Ammondell, in West Lothian, where he died October 8, 1817, in the 71st year of his age In early life he had cultivated a taste for poetry and music, and was throughout his long and distinguished career celebrated for his witticisms Sir Walter Scott said of him, "Henry Erskine was the best natured man I ever knew, thoroughly a gentleman, and with but one fault—he could not say no, and thus sometimes misled those who trusted him" In person, Mr Erskine is described as having been above the middle size, and eminently handsome His voice was powerful, his manner of delivery peculiarly graceful, and his enunciation accurate and distinct He was long a member of the Scottish Antiquarian Society, founded by his brother, the earl of Buchan, in 1780 One of the members remarked to him that he was a very bad attender of their meetings, adding, at the same time, that he never gave any donations to the Society A short time afterwards he wrote a letter to the secretary apologising for not attending the meetings, and stating that he had "enclosed a donation, which, if you keep long enough, will be the greatest curiosity you have" This was a guinea of George III He was universally acknowledged to have been the wittiest man of his time, and his puns and bon mots were so numerous that almost every witticism of the day was sure to be attributed to him Some of his points were very effective On one occasion, his namesake, Mr Erskine of Alva, advocate, afterwards a lord of session, under the title of Lord Barjarg, a man of small stature, was retained as counsel in a very interesting case, in which the Hon Henry Erskine appeared for the opposite party The crowd in court being very great, in order to enable young Alva to be seen and heard to more advantage, a chair was brought for him to stand upon On this Mr Erskine quaintly remarked, "That is one way of rising at the bar" The different modes of spelling the name of Erskine formerly used, Ereskin, Areskin, and sometimes Areseakin, seems to have puzzled Voltaire, for in his 'Letters on the English Nation.' he writes it Hareskins. A common pronunciation of the name in Scotland is Askin, which gave rise to one of the best repartees of Henry Erskine. During the time that he was dean of faculty, a silly fellow, an advocate, not liking a question put to him by the dean, testily said, "Harry, I never meet you but I find you Askin" "And I," replied the wit, "never meet you but I find an Anser," (the Latin word for goose)

Notwithstanding his liveliness of fancy and gaiety of spirit, his habits were eminently domestic, and he delighted in retirement and country employments His feelings and desires in this respect are pleasingly depicted in the following lines, written by himself —

"Let sparks and topers o'er their bottles sit,
Toss bumpers down, and fancy laughter wit,
Let cautious plodders o'er their ledger pore,
Note down each farthing gain'd, and wish it more,
Let lawyers dream of wigs, poets of fame,
Scholars look learn'd and senators declaim,
Let soldiers stand, like targets in the fray,
Their lives just worth their thirteen pence a-day
Give me a nook in some secluded spot,
Which business shuns, and din approaches not —
Some snug retreat, where I may never know
What monarch reigns, what ministers bestow,
A book—my slippers—and a field to stroll in—
My garden-seat—an elbow-chair to loll in—Sunshine when wanted—shade, when shade invites
With pleasant country sounds, and smells, and sights,
And now and then a glass of generous wine,
Shared with a chatty friend of 'auld langsyne,'
And one companion more, for ever nigh,
To sympathise in all that passes by,
To journey with me in the path of life,
And share its pleasures, and divide its strife.
These simple joys, Eugenius, let me find,
And I'll ne'er cast a lingering look behind."

"These lines," says his relative, Mr Henry David Inglis, who was allowed to copy them from the author's scrap-book, "were written after Mr Erskine's second marriage, and refer, no doubt, in the latter part, to his second wife, who proved a most valuable companion and a tender nurse in his declining years What degree of happiness his first connexion yielded in his early days, I have no access to know, but the extreme nervous irritability, and somewhat eccentric ways of the first Mrs. Erskine, did not contribute greatly to his happiness in her later years. One of her peculiarities consisted in not retiring to rest at the usual hours. She would frequently employ half the night in examining the wardrobe of the family, to see that nothing was missing, and that everything was in its proper place I recollect being told this, among other proofs of her oddities, that one morning, about two or three o'clock, having been unsuccessful in a search, she awoke Mr Erskine, by putting to him this important interrogatory, 'Harry, lovie, where's your white waistcoat?'"

In the very interesting account of Mr Erskine, after his retirement from the bar, written by Mr Inglis, and inserted in the Edinburgh Literary Journal, we have the following particulars, descriptive of the almost Arcadian simplicity, in which the latter years of the "old man eloquent" were passed "The mail-coach," says Mr Inglis, "used to set me down at Ammondell gate, which is about three-quarters of a mile from the house, and yet I see, as vividly as I at this moment see the landscape from the window at which I am now writing, the features of that beautiful and secluded domain,—the antique stone bridge,—the rushing stream, the wooded banks,—and, above all, the owner, coming towards me with his own benevolent smile and sparkling eyes I recollect the very grey hat he used to wear, with a bit of the rim torn, and the pepper-and-salt short coat, and the white neckcloth sprinkled with snuff No one could, or ever did, tire in Mr Erskine's company He was society equally for the child and for the grown man He would first take me to see his garden, where, being one day surprised by a friend while digging potatoes, he made the now well-known remark, that he was enjoying otium cum diggin a tautie, (the Scottish word for potato) He would then take me to his melon bed, which we never left without a promise of having one after dinner, and then he would carry me to see the pony, and the great dog upon which his grandson used to ride Like most men of elegant and cultivated minds, Mr Erskine was an amateur in music, and himself no indifferent performer on the violin. I think I scarcely ever entered the hall along with him that he did not take down his Cremona—a real one, I believe, which hung on the wall, and, seating himself in one of the wooden chairs, play some snatches of old English or Scottish airs,—sometimes 'Let's have a dance upon the heath,' an air from the music in Macbeth, which he used to say was by Purcel, and not by Locke, to whom it has usually been ascribed—sometimes, 'The flowers of the forest,' or 'Auld Robin Gray'—and sometimes the beautiful Pastoralè from the eighth concerto of Corelli, for whose music he had an enthusiastic admiration But the greatest treat to me was when, after dinner, he took down from the top of his bookcase, where it lay behind a bust, I think, of Mr Fox, his manuscript book full of jeux d'esprit, charades, bon mots, &c, all his own composition Few men have ever enjoyed a wider reputation for wit than the Hon Henry Erskine, the epithet then, and even now, applied to him, par excellence, is that of the witty Harry Erskine, and I do believe that all the puns and bon mots which have been put into his mouth,—some of them, no doubt, having originally come out of it,—would eke out a handsome duodecimo I well recollect that nothing used to distress me so much as not perceiving at once the point of any of Mr Erskine's witticisms Sometimes, half an hour after the witticism had been spoken, I would begin to giggle, having only then discovered the gist of the saying In this, however, I was not singular While Mr Erskine practised at the bar, it was his frequent custom to walk after the rising of the courts, in the Meadows, and he was often accompanied by Lord Balmuto, one of the judges, a very good kind of man, but not particularly quick in his perception of the ridiculous His lordship never could discover at first the point of Mr Erskine's wit, and, after walking a mile or two perhaps, and long after Mr Erskine had forgotten the saying, Lord Balmuto would suddenly cry out, 'I have you now, Harry—I have you now, Harry!'—stopping, and bursting into an immoderate fit of laughter"

When Mr John Wright, who had been bred a shoemaker, but afterwards became a lecturer on law, applied in 1781, to be admitted a member of the faculty of advocates, some opposition was shown to his admission by the vice-dean of faculty, Mr., afterwards Lord Swinton, and others, which was thought to have originated in their objections to Mr Wright's humble birth. Mr Wright, however, was ably supported by Mr Erskine, and was ultimately, in January 1788, admitted advocate. It was said that Mr Erskine had bantered the opposition so much that they at last yielded After listening to their observations—"Well, well," said he, "they say I am the son of the earl of Buchan,—and you (pointing to one) are the son of the laird of ——," and thus going over the whole opposition in a strain of inimitable and biting sarcasm, he wound up the enumeration in his usual forcible manner—"Therefore no thanks to us for being here, because the learning we have got has been hammered into our brains!—whereas, all Mr Wright's has been acquired by himself, therefore he has more merit than us all However, if any of you can put a question to Mr Wright that he cannot answer, I will hold that to be a good objection But, otherwise, it would be disgraceful to our character as Scotsmen were such an act of exclusion recorded in the books of this Society Were he the son of a beggar, did his talents entitle him, he has a right to the highest distinction in the land" Mr Wright was the author of a work on mathematics, which brought him a very considerable sum This he entered in Stationers' Hall, but as the law then only secured copyrights for seven years, at the end of that period he had the mortification to find his treatise inserted in the Encyclopedia Britannica, without permission sought or obtained Mr Wright was so much offended at this appropriation of his property that he seriously contemplated bringing the case before the court of session, but he was dissuaded from this step by his friend Mr Erskine, who, in his usual strain of pleasantry, told him "just to wait the expiry of other seven years, and then, to retaliate, by printing the whole of the Encyclopedia along with his own work" On the day after Wright's death, which took place in 1813, Mr Sheriff Anstruther, on meeting Mr Erskine, said, "Well! Harry, poor Johnny Wright is dead." "Is he?" exclaimed Henry "He died very poor They say he has left no effects" "That is not surprising," was the rejoinder, "as he had no causes, he could have no effects"

"The character of Mr. Erskine's eloquence," says one who knew him long and intimately, "bore a strong resemblance to that of his noble brother, Lord Erskine, but being much less diffuse, it was better calculated to leave a forcible impression he had the art of concentrating his ideas, and presenting them at once in so luminous and irresistible a form, as to render his hearers masters of the view he took of his subject, which however dry or complex in its nature, never failed to become entertaining and instructive in his hands, for, to professional knowledge of the highest order, he united a most extensive acquaintance with history, literature, and science, and a thorough conversancy with human life and moral and political philosophy In the most rapid of his flights, when his tongue could scarce keep pace with his thoughts, he never failed to seize the choicest words in the treasury of our language The apt, beautiful, and varied images which constantly decorated his judicial addresses, suggested themselves instantaneously, and appeared, like the soldiers of Cadmus, in complete armour and array to support the cause of their creator, the most remarkable feature of whose eloquence was, that it never made him swerve by one hair-breadth from the minuter details most befitting his purpose, for, with matchless skill, he rendered the most dazzling oratory subservient to the uses of consummate special pleading, so that his prudence and sagacity as an advocate were as decisive as his speeches were splendid For many years of his life, Mr Erskine had been the victim of ill health, but the native sweetness of his temper remained unclouded, and during the painfully protracted sufferings of his last illness, the language of complaint was never heard to escape his lips, nor the shadow of discontent seen to cloud his countenance' 'Nothing in his life became him, like the leaving it' He looked patiently forward to the termination of his painful existence, and received with mild complacency the intelligence of his danger, while the ease and happiness of those, whose felicity through life had been his primary consideration, were never absent from his thoughts"

THOMAS LORD ERSKINE

Erskine 1787

Mr Erskine was twice married; first to Christina, only daughter of George Fullarton, Esq, collector of customs at Leith, by whom he had three daughters, and two sons, Henry, who succeeded as earl of Buchan, and George, and, secondly, to Mrs Turnbull, formerly Miss Munro, by whom he had no issue.—Kay's Edinburgh Portraits.—Edinburgh Ann. Register, 1819

ERSKINE, THOMAS, LORD ERSKINE, a distinguished pleader, was the third and youngest son of David Henry, tenth earl of Buchan, by, as already stated, his countess Agnes, daughter of Sir James Steuart of Coltness, baronet, a woman of highly cultivated mind, the sister of Sir James Steuart, whose scientific writings, especially upon political philosophy, have rendered his name celebrated. He was born, according to 'Douglas' Peerage,' on the 10th of January, 1749, old style, but Lord Campbell, in his 'Lives of the Chancellors,' makes the date a year later He says "On the 10th of January, 1750, in a small and ill-furnished room in an upper 'flat' of a very lofty house in the old town of Edinburgh first saw the light the Hon Thomas Erskine, the future defender of Stockdale, and Lord Chancellor of Great Britain" The latter is correct, and the alteration of the style would make the date of his birth the 21st of January 1750 He received the rudiments of his education at the high school of Edinburgh His father and mother having, for the sake of economy, removed, in the beginning of 1762, with their family to St Andrews, he completed his studies at the university of that town His father had a numerous family, with a reduced fortune, his income at one period not exceeding £200 a-year A profession was in consequence the only resource for both him and his second brother, the Hon Henry Erskine, and it is singular that each of them became the most eloquent and successful advocate at the bar to which he belonged

At first, Thomas was destined for the naval service, and, accordingly, embarking at Leith, went to sea, as a midshipman, with Sir John Lindsay, a nephew of the celebrated earl of Mansfield, and, from that period, did not revisit Scotland till a few years before his death Though he acted for a short time as a lieutenant, through the friendship of his commanding officer, he never rose higher than a midshipman, and, after a service of four years, cruising about in the West Indies and on the coast of America, his ship was ordered home, and on its arrival at Portsmouth, it was paid off On applying at the admiralty he was told that on account of the great number of midshipmen who had served longer than him, and whose friends were applying for their promotion, he could not yet obtain a lieutenant's commission, and there was no saying when his turn might come He indignantly resolved not to go to sea again as a midshipman, after having served as a lieutenant. He now determined to try the army, and through the recommendation of John Duke of Argyle, colonel of the Scots Royals, or first regiment of foot, he obtained an ensign's commission in that corps at the regulation price, which absorbed the whole of his patrimony. On 29th May 1770 he married his first wife, Frances, daughter of Daniel Moore, Esq, M P, with whom he received no fortune, and soon after he went with his regiment to Minorca, where he remained two years

While in that island he devoted himself to obtaining a thorough acquaintance with English literature, and made himself familiar with Milton, Shakspeare, Dryden, Pope, and other eminent British poets "He likewise," says his biographer, Lord Campbell, "showed the versatility of his powers by acting as chaplain to the regiment, the real chaplain being at home on furlough by reason of ill health At first he contented himself with reading the service from the Liturgy, but he found that this was not altogether relished by the men, who were chiefly Presbyterians Thereupon, his mind being imbued with the religious notions implanted in it by his mother and the godly divines whom she patronised, he would favour them with an extempore prayer, and he composed sermons, which he delivered to them with great solemnity and unction from the drumhead He used always to remember and to talk of this portion of his life with peculiar satisfaction" In after-life it was his boast that he had been a sailor and a soldier, a parson and a lawyer

On the return of the regiment from Minorca in 1772, Erskine obtained leave of absence for nearly six months This space he spent chiefly in Lon-den, where he became acquainted with Dr Johnson, Sir Joshua Reynolds, the bishop of St. Asaph, Dr Burney, and other celebrated wits of the day, and acquired considerable reputation for the acuteness and versatility of his conversational powers In Boswell's Life of Johnson it is recorded of him that he even ventured to controvert some of the opinions of the literary giant, particularly in conversing on the merits of Fielding and Richardson, when Erskine defended the former, whom Johnson, in his characteristic manner, styled a "blockhead" and a "barren rascal" During this year (1772) he published a pamphlet on the Abuses of the Army, without his name, which created no small sensation at the time On the 21st April 1773, he was promoted to the rank of lieutenant, but having no money to purchase higher commissions, he became discontented with his position and prospects, and in August 1774 he formed the resolution to study for the bar Lord Campbell relates that he was led to this determination by the following circumstance "It so happened," says his lordship, "that the assizes were held in the town in which he was quartered The lounging lieutenant entered the court in his regimentals Lord Mansfield, the presiding judge, inquired who he was, and finding that this was the youngest son of the late earl of Buchan, who had sailed with his nephew, invited him to sit on the bench by his side, explained to him the nature of the proceedings that were going forward, and showed him the utmost civility Erskine heard a cause of considerable interest tried, in which the counsel were supposed to display great eloquence Never undervaluing his own powers he thought within himself that he could have made a better speech than any of them, on whichever side he had been retained Yet these gentlemen were the leaders of the circuit, each making a larger income than the pay of all the officers of the Royals put together,—with the chance of being raised by their own abilities to the Woolsack The thought then suddenly struck him that it might not even now be too late for him to study the law, and be called to the bar Lord Mansfield invited him to dinner, and being greatly struck with his conversation, and pleased with his manners, detained him till late in the evening When the rest of the company had withdrawn, the lieutenant, who ever showed great moral courage, in consideration of the connection between the Murrays and the Erskines, and the venerable earl's great condescension and kindness, disclosed to him his plan of a change of profession, with a modest statement of his reasons. Lord Mansfield by no means discouraged him, but advised him before he took a step so serious to consult his near relations He accordingly wrote to his mother, and she, justly appreciating the energy and perseverance as well as the enthusiasm belonging to his nature, strongly advised him to quit the army for the law His brothers did not oppose,—although Henry warned him of the thorny and uphill path on which he was entering His resolution was now firmly taken, and he came up to London to carry it into effect It was not till the spring of the following year that financial difficulties were so far removed as to render it possible for him to make the experiment The period of five years was then required by all the inns of court for a student to be on the books of the society, before he could be called,—with this proviso, that it was reduced to three years for those who had the degree of M A. from either of the universities of Oxford or Cambridge It was resolved that Erskine should immediately be entered of an inn of court, that he should likewise be matriculated at Cambridge, and take a degree there, that he should keep his academical and law terms concurrently, and that as soon as it could be managed, he should become a pupil to some eminent special pleader, so as to be well grounded in the technicalities of his new craft Accordingly, on the 26th day of April 1775, he was admitted a student of Lincoln's Inn, and on the 13th of January 1776, he was matriculated at Cambridge, and entered on the books of Trinity college as a gentleman commoner, with the privilege of wearing a hat He had rooms in college, in which he resided the requisite periods to keep his terms, but being entitled to a degree without examination, he paid no attention to the peculiar studies of the place But he still assiduously applied to belles lettres, and practised English composition both in verse and prose He gained some applause by a burlesque parody of Gray's Bard The ode is not very remarkable for poetical excellence, but he gained the prize given by the college for English declamation The subject which he chose was the revolution of 1688 He took the honorary degree of A.M in June 1778 While still a student at Cambridge he contrived to keep his terms at Lincoln's Inn He had not yet actually quitted the army, having obtained six months' leave of absence It is said that during Easter and Trinity terms he excited a great sensation in the dining hall by appearing with a student's black gown over the scarlet regimentals of the Royals, probably not having a decent suit of plain clothes to put on He obtained a supply of cash by the sale of his lieutenancy on the 19th September 1775

In order to acquire the requisite knowledge of the technical part of his new profession, he became a pupil of Judge Buller, then an eminent special pleader On the promotion of Mr Buller to the bench, he went into the office of Mr , afterwards Baron Wood, where he continued for a year after he had obtained considerable business at the bar, to which he was called on the 3d of July, in the end of Trinity term 1778

At this period, and for three years after his retirement from the army, he was in great pecuniary straits With an increasing family, and the necessary expenses he incurred in preparing for the bar, notwithstanding the strictest economy, and the kind assistance of some of his friends, he was often put to his shifts for a dinner He dressed shabbily, resided in small lodgings near Hampstead, and lived chiefly on cow-beef and tripe, because he could not afford anything better Reynolds, the comic writer, who in his 'Life and Times' mentions these particulars, states, that he expressed the greatest gratitude to Mr Harris, the manager of Covent Garden theatre, for occasional free admissions to that place of entertainment He was in the habit of taking part in the debates at the Robin Hood, Coachmaker's Hall, and other spouting clubs, which were attended by all sorts of people, where each person paid sixpence, and over the glass of porter or gin and water which was received in return, political, legal, and literary subjects were publicly discussed

In the succeeding Michaelmas term, an opportunity was afforded him of distinguishing himself in Westminster Hall. He had been accidentally introduced, at the table of a friend, to Captain Baillie, who had been suspended from the superintendence of Greenwich Hospital, by the earl of Sandwich, then first lord of the admiralty, and the attorney-general having been instructed to move for leave to file a criminal information against that gentleman for an alleged libel on the noble earl, having stated that, for electioneering purposes, his lordship had placed in the hospital a great number of landsmen, Mr Erskine was retained to oppose the motion There were four other counsel on the same side, and he being the junior was apprehensive that he would not have an opportunity to speak Fortunately for him, however, the court adjourned before the case was finished, and next morning he made that display of his powers which at once established his reputation In the course of his speech, the young advocate hesitated not to attack the noble earl in very indignant terms "The defendant," he said, "is not a disappointed malicious informer, prying into official abuses because without office himself, but himself a man in office, not troublesomely inquisitive into other men's departments, but conscientiously correcting his own,—doing it pursuant to the rules of law, and what heightens the character, doing it at the risk of his office, from which the effrontery of power has already suspended him without proof of his guilt,—a conduct not only unjust and illiberal, but highly disrespectful to this court, whose judges sit in the double capacity of ministers of the law, and governors of this sacred and abused institution Indeed, Lord Sandwich has, in my mind, acted such a part" Here Lord Mansfield, observing Mr Erskine heated with his subject, and growing personal on the first lord of the admiralty, told him that Lord Sandwich was not before the court "I know that he is not formally before the court," said the bold and indignant counsel, "but for that very reason I shall bring him before the court He has placed these men in front of the battle, in hopes to escape under their shelter, but I will not join in battle with them, their vices, though screwed up to the highest pitch of human depravity, are not of dignity enough to vindicate the combat with me. I will drag him to light who is the dark mover behind this scene of iniquity. I assert that the earl of Sandwich has but one road to escape out of this business without pollution and disgrace, and that is, by publicly disavowing the acts of the prosecutors, and restoring Captain Baillie to his command If he does this, then his offence will be no more than the too common one of having suffered his own personal interest to prevail over his public duty, in placing his voters in the hospital But if, on the contrary, he continues to protect the prosecutors, in spite of the evidence of their guilt, which has excited the abhorrence of the numerous audience that crowd this court, if he keeps this injured man suspended, or dares to turn that suspension into a removal, I shall then not scruple to declare him an accomplice in their guilt,—a shameless oppressor, a disgrace to his rank, and a traitor to his trust" The rule was discharged with costs, and such was the impression made by Captain Baillie's counsel, Mr Erskine, on this his first appearance as an advocate, that, on leaving the court, he received no less than thirty retainers from attorneys who happened to be present on the occasion

In January 1779 he was engaged as counsel in the famous court-martial held at Portsmouth, on Admiral Keppel, to try the charges brought against him by Sir Hugh Palliser, of incapacity and misconduct in the battle of Ushant, with the French fleet under the command of Count d'Orvilliers Mr Erskine was engaged for the defence on the recommendation of Mr Dunning, as in addition to his abilities, he had the advantage of understanding naval language and naval manœuvres The trial lasted thirteen days, during all which time Erskine exerted himself for his client with unabated zeal and consummate discretion He was not allowed to examine the witnesses, nor to address the court, but he suggested questions which were put in writing, and he composed the speech which Admiral Keppel delivered on the merits of his case The admiral was unanimously and honourably acquitted, and he immediately enclosed to his counsel, Mr Erskine, the munificent present of a thousand pounds.

In the following May he appeared at the bar of the House of Commons as counsel for Mr. Carnan, the bookseller, against a bill introduced by Lord North, then prime minister, to re-vest in the two English universities the monopoly in almanacs, which Mr Carnan had succeeded in abolishing by legal judgments, and by his eloquence he prevailed on the House to reject the bill His reputation was now so much established, that he was henceforth engaged in all the most important causes that took place during a period of twenty-five years His defence of Lord George Gordon, whose trial for high treason came on in the court of King's Bench, before Lord Mansfield and his brethren, February 5, 1771, placed him immeasurably above all the law orators of the day In it he completely overthrew the doctrine of constructive treason, and its effect on the audience who heard it, and the tribunal to which it was addressed, was overwhelming A singular passage, to be found in his speech on this occasion, says the Reviewer of Erskine's speeches in the 16th volume of the 'Edinburgh Review,' "affords a great contrast to the calm and even mild tone of its peroration It is indeed, as far as we know, the only instance of the kind in the history of modern eloquence, and we might justly have doubted, if even Mr Erskine's skill, and well-known discretion as a public speaker, had not forsaken him, and allowed his heat and fancy to hurry him somewhat too far, had we not, in the traditional account of the perfect success which attended this passage, the most unequivocal evidence in his favour After reciting a variety of circumstances in Lord George's conduct, and quoting the language which he used, the orator suddenly, abruptly, and violently breaks out with this exclamation—'I say, by God, that man is a ruffian, who shall, after this, presume to build upon such honest, artless conduct, as an evidence of guilt!' The sensation produced by these words, and by the magic of the voice, the eye, the face, the figure, and all we call the manner, with which they were uttered, is related, by those present on this great occasion, to have been quite electrical, and to baffle all power of description The feeling of the moment alone,—that sort of sympathy which subsists between an observant speaker and his audience,—which communicates to him, as he goes on, their feelings under what he is saying,—deciphers the language of their looks,—and even teaches him, without regarding what he sees, to adapt his words to the state of their minds, by merely attending to his own,—this intuitive and momentary impulse could alone have prompted a flight, which it alone could sustain, and, as its failure would indeed have been fatal, so its eminent success must be allowed to rank it among the most famous feats of oratory" The jury acquitted Lord George, and all reasonable men rejoiced at the verdict.

In May 1783 Mr Erskine received a silk gown, when he had scarcely been five years at the bar He usually practised in the court of King's Bench, and in the early part of his professional career he belonged to the Home Circuit, but soon ceased to attend it, or any other, except on special retainers, of which it is said that he received more than any man in his time His fee for a special retainer was not less than £300 The same year (1783) he was elected M P for Portsmouth, and unanimously rechosen for the same borough on every succeeding election, until raised to the peerage. The rights of juries he firmly maintained on all occasions, but particularly in the trial of the dean of St Asaph, who was indicted in 1783, for a seditious libel, in having caused to be republished a tract, written by Sir William Jones, recommending parliamentary reform The trial was postponed till the summer assizes at Salop in 1784, when Mr Justice Buller refused to receive the verdict of "Guilty of publishing only" Mr Erskine insisted on the word "only" being recorded, when the judge said, "Sit down, Sir, remember your duty, or I shall be obliged to proceed in another manner" On which Mr Erskine replied, "Your lordship may proceed in what manner you think fit. I know my duty as well as your lordship knows yours I shall not alter my conduct." In allusion to the threat of the judge, he thus concluded his argument —"It was the first command and counsel of my youth, always to do what my conscience told me to be my duty, and to leave the consequences to God I shall carry with me the memory, and, I trust, the practice, of this parental lesson to my grave I have hitherto followed it, and have no reason to complain that my obedience to it has been even a temporal sacrifice I have found it, on the contrary, the road to prosperity and wealth, and I shall point it out as such to my children" In the ensuing Michaelmas, on the ground of misdirection, Mr Erskine moved for a new trial On this occasion he went into an elaborate argument to prove that it was the office of the jury, not of the judges, to pronounce upon the intention and tendency of an alleged libel, and to him is ascribed the honour of having prepared the way for the libel bill, introduced by Mr Fox in 1792, and seconded by himself, in which the rights and province of the jury are clearly defined, and the position established, for which he, in a small minority of his professional brethren, had contended Thus, as has been well remarked, was a triumph of which the oldest and most practised lawyer might well have been proud

His most celebrated argument on the law of libel was that delivered in Perceval Stockdale's case in 1789 Mr Stockdale, a respectable bookseller in London, had published a pamphlet written by Mr John Logan the poet, in defence of Warren Hastings, in the course of which he had ventured to animadvert very unguardedly on the conduct of the managers of the impeachment then carrying on against the ex-governor of India. The managers complained of this, and the publisher was tried before Lord Kenyon and a special jury, in the court of king's bench at Westminster, on an information filed by the attorney-general On this occasion, Mr Erskine, as counsel for Mr Stockdale, delivered what the Edinburgh reviewer has pronounced to be "the finest of all his orations,—whether we regard the wonderful skill with which the argument is conducted,—the soundness of the principles laid down, and their happy application to the case,—or the exquisite fancy with which they are embellished and illustrated,—and the powerful and touching language in which they are conveyed It is justly regarded, by all English lawyers, as a consummate specimen of the art of addressing a jury,—as a standard, a sort of precedent for treating cases of libel, by keeping which in his eye, a man may hope to succeed in special pleading his client's case within its principle, who is destitute of the talent required even to comprehend the other and higher merits of his original. By those merits it is recommended to lovers of pure diction,—of copious and animated description,—of lively, picturesque, and fanciful illustration,—of all that constitutes, if we may so speak, the poetry of eloquence,—all for which we admire it, when prevented from enjoying its music and its statuary "

The fact of the publication being admitted, Mr Erskine proceeded to address the jury, and after some introductory observations he burst out with the following eloquent passage "Gentlemen, the question you have therefore to try upon all this matter is extremely simple —It is neither more nor less than this —At a time when the charges against Mr Hastings were, by the implied consent of the commons, in every hand, and on every table,—when, by their managers, the lightning of eloquence was incessantly consuming him, and flashing in the eyes of the public,—when every man was with perfect impunity saying, and writing, and publishing just what he pleased of the supposed plunderer and devastator of nations—would it have been criminal in Mr Hastings himself to have reminded the public that he was a native of this free land, entitled to the common protection of her justice, and that he had a defence in his turn to offer to them, the outlines of which he implored them in the mean time to receive, as an antidote to the unlimited and unpunished poison in circulation against him?—This is, without colour or exaggeration, the true question you are to decide Because I assert, without the hazard of contradiction, that if Mr Hastings himself could have stood justified or excused in your eyes for publishing this volume in his own defence, the author, if he wrote it bona fide to defend him, must stand equally excused and justified, and if the author be justified, the publisher cannot be criminal, unless you had evidence that it was published by him with a different spirit and intention from those in which it was written The question therefore is correctly what I just now stated it to be could Mr Hastings have been condemned to infamy for writing this book? Gentlemen, I tremble with indignation to be driven to put such a question in England. Shall it be endured, that a subject of this country (instead of being arraigned and tried for some single act in her ordinary courts, where the accusation, as soon at least as it is made public, is followed within a few hours by the decision) may be impeached by the commons for the transactions of twenty years,—that the accusation shall spread as wide as the region of letters,—that the accused shall stand, day after day, and year after year, as a spectacle before the public, which shall be kept in a perpetual state of inflammation against him, yet that he shall not, without the severest penalties, be permitted to submit anything to the judgment of mankind in his defence? If this be law (which it is for you to-day to decide), such a man has no trial that great hall, built by our fathers for English justice, is no longer a court but an altar,—and an Englishman, instead of being judged in it by God and his country, is a victim and a sacrifice "

On the merits of the work, it was his argument that the tenor of the whole, and the intentions of the writer were to be regarded, and that if these should be found praiseworthy, or innocent, the introduction of a few detached passages, which, taken separately, might seem calculated to bring the House of Commons into contempt, were altogether insufficient to justify conviction Among other things urged in defence of Mr Hastings in the pamphlet was the nature of his instructions from his constituents Commenting on this, he proceeded as follows "If this be a wilfully false account of the instructions given to Mr Hastings for his government, and of his conduct under them, the author and publisher of this defence deserve the severest punishment, for a mercenary imposition on the public But, if it be true, that he was directed to make the safety and prosperity of Bengal the first object of his attention, and that under his administration it has been safe and prosperous, if it be true that the security and preservation of our possessions and revenues in Asia were marked out to him as the great leading principle of his government, and that those possessions and revenues, amidst unexampled dangers, have been secured and preserved, then a question may be unaccountably mixed with your consideration, much beyond the consequences of the present prosecution, involving perhaps the merit of the impeachment itself which gave it birth· a question which the Commons, as prosecutors of Mr Hastings, should, in common prudence, have avoided, unless, regretting the unwieldy length of their prosecution against them, they wished to afford him the opportunity of this strange anomalous defence For although I am neither his counsel, nor desire to have anything to do with his guilt or innocence, yet in the collateral defence of my client I am driven to state matter which may be considered by many as hostile to the impeachment For if our dependencies have been secured, and their interests promoted, I am driven in the defence of my client to remark that it is mad and preposterous to bring to the standard of justice and humanity, the exercise of a dominion founded upon violence and terror It may, and must be true that Mr Hastings has repeatedly offended against the rights and privileges of Asiatic government, if he was the faithful deputy of a power which could not maintain itself for an hour without trampling upon both, he may and must have offended against the laws of God and nature, if he was the faithful viceroy of an empire wrested in blood from the people to whom God and nature had given it, he may and must have preserved that unjust dominion over timorous and abject nations by a terrifying, overbearing, insulting superiority, if he was the faithful administrator of your government, which, having no root in consent or affection, no foundation in similarity of interests, nor support from any one principle which cements men together in society, could only be upheld by alternate stratagem and force The unhappy people of India, feeble and effeminate as they are from the softness of their climate, and subdued and broken as they have been by the knavery and strength of civilization, still occasionally start up in all the vigour and intelligence of insulted nature When governed at all, they must be governed with a rod of iron, and our empire in the East would long since have been lost to Great Britain, if civil skill and military prowess had not united their efforts, to support an authority which Heaven never gave, by means which it can never sanction

"Gentlemen, I think I can observe that you are touched with this way of considering the subject, and I can account for it. I have not been considering it through the cold medium of books, but have been speaking of man and his nature, and of human dominion, from what I have seen of them myself among reluctant nations submitting to our authority I know what they feel, and how such feelings can alone be repressed I have heard them in my youth, from a naked savage, in the indignant character of a prince surrounded by his subjects, addressing the governor of a British colony, holding a bundle of sticks in his hand, as the notes of his unlettered eloquence 'Who is it,' said the jealous ruler over the desert, encroached upon by the restless foot of English adventure, 'who is it that causes this river to rise in the high mountains, and to empty itself into the ocean? Who is it that causes to blow the loud winds of winter, and that calms them again in the summer? Who is it that rears up the shade of these lofty forests, and blasts them with the quick lightning at his pleasure? The same Being who gave to you a country on the other side of the waters, and gave ours to us, and by this title we will defend it,' said the warrior, throwing down his tomahawk on the ground, and raising the war-cry of his nation These are the feelings of subjugated man all round the globe, and depend upon it, nothing but fear will control, where it is vain to look for affection These reflections are the only antidotes to those anathemas of superhuman eloquence which have lately shaken these walls that surround us, but which it unaccountably falls to my province, whether I will or no, a little to stem the torrent of, by reminding you, that you have a mighty sway in Asia which cannot be maintained by the finer sympathies of life, or the practice of its charities and affections What will they do for you when surrounded by two hundred thousand men with artillery, cavalry, and elephants, calling upon you for their dominions which you have robbed them of? Justice may, no doubt, in such a case forbid the levying of a fine to pay a revolting soldiery, a treaty may stand in the way of increasing a tribute to keep up the very existence of the government, and delicacy for women may forbid all entrance into a zenana for money, whatever may be the necessity for taking it All these things must ever be occurring But under the pressure of such constant difficulties, so dangerous to national honour, it might be better perhaps to think of effectually securing it altogether, by recalling our troops and merchants, and abandoning our oriental empire Until this be done, neither religion nor philosophy can be pressed very far into the aid of reformation and punishment If England, from a lust of ambition and dominion, will insist on maintaining despotic rule over distant and hostile nations, beyond all comparison more numerous and extended than herself, and gives commission to her viceroys to govern them, with no other instructions than to preserve them, and to secure permanently their revenues, with what colour of consistency or reason can she place herself in the moral chair, and affect to be shocked at the execution of her own orders, adverting to the exact measure of wickedness and injustice necessary to their execution, and complaining only of the excess as the immorality, considering her authority as a dispensation for breaking the commands of God, and the breach of them only punishable when contrary to the ordinances of man Such a proceeding, gentlemen, begets serious reflections It would be better perhaps for the masters and the servants of all such governments to join in supplication, that the great Author of violated humanity may not confound them together in one common judgment " The jury in Stockdale's case, after two hours' deliberation, returned a verdict of not guilty

The spirit and independence exhibited by him on every occasion led to his being employed in defence of most of the parties who were prosecuted for sedition or libel by the government In 1792, being retained in behalf of Thomas Paine, when proceeded against for the publication of the second part of his 'Rights of Man,' he declared that, waiving all personal considerations, he deemed it incumbent on him, as an English advocate, to obey the call, in consequence of which he was suddenly dismissed from his office of attorney-general to the prince of Wales Five years afterwards he conducted the prosecution of the 'Age of Reason,' when Williams the publisher was found guilty and condemned to a year's imprisonment

One of the most brilliant, as well as most arduous, events in Mr Erskine's professional life, arose out of the part cast upon him, in conjunction with Mr, afterwards Sir Vicary Gibbs, on the trials of Hardy, Horne Tooke, and others, for high treason in 1794. The prisoners were tried separately, Hardy being the first. They were charged with compassing the death of the king, the evidence of this intention being a conspiracy to subvert by force the constitution of the country, under pretence of procuring, by legal means, a reform of the house of commons Mr Erskine was their counsel, and as in the case of Lord George Gordon, he completely overthrew the doctrine of constructive treason attempted to be established, and showed that their ostensible object, so far from necessarily involving any evil designs, was one which had been advocated by the earl of Chatham, Mr Burke, and Mr Pitt himself, and that the very measures of reform which it was sought to introduce had been openly avowed and inculcated by the duke of Richmond, then holding office in the ministry of which Mr Pitt was chief The prisoners were successively acquitted, and the other state prosecutions were then abandoned On the conclusion of these trials the public gratitude to Mr. Erskine showed itself in the strongest manifestations of popularity "On the last night of the trials," says Lord Campbell, "his horses were taken from his chariot—amidst bonfires and blazing flambeaux, he was drawn home by the huzzaing populace to his house in Serjeant's Inn,—and they obeyed his injunction, when addressing them from a window, with Gibbs by his side, he said,—'Injured innocence still obtains protection from a British jury, and I am sure, in the honest effusion of your hearts, you will retire in peace and bless God ' The freedom of many corporations was voted to him, and his portraits and busts were sold in thousands all over Great Britain What was more gratifying, his speeches for the prisoners were read and applauded by all men of taste, and his political consequence was much enhanced with his party He now occupied a position as an advocate which no man before had reached, and which no man hereafter is ever likely to reach at the English bar " These trials lasted for several weeks, and the ability and energy displayed by Mr Erskine on this eventful occasion were readily acknowledged by all parties

He was a warm supporter of Mr Fox, and a strenuous opposer of the war with France, on which subject he embodied his sentiments in a pamphlet, entitled a 'View of the Causes and Consequences of the War with France,' and such was the attraction of his name, that it ran through forty-eight editions In 1802, the prince of Wales not only restored him to his office of attorney-general, but appointed him chancellor of the duchy of Cornwall In 1803, on the formation of the volunteer body in the metropolis, he was appointed lieutenant-colonel of the Temple corps of lawyers, generally called "The Devil's own"

On the death of Mr Pitt in 1806, when a new administration was formed by Lord Grenville, Mr Erskine was raised to the dignity of lord high chancellor of Great Britain, and created a peer by the title of Lord Erskine of Restormel castle, in Cornwall On this occasion he took for his motto "Trial by Jury" His father's motto was "Judge Nought." On the dissolution of the ministry in the following March, he retired with the usual pension of £4,000 a-year The short period during which he presided in the court of chancery makes it difficult to estimate how far his extraordinary powers of mind, and in particular the eminently legal understanding which he possessed, would have enabled him to overcome the difficulties of so new a situation But none of his judgments were appealed against, except one, and it was affirmed Over the proceedings in the impeachment of Lord Melville, in 1806, he presided as lord steward, and united the greatest acuteness and readiness with singular firmness of purpose, and all that urbanity which neither in public nor in private life ever quitted him for an instant In reference to this case it may be said, that to Lord Erskine belongs the merit of showing that this mode of trial may still be so conducted as to prove an efficient safeguard to the constitution, though discredited by the vexatious procrastination which had characterized the last instance of its use, in the case of Warren Hastings

On quitting the woolsack Lord Erskine retired in a great degree from public life In 1807 he was one of the principal opposers of the famous 'Orders in Council' respecting neutral navigation, which he truly foretold would lead to a war with America, and in the following year he made a speech against the bill for prohibiting the exportation of Jesuit's bark to the continent of Europe, designed as an act of hostility against France, which both for argument and eloquence is said to have been worthy his most celebrated efforts In 1809 he introduced into the House of Lords a bill for the prevention of cruelty to animals, which passed that branch of the legislature, but was thrown out by the Commons In 1815 he was made a knight of the Thistle In the memorable proceedings of 1820, relative to the Queen's trial, he took a prominent part against the bill of pains and penalties, and was mainly instrumental in causing it ultimately to be abandoned Soon after the close of these proceedings he visited Scotland, for the first time since he had left it a midshipman in 1764, and was entertained at a public dinner at Edinburgh, by the principal gentlemen of liberal politics of that city To this dinner, as a mark of high esteem and respect, he had been specially invited

Owing to an unfortunate purchase of land, and other circumstances, his lordship, in the latter years of his life, laboured under considerable pecuniary difficulties, while his former fame was obscured by an unhappy second marriage with a Miss Sarah Buck, and certain eccentricities of conduct which were very incompatible with his age and station By his first wife, who died 22d December, 1805, he had four sons and four daughters He had also issue by his second marriage

In his leisure hours he occupied himself with editing several of the State Trials He was the author of the Preface to Mr Fox's Collected Speeches, as well as of a political romance, in 2 vols, entitled 'Armata,' and some pamphlets in support of the Greek cause His speeches, on constructive treason, and on subjects relating to the liberty of the press, fill four octavo volumes A fifth contains his speeches on miscellaneous subjects, among which those on behalf of Hadfield, for shooting at the king, and Mr Bingham, defendant in a crim con case are especially worthy of attention

In the autumn of 1823 he resolved to revisit Scotland, and to pass the ensuing winter there Accordingly, accompanied by two of his sons, he embarked at Wapping, in a smack, for Leith, there being neither railways nor London steamers in those days When the ship was opposite Harwich, a violent gale arose, and Lord Erskine was severely attacked with inflammation in the chest On the ship reaching Scarborough, he was so seriously ill that it was deemed necessary to put him ashore He rallied to a certain degree, and was able, by easy stages on land, to reach Almondale (now called Amondell) House, the seat of his nephew near Edinburgh, where, experiencing a relapse, he expired, on the 17th November, 1823, in the 73d year of his age He was buried in the family burying-place at Uphall, in the county of Linlithgow Immediately after his decease the members of that profession of which he had been the ornament and the favourite, caused a marble statue of him to be executed, which was placed in the hall of Lincoln's Inn, where he had presided as chancellor, and where it now stands

The consummate talents of this advocate shone in their full lustre in the defence of Hardy and the other parties indicted of high treason in the course of 1794, already alluded to, on which occasion his pleadings were unmatched at the bar His exertions and his success in these trials have thus been comprehensively described "His indefatigable patience—his eternal watchfulness—his unceasing labour of body and of mind—the strength of an Herculean constitution—his untameable spirit—a subtlety which the merest pleader might envy—a quickness of intellect which made up for the host he was opposed to —these were the great powers of the man, and the wonderful eloquence of his speeches is only to be spoken of as second to these Amidst all the struggles of the constitution, in parliament, in council, and in the field,—there is no one man, certainly, to whose individual exertions it owes so much, as to this celebrated advocate, and if ever a single patriot saved his country from the horrors of a proscription, this man did this deed for us, in stemming the tide of state prosecutions '

The most remarkable features of Lord Erskine's personal character were his egotism and vanity, which increased upon him in the later years of his life, and of which many amusing anecdotes are told He was fond of pet birds, monkeys, and dogs, and believed in ghosts, apparitions, and the second sight. "Tom Erskine," says Sir Walter Scott, in his diary, "was positively mad. I have heard him tell a cock and a bull story of having seen the ghost of his father's servant, John Burnet, with as much gravity as if he believed every word he was saying "

He was not ignorant of the little artifices which tend to give effect to a person's appearance, nor did he deem it undignified to take advantage of them to aid his eloquence When he went on circuit he examined the court the night before the proceedings, in order to select the most advantageous place for addressing the jury On the cause being called, the crowded audience were, perhaps, kept waiting a few minutes before the celebrated advocate made his appearance, and when at length he gratified their impatient curiosity, a particularly nice wig and a pair of new yellow gloves distinguished and embellished his person, beyond the ordinary costume of the barristers of the circuit [Annual Obituary, vol ix p 57]

Like his brother Henry, he was much addicted to punning, and Westminster Hall rang with his jokes as much as ever the parliament house of Edinburgh did with the wit of his brother When at the bar, he was retained as counsel for the proprietors of a stage coach, against whom Polito, the keeper of the wild beasts in Exeter Change, had brought an action for negligence, his portmanteau having been stolen from the boot of the coach behind, he himself having been riding on the box "Why did he not," said Erskine, "take a lesson from his own sagacious elephant, and travel with his TRUNK before him?" The joke produced a verdict for the defendant Once, on being consulted by the duke of Queensberry, as to whether he could sue a tradesman for a breach of contract about the painting of his house, he wrote his opinion in the following words "I am of opinion that this action will not lie, unless the witnesses do '

In person Lord Erskine possessed many advantages his features were regular, intelligent, and animated, and his action is said to have been exceedingly graceful His constitution was remarkably strong, and it was mentioned by himself in the House of Lords as a singular fact, that during the twenty-seven years of his practice he had not been for a single day prevented in his attendance on the courts by any indisposition

Lord Erskine was, perhaps, the most powerful advocate that ever pleaded at the bar of England, and some leading, but, till his appearance, disputed constitutional doctrines, have been firmly established by his exertions, especially on the two great subjects of constructive treason and the liberty of the press While, however, as a forensic orator, he had no equal, he was only entitled to a secondary rank as a parliamentary speaker He was succeeded by his eldest son, David Montagu, at one period minister plenipotentiary at the court of Bavaria.

ERSKINE, Thomas Alexander, sixth earl of Kellie, an eminent musical genius, eldest son of Alexander, fifth earl, by his second wife, Janet, daughter of Dr Archibald Pitcairn, the celebrated physician and poet, was born September 1 1732, and succeeded his father in 1756 He possessed a considerable share of wit and humour, with abilities that would have distinguished him in any public employment, but he devoted himself almost exclusively to musical science, in which he attained an uncommon degree of proficiency After receiving his education, he travelled into Germany Previous to this, we are told, he could scarcely tune his fiddle, but during his residence at Manheim he studied composition with the elder Stamitz, and "practised the violin with such serious application," says Dr Burney, in his History of Music, "that, at his return to England, there was no part of theoretical or practical music in which he was not equally well versed with the greatest professors of his time Indeed, he had a strength of hand on the violin, and a genius for composition, with which few professors are gifted" Unfortunately, however, led away by the pernicious fashion of the times, his convivial habits were as remarkable as his musical taste, and his almost constant intemperance and dissipation tended seriously to impair his constitution

Robertson of Dalmeny, in his 'Enquiry into the Fine Arts,' styles the earl of Kellie the greatest secular musician in his line in Britain "In his works," he says, "the fervidum ingenium of his country bursts forth, and elegance is mingled with fire From the singular ardour and impetuosity of his temperament, joined to his German education, under the celebrated Stamitz, and at a time when the German overture or symphony, consisting of a grand chorus of violins and wind instruments, was in its highest vogue, this great composer has employed himself chiefly in symphonies, but in a style peculiar to himself While others please and amuse, it is his province to rouse and almost overset his hearer Loudness, rapidity, enthusiasm, announced the earl of Kellie His harmonies are acknowledged to be accurate and ingenious, admirably calculated for the effect in view, and discovering a thorough knowledge of music From some specimens, it appears that his talents were not confined to a single style, which has made his admirers regret that he did not apply himself to a greater variety of subjects He is said to have composed only one song, but that an excellent one What appears singularly pecular in this musician is what may be called the velocity of his talents, by which he composed whole pieces of the most excellent music in one night" His lordship died at Brussels, unmarried, October 9, 1781

EWART, the surname of one of the oldest families in Galloway, formerly proprietors of the estate of Mullock, in the stewartry of Kirkcudbright. The family came originally from Roxburghshire, where the name is said to have been pronounced and spelled 'Ewit.' It may be, however, that it is only the surname Stewart curtailed of its two initial letters. On some of the old Ewart monuments in an ancient churchyard just outside Kirkcudbright, the name is Latinized Haverius, and some connexion has even been traced between the names of Ewart and Howard Andrew Ewart, the first of the family mentioned in the records of Kirkcudbright, was treasurer of that burgh in 1583. His son and successor, John, a merchant and bailie of Kirkcudbright, by purchase became proprietor of the estate of Mullock in 1611, at that time of considerable extent, but it was portioned off into lots from time to time, and ultimately sold in 1816 to John Halliday, Esq A large part of the old Ewart estate passed into the hands of the earl of Selkirk John, 1st of Mullock, was succeeded by his eldest son, also named John, who was chief magistrate of Kirkcudbright in 1630, and commissioner of the burgh for settlement of exchequer dues. His eldest son was "John Fwart, Esq of Mullock, chief magistrate of Kirkcudbright," 1649, and "commissioner for the collection of imposts raised for maintaining public tranquillity, and restoring crown prerogatives by order of Charles II 's first parliament." This laird of Mullock was also a merchant in Kirkcudbright. The records say that "he had a great trade with Holland," and "undertook to furnish sufficient arms for defence of Kirkcudbright, 1644" He had two sons. John, the elder succeeded his father He represented Kirkcudbright in King William's first parliament, and up to his death in 1697 He married Marian, daughter of John Brown, Esq of Carsluith, of an old and wealthy family, and was succeeded by his eldest son, the Rev Andrew Ewart, who was the first parish clergyman of Kells, in Galloway, and married Agnes, 2d daughter of John Grierson of Capenoch in Holywood, son of James Grierson of Capenoch (of the Lag family) The Rev Andrew Ewart died 8th Dec. 1758, aged 75 leaving two sons, James and John James, the elder son succeeded to the estate, and held various public offices in Dumfries He was twice married and had 7 sons and 2 daughters. EWEN a surname which appears to be the same as Ewing, though differently spelled, and derived from Eoghan, the Gaelic for Eugenius, hence the name of the Highland clan Eoghan, or MacEwen. It seems also to be the same name as Evan, and was borne by a king of the Picts, and two kings of the Scots. Owen is the Welsh form of the name.

The author of the fine ballad, 'Weel may the Boatie Row,' John Ewen, jeweller in Aberdeen, was born in Montrose in 1741, of such poor parents that they were unable to give him more than the most ordinary education Having by frugality and industry saved a few pounds, he went to Aberdeen in 1760, and opened a small shop for the sale of hardware goods. For the first six years he was not particularly prosperous, but on his marriage, in 1766 to Janet, one of the two daughters of John Middleton, yarn and stocking maker in Aberdeen, who was then dead, he became, in right of his wife, possessor of one half of the property, chiefly heritable, of his deceased father in-law Mrs. Ewen died soon after giving birth to a daughter, Elizabeth, who married in 1787, a younger son of Graham of Morphie. Mr Ewen did not marry a second time, and died 21st October 1821, leaving, after payment of various sums to the public charities of Aberdeen, about fourteen thousand pounds to the magistrates and clergy of Montrose, his native place, for the purpose of founding an hospital, similar to Gordon's Hospital in Aberdeen, for the maintenance and education of boys. This settlement was challenged by his daughter, and after various conflicting decisions in the court of session, was finally set aside by the House of Lords, on appeal, on the 17th November 1830, on the ground that the deed was void, in consequence of its uncertainty and want of precision both as to the sum to be accumulated by the trustees before commencing to build the hospital, and as to the number of the boys to be educated in it when built A full report of this lawsuit is contained in Wilson and Shaw's Cases decided in the House of Lords on appeal from the Courts of Scotland,' vol iv pp 846—861 In the projected hospital he had anticipated a monument to his memory in his native place, but he has a better and more enduring one in his immortal song of 'The Boatie Rows,' which has given his name a world-wide reputation His grandson Baron Grahame Esq, inherited Morphie, Kincardineshire, and Ballindalg Forfarshire

Ewing, an Anglified form of the surname Ewen Of this name was Greville Ewing an eminent minister of the Congregational church, son of a teacher of mathematics at Edinburgh and author of a pamphlet against the atheistical doctrines of Thomas Paine Born in that city, April 27 1767, he was educated at the High School of his native place, and at an early age was apprenticed to a seal engraver On the conclusion of his apprenticeship he commenced business on his own account, but impelled by a strong predilection for the ministry, in the winter session of 1787–8 he entered the university of Edinburgh, and applied himself assiduously to the usual course of literary and theological study In the subsequent May he became tutor to the son of James Lockhart, Esq of Cambusnethan, attending college always during winter In 1792, after passing the usual examinations, he was, by the presbytery of Hamilton licensed to preach the gospel, in connexion with the Established church of Scotland, and became very popular as a preacher On 17th October of the following year he was ordained assistant to Dr Jones in Lady Glenorchy's church, Edinburgh In the cause of missions he early took a deep interest, and by his exertions and writings contributed much to excite a strong feeling in regard to them He was one of the small party of Christian friends, consisting principally, besides himself, of the Rev David Bogue, D D, of Gosport, the Rev William Innes, then one of the ministers of Stirling, afterwards of the Baptist church, Elder Street, Edinburgh, and Robert Haldane, Esq. of Airthrey, Stirlingshire, who had formed a plan for proceeding to India, to preach the gospel to the native population, the expenses being to be defrayed by Mr Haldane. Owing, however, to the refusal of the East India Company and the government to permit their going out, the scheme was abandoned, and Mr Ewing and his friends, in consequence, resolved to exert themselves for the promotion of evangelical religion at home A periodical, under the title of 'The Missionary Magazine,' was accordingly started in July 1796, of which Mr Ewing was for three years the editor It afterwards got the title of 'The Christian Herald,' and under that of 'The Scottish Congregational Magazine,' ultimately became the recognised organ of the Congregational churches of Scotland After he had ceased to conduct it, he often sent communications to its pages under the signature of 'Onesimus."

Finding his efforts cramped in the Establishment, and being prosecuted before the church courts, for pursuing a course incompatible with the established notions of propriety and order, he resolved to quit the national church, and on 29th November 1798, a day appointed for a general thanksgiving, he preached his last sermon in connexion with the Establishment, and shortly after went on an itinerancy to various parts of Perthshire In July 1799 he commenced his ministry in Glasgow as pastor of a Congregational church, which met in the 'Tabernacle,' Jamaica Street, the use of which had been kindly allowed them by Mr Haldane, to whom it belonged. In this building Mr Ewing preached, for several years, to crowded congregations. In consequence however, of an unfortunate misunderstanding with Mr Haldane, he and his people removed, in 1811, to a neat and commodious place of worship erected for him in Nile Street and there he continued to exercise his pastoral duties for the remainder of his life He had been appointed professor or tutor in the Glasgow Theological Academy by the Congregational Union an office in which he was associated with Dr Wardlaw, the venerable pastor of the Congregational church, George Street, Glasgow The department of study presided over by Mr Ewing was that of Biblical Criticism and Church History In 1821 he received from the college of Princetown, New Jersey, the degree of D D but as he disapproved of all religious titles he declined to be addressed as Doctor

Mr Ewing was three times married His first wife, the sister of his friend Mr Innes, died soon after their marriage. His second wife whose maiden name was Jamieson also died soon His third wife was a daughter of Sir John Maxwell of Pollok, baronet In the summer of 1828, she and her husband and a party of friends went on an excursion to the Falls of the Clyde, when the carriage being overturned, the whole party were precipitated down a steep declivity, and Mrs Ewing received injuries which caused her death in a few days after From the shock of this sudden calamity Mr Ewing never fully recovered, and his health began gradually to decline He continued, however, to officiate, both as a minister and a professor, for several years afterwards, until his growing infirmities compelled him to resign the latter office, and only occasionally to engage in the duties of the former At length a stroke of apoplexy destroyed his physical powers, though it did not impair his mental faculties, and on 2d August 1841, "he fell asleep," so gently that, says Dr Wardlaw, who preached his funeral sermon, 'it could hardly be called death—it was the imperceptible cessation of life, a breathing out of his spirit—delightful emblem of his entering into peace." By his second marriage he had one child, a daughter, who published an interesting memoir of her father, and who became the wife of the Rev Dr Matheson of London.

EYTHEN, Lord, a title in the peerage of Scotland, now extinct, conferred, in 1642, by Charles the First, on Sir James King of Barracht and Barness, or Burnhouse, in Aberdeenshire, who had attained the rank of lieutenant-general in the service of Gustavus Adolphus, king of Sweden. In 1641 he was sent for by the Scots Estates to answer a charge of disaffection to his native country, in levying horses and men in Denmark for the service of his majesty, and on his appearance in parliament on the 2d November of that year, he solemnly protested that he was neither counsellor nor actor in the unhappy disputes that had arisen betwixt the king and his subjects, and although he had been urged by his majesty to undertake the levying of troops for him, he had altogether refused it on any condition whatever, in respect it was against his native country and his conscience also, on which the house acquitted him, and declared him a good and honest patriot and deserving of the thanks and approbation of his country [Balfour's Annals, vol ii. p. 130] He was subsequently appointed by Charles, lieutenant-general of his army, under the earl of Newcastle. He also created him a peer of Scotland under the above title, with limitation to the heirs-male of his body, by patent dated at York, 28th March 1642 In the patent the word is spelled Evthin, the title being assumed from the river Ythan in Aberdeenshire. Clarendon says that the marquis of Newcastle being unacquainted with the art of war, the chief command of the army was in effect vested in General King, who had served with the highest reputation under Gustavus Adolphus. In 1644, Lord Evthen returned to Sweden, where he was created Baron Sanshult. On July 26, 1644, the Scots parliament passed a decreet of forfeiture against Lord Ythan, but on January 14, 1647, they passed another rescinding his forfeiture. In 1650 he was included in the act of classes. He died in 1652, aged 63, and was buried at Stockholm His titles became extinct at his death (See KING, surname of)

Fairfax of Cameron, Lord, a title in the Scottish peerage, conferred in 1627, on Sir Thomas Fairfax of Denton, belonging to an ancient family of Saxon origin, which about the time of the Conquest was seated at Towcester in Northumberland, but afterwards removed into Yorkshire. The name is Saxon, Fairfax meaning fair hair The first lord had in 1591 accompanied the earl of Essex, when he was sent with an English army to the assistance of King Henry the Fourth of France against the Spaniards, and was knighted by the earl in the camp before Rouen He was afterwards employed by Queen Elizabeth in various negociations, and was sent by her on an embassy to King James VI of Scotland, by whom he was highly esteemed. Charles the First created him Lord Fairfax of Cameron in the peerage of Scotland, by patent, to him and his heirs male, dated May 4, 1627 He died in May 1640, in the eightieth year of his age. He had four sons killed in battle abroad in one year, 1621, namely, Major William Fairfax, in defence of the city of Frankendale in the Palatinate, Peregrine, at Rochelle in France, John, in the Palatinate, and Thomas, in Turkey His own brother was the eminent poet Edward Fairfax of Newhall, the translator of Tasso's heroic poem of 'Godfrey of Boulogne,' who died in 1632.

His eldest son, Ferdinando, second Lord Fairfax, was member for the city of York, and at the beginning of the civil war, was appointed the parliamentary general for Yorkshire. In 1642 he repulsed the earl of Newcastle at Tadcaster, and in January 1643 routed Lord Byron, with his Irish forces, at Nantwich in Cheshire. In April 1644 he defeated Lord Bellasis at Selby, and took him prisoner, with sixteen hundred men At the battle of Marston Moor in the following July, he commanded the centre, along with the earl of Leven, and contributed much to the defeat of the royal army Being made governor of the city of York, he, in a short time, took all the garrisons in Yorkshire, which had continued to hold out for the king He died in 1647 He was the author of a 'Letter to his Excellency, Robert Earl of Essex, relating to his late prosperous success against the Popish Fr Army in the North,' London, 1648, 4to, and a 'Letter concerning the great Victory obtained at Selby in Yorkshire,' 1644, 4to

His eldest son, Thomas, third Lord Fairfax, born in 1611, was the famous parliamentary general, Sir Thomas Fairfax, whose actions enter so largely into the history of the civil wars. After Naseby fight, in June 1645, where he gained a complete and decisive victory, he reduced the western counties to obedience, and by the capture of Ragland castle in August 1646, put an end to all opposition to the parliament's authority throughout England On the execution of Charles the First, to which he was no party, he was appointed general in chief of the forces in England and Ireland, but in 1650, being ordered to march against the Scots, he resigned the command of the army to Cromwell, and retired, on a pension of five thousand pounds a-year, from public life for a time. In 1659, just previous to the Restoration, he again came forward, and it was chiefly through his influence that the Irish brigade forsook Lambert and joined the army of Monk, after the latter had resolved to bring in the king He was chosen a member of the healing parliament, and was at the head of the committee appointed to wait upon Charles the Second at the Hague and invite him over to England. His latter years were spent in retirement at his seat in Yorkshire, his leisure hours being devoted to literary occupations. He died November 12th, 1671, in the sixtieth year of his age. He has obtained a place in Walpole's Royal and Noble Authors (Park's edition, vol v p. 110) as the author of 'Short Memorials of Thomas Lord Fairfax, written by himself,' London, 1699, 8vo. He also left in manuscript, 'The Psalms of David, the Song of Solomon, the Canticles, and Songs of Moses, Exodus xv and Deut. xxii., and other parts of Scripture done into verse,' a 'Poem on Solitude,' 'Notes of Sermons,' by his lordship, by his lady, daughter of Horace Lord Vere, and by their daughter, Mary, wife of George, second duke of Buckingham, and a 'Treatise on the Shortness of Life.' He also wrote some verses on the horse which Charles the Second rode to his coronation, and which had been bred and presented to the king by his lordship Several other treatises in MS. than those above-mentioned, composed by him, are said to be preserved in his own handwriting in the library of Denton in Yorkshire, with others of his grandfather In Watt's Bibliotheca Britannica there is a long list, extending to nearly two columns and a half, of the various proclamations, letters and declarations published in his name during the civil wars. His portrait subjoined is from a fine engraving of him in Walpole.

His lordship was a great patron and encourager of literature. In the year 1650, he gave to the Bodleian library at Oxford twenty-nine ancient manuscripts and forty-nine modern ones, among the former was the history of Scotland, supposed to have been written by Bishop Elphinston of Aberdeen—to which reference has already been made, (see conclusion of Elphinston's life, page 138 of this volume).

When Oxford was garrisoned by the parliament forces, Lord Fairfax exerted his utmost diligence in preserving the libraries from pillage. He also allowed a considerable pension to Roger Dodsworth the antiquary, whose collections were among the manuscripts left to the Bodleian library.

Having no male issue, but only two daughters, he was succeeded by his cousin, Henry Fairfax of Oglethorpe, grandson of the first Lord Fairfax, through his second son the Hon and Rev Henry Fairfax. The fourth lord dying in 1680, his eldest son, Thomas, became fifth lord. The latter concurred heartily in the Revolution of 1688, and in December that year was appointed lieutenant-colonel of the third regiment of horseguards. In January 1693 he was promoted to the King's own regiment of horse, and in 1701 he was made a brigadier-general. He represented the county of York in several of the English parliaments till the union of the two kingdoms, and died in 1709.

His eldest son, Thomas, sixth Lord Fairfax, inherited from his mother, Catherine, only child of Thomas, Lord Colepeper, Leeds castle and several manors in Kent, with estates in the Isle of Wight, and about five million seven hundred thousand acres of land in Virginia, North America, called the Northern Neck, comprised within the boundaries of the rivers Potomack and Rappahannock. He studied at the university of Oxford, and is said to have been one of the writers in the Spectator. He had a commission in the horseguards blue. In 1739 he visited his American property and was so much captivated by the soil, climate, and beautiful scenery of Virginia, that he resolved to settle there. He returned to England to arrange his affairs, and after generously bestowing his English estates on his brother Robert, in 1747 he sailed for America, where he spent the remainder of his life. He was lieutenant and custos rotulorum of Frederick county, and presided at the provincial courts of Winchester, where, during the session, he always kept open table. He also acted as surveyor or overseer of the public roads. He died, unmarried, in February 1782, aged ninety-one.

His brother, Robert, seventh lord, major of the first troop of lifeguards, resigned his commission in 1746, and in 1759 became lieutenant-colonel of the West Kent militia. He was also a member of parliament for several years, at first for Maidstone and afterwards for the county of Kent. At his residence at Leeds castle, in Kent, he had the honour of entertaining King George the Third and his queen three days in November 1779. He died 15th July 1793, in his 87th year, and although he had been twice married, he left no issue. His estates devolved on his nephew (the son of his eldest sister, Frances) the Rev Denny Martin, who assumed the name of Fairfax, and the title on his male heir, Bryan Fairfax, third and only surviving son of William, fourth son of the fourth lord's second son Henry. This William Fairfax had been settled in New England, but at the request of his cousin the sixth lord, he removed to Virginia, to undertake the management of his property there, and died in 1757.

Bryan, his third son, on the death of the seventh lord, was in holy orders in America, but proceeding to England, he preferred his claim to the peerage of Fairfax of Cameron, which the House of Lords determined in his favour, when he returned to America. He married Miss Elizabeth Cary, by whom he had several children. He died about 1812.

His son, Thomas, ninth lord, born in 1762, resided in Fairfax county in Virginia, and died there April 21, 1846, when he was succeeded by his grandson, Charles-Snowden, tenth lord, whose seat is Woodburne, Maryland, United States of America.

A baronetcy was conferred, 21st February, 1836, on Sir Henry Fairfax of Holmes, Roxburghshire, descended from the same stock as the lords Fairfax. His father, Vice-admiral Sir William George Fairfax, born in 1788, entered the navy at an early age, and continued in it for the long period of sixty-three years. In 1759 he was present at the taking of Quebec under General Wolfe, and in 1778 when in command of the 'Alert,' he captured 'Le Coureur,' the first ship taken in the French war, a service greatly enhanced from the 'Arethusa' being engaged at the same time in her celebrated action with the 'Belle Poule.' In the memorable battle of Camperdown, on the 11th October 1797, he acted as flag-captain to Lord Duncan on board the 'Venerable,' and in consideration of his gallant conduct on that occasion, he received the honour of knighthood, and was soon after appointed colonel of marines. He was subsequently promoted to the rank of vice-admiral of the red. By his wife, Margaret, daughter of Samuel Charteris, Esq, solicitor of the customs for Scotland, he had a son, Sir Henry and a daughter, Mary, married, first, to Samuel Greig, Esq, captain and commissioner in the Russian navy, and, secondly, to William Somerville, Esq. This lady is the celebrated Mrs. Somerville, authoress of the 'Mechanism of the Heavens,' and other scientific works. The son, Sir Henry, first baronet, who got the title in consideration of his father's distinguished naval services, was born in 1790, and attained the rank of colonel in the army in November 1841. He married, first, in 1830, 3d daughter of Thomas Williamson, Esq of Laxmount, county of Edinburgh (afterwards Williamson Ramsay), by whom he had a son, William George Herbert Taylor, born in 1831, an officer in the army, served in the Crimea, 1855–56, and at Sebastopol, 2dly, in 1851, eldest daughter of William Astell, Esq M P, many years a director of the East India Company.

FAIRFOUL, a seemingly contradictory surname, derived from Fair fowl, those who bear it carrying three parrots or papingoes in their arms as relative to the name. In June 1662, Andrew Fairfowl, the son of John Fairfowl of the town of Anstruther, was consecrated archbishop of Glasgow. He had first been chaplain to the earl of Rothes, and next minister of North Leith, afterwards at Dunse. It is stated that Charles the Second having heard him preach several times when in Scotland in 1650, on his restoration, inquired after Mr Fairfowl, and unsolicited preferred him to the see of Glasgow, on a vacancy occurring in November 1661. He did not, however, long enjoy his new dignity, for he sickened the very day of riding the parliament in November 1663, and died in a few days thereafter when he was buried in the abbey church of Holyroodhouse.

FAIRLEY, the surname of an old family in Ayrshire, now extinct, descended from Robert de Ross, a branch of the Rosses of Tarbet in Cunningham, mentioned in the Ragman Roll as proprietors of the lands of Fairley whence they took their name. [See Remarks on Ragman Roll, Nisbet's Heraldry, vol ii. p. 29.] In 1385, William de Fairley was included in a list of twenty Scotsmen who received letters of pardon from Edward the Third, for all the crimes they had committed in war with England. [Rot. Scot. vol i p. 881.]

About the year 1540 there was a John Fairley of Fairley, who is supposed to have been succeeded by David Fairley of that ilk. The latter had three daughters, coheiresses, the eldest of whom, Margaret, married Sir Robert Crawford, eldest son of William Crawford of Drumsoy, and her husband, by some family arrangement, succeeded to the whole property, and became Fairley of that ilk.

The family continued in possession of the estate till the beginning of the eighteenth century, when it was sold to David, earl of Glasgow Fairley castle, a square tower, situated on the coast of the parish of Largs, and built in 1521, is remarkable as the scene of the ballad of 'Hardyknute.' It commands one of the finest views on the Frith of Clyde, but is now in ruins.

The Fairlies of Bruntsfield in the vicinity of Edinburgh (a cadet of the Fairlies of Braid in the same neighbourhood), stated by Nisbet (System of Heraldry, vol. i p. 295) to have been descended from a natural son of King Robert the Second, on the extinction of the original family of Fairley in Ayrshire, assumed the title of that ilk, or chief of the name, although they appear to have been a different family altogether. The first of this family was John Fairlie, burgess in Edinburgh, who received, by charter dated 2d July 1603, from Alexander Lauder of Halton, the lands of Bruntsfield, originally Brownsfield, from Richard Brown of Burrowmuir, to whom they at one time belonged. This John Fairlie died before the 24th February 1607

His son, William Fairlie, had the honour of knighthood conferred on him soon after succeeding to the estate of Bruntsfield, which he disposed of to his son, William Fairlie, in his lifetime, and died before the last day of March 1626.

The son of this William, also William Fairlie of Bruntsfield, acquired the lands of little Dreghorn in Ayrshire, by purchase from the family of Fullarton, and in 1689 was appointed one of the commissioners for ordering out the militia. In Law's Memorial occurs the following note "Rowallan, elder and younger, and Bruntsfield does retire and darn (that is, hide themselves) for a time," suspected of being concerned in the Bothwell Brig insurrection in 1679 He was apprehended in London in June of that year, but does not appear to have been long detained in prison He died before 22d May 1696.

His son, William, on succeeding to the estates, dropped the designation of Bruntsfield, and assumed that of Fairlie, the name now given to the lands of Little Dreghorn, which had been acquired by his father

William, his son by his first wife, Catherine, daughter of Thomas Brisbane of that ilk, had a son, Alexander, and a daughter, Margaret. His second wife by whom he had a daughter who died in infancy was Elizabeth Craufurd, second daughter of John Craufurd of Craufurdland, who survived him more than sixty years, and remarried in 1744, John Howieson of Braehead, in the county of Edinburgh. [See vol i. p. 702, second col., art. CRAWFORD]

Alexander Fairlie, the son, a gentleman of considerable talent, took a lead in most matters relating to the county of Ayr in his time, and was a great promoter of agricultural improvement. He died, unmarried, at an advanced age, in the year 1803, and was succeeded by his sister, Margaret Fairlie of Fairlie who had married William Cuningham, afterwards of Auchenskeith served heir in 1778 to the deceased Sir David Cuningham of Robertland baronet, when he assumed the title, and became the seventh baronet of that family He died in 1781, and was succeeded by his son, Sir William Cuningham, who assumed the additional name of Fairlie, the conjoined name being now that of the family [See vol. i. p. 747, top of 1st column, art. CUNINGHAM.]

Sir Charles Cuningham-Fairlie, born 22d September, 1780 succeeded his brother as 8th baronet, Feb. 28, 1852, and died June 1, 1859, succeeded by his eldest son, Sir Percy Arthur, 9th baronet, born in 1815.

FALCONER, a surname derived from the ancient office of keeper of the falcons of the king. The first on record of this name was Ranulph, the son of Walter de Lenorp, falconer to King William the Lion, about 1200 From that monarch he had a charter of the lands of Luthra, now called Luther, Balbegno, and others in the Mearns, which he called Hawkerton (afterwards Halkertoun) from his office, having charge of the king's hawks. The arms, ancient and modern, of the Falconer family, are relative thereto.

He was succeeded by Walter le Falconer, called sometimes de Lunkyr, or Lumgair His grandson, who is witness to a charter of the lands of Drumsleid about 1250, had two sons, Robert and Peter, clericus regius under Alexander II

Robert, the elder son, first assumed the name of Falconer de Halkertoun, and his name is in the Ragman Roll as being obliged to swear allegiance to Edward the First in 1296.

His grandson, David Fauconer, had a charter from his godfather, King David the Second, dated at Munros (Montrose) 2d April 1365

His son, Andrew Falconer of Lethenbar, was one of the barons who attended Alexander Stewart, earl of Buchan, the king's lieutenant in the north, 11th October, 1380

His son, Alexander Falconer of Lethens, is mentioned as father of David, who succeeded him, and Robert Falconer, who had a charter of the lands of Newton in 1473, and whose grandson, Robert Falconer, had a charter of Balendro, in 1504

From this David was descended, in the fourth generation, Sir Alexander Falconer of Halkertoun, who had a charter of the hill of Halkertoun 24th April 1544 By his wife, Elizabeth, only daughter of Sir Archibald Douglas of Glenbervie, he had four sons and a daughter Archibald, the second son, was ancestor of the Falconers of Phesdo, one of whom, Sir James Falconer of Phesdo, a lord of session at the Revolution, was the son of Sir John Falconer, one of the wardens of the mint, who, upon learning that he was to be pursued for malversation in his office, took it so much to heart that he died suddenly at Phesdo, in November 1682 Sir James was admitted advocate 6th January 1674 He took his seat on the bench, 1st November 1689, as Lord Phesdo, and was admitted a lord of justiciary 27th January 1690 He represented the shire of Kincardine in the parliament of 1703-4, and died at Edinburgh 9th June 1705 The last of this branch of the family, John Falconer of Phesdo, advocate, died 21st November 1764, in the 91st year of his age, leaving his estate to the Hon Captain George Falconer, fifth son of David, fifth Lord Falconer of Halkertoun

Samuel the third son of the above Sir Alexander Falconer of Halkertoun, was designed of Kincorth, county of Elgin, and William, the fourth son, styled of Dunduff, was father of Colin Falconer, bishop of Argyle, 5th September 1679, and the following year translated to the see of Moray

The eldest son, Sir Alexander Falconer of Halkertoun, had three sons. Patrick, the second son, designed of Newton, was ancestor of James Falconer of Monktoun, county of Edinburgh, and James, the third son, had a charter of the lands of Middlehaugh, county of Elgin

The eldest son, Sir Alexander Falconer of Halkertoun, by his wife, Agnes, eldest daughter of Sir David Carnegie of Culluthie, had four sons. Sir Alexander, the eldest, a lord of session was the first Lord Falconer of Halkertoun, of whom afterwards. Sir David, the second son, designed of Glenfarquhar, was one of the commissaries of Edinburgh. His eldest son, Sir Alexander Falconer of Glenfarquhar, was created a baronet, 20th March 1670-1. His son succeeded as fourth Lord Falconer of Halkertoun.

Sir David's second son, Sir David Falconer of Newton, was sometime lord president of the court of session. He studied the law under the eye of his father, and having passed advocate, 3d July 1661, was afterwards appointed one of the commissaries of Edinburgh, and received the honour of knighthood. On 24th May 1676, he was nominated a lord of session, and on 2d March 1678, was admitted a lord of justiciary On 5th June 1682, he was appointed president of the court, and in the parliament of 1685 he represented the county of Forfar He was elected a lord of the articles, and a member of three commissions then appointed one for trade, another for the plantation of kirks, and a third for the regulation of inferior judicatories. He died at Edinburgh, after four days' illness, on 15th December 1685, in the forty-sixth year of his age, and was buried in Greyfriars churchyard, where a monument was erected to his memory The inscription upon it is quoted at length in the Scottish Elegiac Verses from 1629 to 1729, printed at Edinburgh in 1842 President Falconer collected the decisions of the Court of Session from November 1681 till 9th December 1685, being the very last day he sat in court, they were published in 1705 by John Spottiswood, advocate. His eldest son, David, became fifth Lord Falconer, and his third daughter, Catherine, married Joseph Hume of Nimewells in the county of Berwick, and was the mother of David Hume the historian

Sir John Falconer, of Balmakellie, third son of the above Sir Alexander Falconer of Halkertoun and his wife Agnes, and younger brother of the first Lord Falconer of Halkertoun, was master of the mint in the reign of Charles the Second. He had a son, Robert, a merchant in London James, the fourth son, was designed of Coatfield in the county of Elgin.

Sir Alexander Falconer of Halkertoun, the eldest son, was a lord of session under the title of Lord Halkertoun He was one of the commissioners for the shire of Kincardine in the Scots parliament of 1643, and took an active part in the public proceedings of that stirring period In 1644 he was appointed a commissioner for the plantation of kirks, and on 1st February 1645, a commissioner of exchequer In reward for his great zeal and loyalty in the parliament of 1647, for relieving King Charles, when he was a prisoner in the Isle of Wight, he was raised to the peerage of Scotland, 29th July of that year, by the title of Lord Falconer of Halkertoun, and he was a member of the committee of estates appointed soon after On 15th February 1649 he was deprived of his seat on the bench, on account of what was then termed "malignancy," that is, loyalty to the king, but at the Restoration he was reinstated. He died 1st October 1671 By his wife, Anne, only child of John, ninth Lord Lindsay of the Byres, he had, with a daughter, Agnes, married to the second Lord Banff, a son, Alexander, second Lord Falconer of Halkertoun, whose only son, David, third lord, was served heir to his father in 1685, and on 24th March 1710, was found non compos mentis, and had been so for twenty years previous. He died, unmarried, in February 1724, when the title devolved on Sir Alexander Falconer, grandson of Sir David Falconer of Glenfarquhar, as above mentioned

Sir Alexander, second baronet and fourth lord, died without issue, 17th March 1727, when the baronetcy is presumed to have become extinct, and the title of Lord Falconer of Halkertoun devolved on David Falconer, eldest son, (by his second wife, Mary, daughter of George Norvell of Boghall, in the county of Linlithgow) of Sir David Falconer of Newton, lord president of the court of session, the first of Glenfarquhar

David, fifth Lord Falconer of Halkertoun, was served heir to his father, on 23d February 1693, in the barony of Newton, in the counties of Forfar and Kincardine, and succeeded his cousin in the title in 1727 He died at Inglismaldie, Kincardineshire, 24th September 1751, in the 71st year of his age. He married Lady Catherine Margaret Keith, eldest daughter of the second earl of Kintore. This lady was only thirteen years and five months old when she became his wife, and she died at Edinburgh 1st March 1762, in the 72d year of her age, having had five sons and four daughters. The eldest son succeeded to the title. The Hon David Falconer, the third son, was an insurance broker in London, and the Hon George Falconer, the youngest, an officer in the navy, died commander of the Invincible, 3d May 1780

The eldest son, Alexander, sixth Lord Falconer of Halkertoun, born about 1707 went abroad in early youth, and attached himself to the earl Marischal and field-marshal Keith, with whom he remained till his father's death in 1751, when he succeeded to the title, on which he returned to Scotland, and died without issue, at Edinburgh, 5th November 1762, aged fifty-five.

His next brother, William, became the seventh lord. He was a colonel in the Dutch service, and settled at Groningen in Holland, where he died 12th December 1776 He married a Dutch lady, and by her had three sons. The Hon William Falconer, the second son, was killed in battle at Quebec.

The eldest son, the Hon Anthony-Adrian, eighth lord, on the death of the earl Marischal in 1778 (see MARISCHAL, earl) succeeded to the estate and title of Kintore, and became fifth earl of Kintore (see KINTORE, earl of).

FALCONER, WILLIAM, an ingenious poet, the son of a barber and wigmaker at Edinburgh, was born in that city in 1730 He had a brother and sister who were both deaf and dumb from their birth He received but a scanty education, and when quite young, was bound apprentice on board a merchant vessel belonging to Leith He subsequently rose to the situation of second mate in the Britannia The earliest production of his muse, published at Edinburgh in 1751, was entitled 'A Poem, Sacred to the Memory of Frederick, Prince of Wales' He also wrote several minor pieces, none of which displayed much merit

In 1762 appeared his principal poem, 'The Shipwreck,' in three cantos, dedicated to Edward, duke of York, brother of George the Third The main subject of this admirable composition is the loss of the ship Britannia bound from Alexandria to Venice, which touched at the island of Candia, whence, proceeding on her voyage, she encountered a violent storm that drove her on the coast of Greece, off Cape Colonna, where she was shipwrecked, three only of the crew being left alive, of whom Falconer himself was one. By the patronage of the duke of York, he was appointed, in 1763, a midshipman on board the Royal George, for which he gratefully addressed to his royal highness 'An Ode on his second departure from England as Rear-admiral' His ship being paid off at the close of the war, Falconer next became purser of the Glory frigate Soon after, he married a Miss Hicks, daughter of the surgeon of Sheerness Yard. His next poetical effort was a satire, called 'The Demagogue,' in which he zealously defended the Bute administration, and attacked with great acrimony the public character and conduct of Mr Pitt, afterwards earl of Chatham, Wilkes, Churchill, and others In 1764 he published a second edition of 'The Shipwreck,' enlarged to the extent of one thousand lines more than the first edition In 1769, at which time he was living in London, he brought out his 'Universal Dictionary of Marine, or a copious explanation of the technical terms and phrases employed in the construction, equipment, furniture, machinery, movements, and military operations of a Ship, illustrated with plates, as also a translation of the French sea-terms and phrases,' a work of the greatest practical utility, which soon became in general use in the navy, and was frequently reprinted Soon after he published a third edition of his 'Shipwreck,' with considerable improvements

Having been appointed purser to the Aurora frigate, which was ordered to carry out to India several officers of the East India Company, that vessel sailed from England, September 30, 1769, and was never heard of after touching at the Cape of Good Hope, in the succeeding December It was generally conjectured that she had either taken fire, or had foundered at sea, and that all on board had perished

As a poet Falconer's fame rests entirely on 'The Shipwreck,' which is a didactic as well as descriptive poem, and may be recommended to a young sailor, not only to excite his enthusiasm, but to improve his seamanship

FALKLAND, Viscount, a title in the peerage of Scotland, first conferred in 1620, by James the Sixth, on Sir Henry Cary of Berkhamstead, county of Hertford, the son of Sir Edward Cary of Aldenham, in the same county, master of the jewel office to Queen Elizabeth and King James, and descended from a family long seated in the counties of Devon and Somerset. In Douglas' Peerage, it is stated that Sir Henry was the first who brought intelligence of the death of Queen Elizabeth to Scotland in 1603. This, however, is a mistake, as the messenger on that occasion was Robert Cary, earl of Monmouth. Sir Henry Cary was one of the gentlemen of King James' bedchamber, and in 1608 he was made a knight of the Bath at the creation of Henry prince of Wales. In 1607 he was appointed controller of the household, and on November 10, 1620, he was created, in the Scottish peerage, Viscount Falkland, (that is, Falcon-land, from the Suio-Gothic falk, the Anglo-Saxon wealk, or the Teutonic valck, a species of hawk,) which title, with his naturalization, was confirmed by Charles the First, by diploma, in 1627 On 6th November 1622, he was appointed lord deputy of Ireland, but in 1629 he was recalled, by the intrigues of the papists. Having broken his leg by accident in Theobald's Park, he died in September 1633 A letter by his lordship to James the First, being a petition to the king for the release of his son Lucius, who for challenging Sir Francis Willoughby had been thrown into the Fleet prison, preserved in the Harleian MSS. (in which there are four original letters of his lordship to the duke of Buckingham,) has been printed in the Cabala, and an Epitaph by him on Elizabeth Countess of Huntingdon is given in Wilford's Memorials. Walpole also copies it, in which there is a portrait of him There was found among his papers, and published in 1680, 'The History of the most unfortunate Prince, King Edward II., with choice political observations on him and his unhappy favourites, Gaveston and Spencer,' folio and 8vo, with preface by Sir James Harrington By a remarkable invention of his lordship to prevent his name from being counterfeited, by artfully concealing in it the successive years of his age, he detected a forger who had not observed so nice a peculiarity His second son, Sir Lawrence Cary, was killed, fighting under Sir Charles Coote, when he defeated the Irish rebels at Swords in 1642

His eldest son, Lucius, second viscount, born about 1610, celebrated for his virtues and rare qualities, previous to entering on public life, devoted himself to retirement and study, but after succeeding to the title he went to court, and was appointed one of the gentlemen of the king's bedchamber In 1639 he served as a volunteer in an expedition under the earl of Holland, to oppose an expected irruption on the Scottish borders, when Waller addressed some complimentary verses to him on his departure, and Cowley wrote a congratulatory poem on his return In 1640 he was chosen member for Newport in Cornwall, and at first was on the parliament's side, but afterwards, distrusting the designs of its leaders, he joined the king's party, and in 1642 was prevailed on to accept of a seat in the privy council, and was appointed secretary of state He attended the king at Edgefield fight, at Oxford, and at the siege of Gloucester, and was so much concerned at the civil war in which the country was involved that, frequently when sitting among his friends, after a long silence, he would exclaim, with deep sighs, "Peace," declaring that he could not live in such a state of perpetual grief and anxiety On the morning of the first battle of Newbury (20th September 1643) he called for a clean shirt, and being asked the reason, said that if he were slain, they should not find his body in foul linen Venturing himself in the first rank of Lord Byron's regiment, he received a musket ball which killed him "Thus Falkland died, the generous and the just," in the thirty-fourth year of his age. He was generally esteemed the most virtuous public character of his time, and his intimate friend Lord Clarendon, has highly eulogized him in his History of the Rebellion His praises indeed, have been so resounded by poets, historians and moralists that they are, as it were, interwoven with English literature. He is said to have been in no degree attractive in his person, being small of stature, and ungraceful of motion, and his voice so harsh that it offended the ear It was a saying of his that he pitied unlearned gentlemen on a rainy day A portrait of his lordship is given in Park's edition of Walpole's Royal and Noble Authors, volume v, which contains a list of his political speeches, and pamphlets concerning episcopacy and against the papacy His celebrated speech against the bishops is dated February 9, 1640 He is said to have assisted Chillingworth in his book called 'The Religion of Protestants,' and he wrote an Eclogue on the death of Ben Jonson, published in the collection called 'Jonsonus Viribus,' which is not remarkable for either elegance or pathos.

His eldest son, Henry Lucius, third viscount, also distinguished for his abilities, and well versed in every kind of literature, was in 1645 elected a member of parliament for Newton in Hampshire, but it would appear that on account of his being disabled, a new writ was issued in his place. It is related that on one of the older members of the House of Commons objecting to his youth, and saying that he looked as if he had not sown his wild oats, he at once replied, "Then I am come to the properest place, where there are so many geese to pick them up." In August 1659 he was sent to the Tower, on suspicion of being concerned in Sir George Booth's rising in favour of Charles the Second After the Restoration he was chosen for Arundel in Sussex, in the Convention parliament, but in the parliament of 1661 he took his seat for the county of Oxford, of which he had been appointed lord-lieutenant. He was the author of 'The Marriage Night,' a comedy, and died in 1644, in the prime of his age

His son, Anthony, fourth viscount, was also a member of the House of Commons, and paymaster of the navy He early joined the Revolution, and in 1691 was sworn a member of the privy council. He was twice a commissioner of the admiralty On 17th January 1693-4, on a charge of having unduly obtained two thousand pounds from the king, he was, by the House of Commons, committed to the Tower, where he died the same year

His only son, Lucius Henry, fifth viscount, served in Spain under General Stanhope, and died at Paris 31st December 1730 The Hon George Cary, his second son, was a general in the army, and died in April 1792

The elder son, Lucius Ferdinand, sixth viscount, died 27th February 1785 His only son, the Hon Lucius Ferdinand Cary, an officer in the army, was appointed in 1762, governor of Goree, and on 18th September 1779 he became lieutenant-colonel-commandant of the 89th foot, which regiment he had raised. He died commander of the British forces in Tobago, August 20th, 1780, before his father, leaving with five daughters, two sons, Henry Thomas, seventh viscount, and Charles John, eighth viscount.

Henry Thomas, seventh viscount, a lieutenant of foot, succeeded his grandfather, on his death, February 27, 1785, and dying, May 22, 1796, unmarried, in the 31st year of his age, his brother, Charles-John, became eighth viscount. He was born in November 1768, and was a captain in the royal navy He was mortally wounded in a duel with Alexander Powell Esq., 28th February, 1809, and died two days afterwards. "He lost his life," said Lord Byron, "for a joke, and one, too, which he did not make himself" His third son was named after Lord Byron. Writing to his mother, Mrs. Byron, of date March 6, 1809, his lordship says, "My last letter was written under great depression of spirits from poor Falkland's death, who has left without a shilling four children (three sons and a daughter) and his wife. I have been endeavouring to assist them, which, God knows, I cannot do as I could wish, from my own embarrassments, and the many claims upon me from other quarters." At the baptism of his godson, Byron left a five hundred pound note for him in a coffee-cup. He also introduced an allusion to the untimely death of his friend into his 'English Bards and Scotch Reviewers,' with the following note "I knew the late Lord Falkland well. On Sunday night I beheld him presiding at his own table, in all the honest pride of hospitality; on Wednesday morning at three o'clock, I saw stretched before me all that remained of courage, feeling, and a host of passions. He was a gallant and successful officer, his faults were the faults of a sailor—as such, Britons will forgive them. He died like a brave man in a better cause; for had he fallen in like manner on the deck of the frigate to which he was just appointed, his last moments would have been held up by his countrymen as an example to succeeding heroes." In 1790 Lord Falkland published a pamphlet entitled 'Considerations on the Competency of the Parliament of Ireland to accede to the union with Great Britain.

His eldest son, Lucius Bentinck, 9th viscount, born 5th Nov 1803 succeeded his father in 1809 He married 1st, in 1830, Lady Amelia Fitzclarence (died in 1858), a natural daughter of William IV, issue, a son, born in 1831; 2dly, in 1859, Elizabeth, Dowager Duchess of St Albans, widow of 9th Duke. His lordship was created Baron Hunsdon in the peerage of the United Kingdom 16th May 1832 In 1837 he was sworn a member of the privy council, governor of Nova Scotia from 1840 to 1846, and governor of Bombay, from Feb. 1848 to Dec. 1853

FARQUHAR, a surname derived from the Gaelic word Fearchar, or Ferchard, which appears to have its foundation in Ferg or Fearg (Gaelic, meaning anger or wrath), the root of Fergus, which see Farquhar is the name of an old family in the county of Ayr, which have enjoyed the lands of Gilmilnescroft, or Guildmidscroft, sometimes written Gilmercroft, in Kyle-Stewart, for many generations, the representative of which, James Gray Farquhar, Esq., eldest son of the heiress of Gilmilnescroft, wife of John Gray, Esq of Kilmerdenny, descended from the youngest son of Sir William Gray of Pittendrum, ancestor of Lord Gray succeeded in 1809

A branch of the Ayrshire family seems to have settled very early in Aberdeenshire, to which belonged Sir Robert Farquhar, of Lenturk, knight, who was provost of Aberdeen in 1661 His great-great grandson was the eminent physician, Sir Walter Farquhar, baronet, son of the Rev Robert Farquhar, for many years minister of Chapel of Garioch He was born at Peterhead, and was one of a large family, several of whom distinguished themselves, particularly his brother John, who died young, but had acquired a high character as a divine. His sermons, after his death were edited by Principal Campbell and Professor Gerard of Aberdeen, and have gone through many editions. After studying for the medical profession for four years at the university of King's college, Old Aberdeen, and taking his degree of M A, Sir Walter went to the universities of Glasgow and Edinburgh. Afterwards, through the patronage of Lord Howe, he was appointed surgeon in the 19th foot, and attended his lordship when wounded at the siege of Belleisle. The regiment being subsequently ordered to Gibraltar, he obtained leave of absence, and proceeded to France, where he remained for a year and a half, visiting the hospitals in the provinces and in Paris, and associating with the most eminent men of the period, in the several branches of medicine and surgery He studied several months under the great Le Cat, at Rouen in Normandy, taking up his abode in the house of that celebrated anatomist, who was the founder and director of the famous hospital there. On his return to Gibraltar, his practice became considerable, but he was obliged, from ill health, to resign his situation there, when he settled in London, and soon after married Mrs. Harvie, the widow of a physician from Jamaica. In a short time his practice became the most extensive of any physician in the metropolis, and on March 1, 1796, he was created a baronet of the United Kingdom He was the confidential medical adviser of Mr Pitt and Lord Melville, and he was appointed one of the physicians to the prince of Wales, afterwards George the Fourth, when Regent. In 1818 he gave up general practice, and confined his attendance exclusively to the prince regent and to those families who classed him with their friends. Sir Walter died 26th March 1819, leaving three sons and four daughters.

His eldest son, Sir Thomas Harvie Farquhar, second baronet, born 27th June 1775 died in January 1846, leaving 3 sons and 3 daughters. The eldest son, Sir Walter Rockcliffe Farquhar, third baronet, born 4th June 1810, married 28th November 1837, the lady Mary Octavia Somerset, youngest daughter of the sixth duke of Beaufort, with issue.

Sir Robert Townsend Farquhar, the second son of Sir Walter Farquhar, the eminent physician, born October 14, 1776, was for many years commercial resident at Amboyna, and afterwards lieutenant-governor of Pulo-Penang At the peace of Amiens in 1802, he was appointed commissioner for adjusting the British claims in the Moluccas, and to deliver up those islands to the Batavian republic. In 1812 he was appointed governor and commander-in-chief of the island of Mauritius, and resigned that office in 1823 He was created a baronet 21st August 1821, and assumed the additional name of Townsend by sign manual in 1824 He died 16th March 1830, aged 53 At the time of his death he was M P for Hythe, a director of the East India Company, and of the Alliance Insurance Company In 1807 he published a pamphlet entitled 'Suggestions for counteracting any injurious effects upon the population of the British West India Colonies from the abolition of the Slave Trade'

His son, Sir Walter Minto Townsend Farquhar, second baronet of this branch, born 26th October 1809, married in 1835, the daughter of the seventh Lord Reay, with issue

FARQUHAR, JOHN, an eccentric and very wealthy individual, in the latter years of his life known as Farquhar of Fonthill, was born at Bilbo, parish of Crimond, Aberdeenshire, in 1751, of poor parents Early in life he went to India, as a cadet in the Bombay establishment, where he was a chum of the late General Kerr, and soon after his arrival he received, in an engagement, a dangerous wound in the hip, which caused lameness, and affected his health so much that he was recommended to remove to Bengal He soon quitted the military service, and became a free merchant Chemistry was his favourite pursuit, and from its practical application the foundation of his immense fortune was laid There happened to be some defect in the mode of manufacturing gunpowder, in the interior, at Pultah, and Mr. Farquhar being selected by the marquis Cornwallis, then governor-general of India, as a fit person to superintend the manufactory, ultimately became the sole contractor to the Government In this way, wealth and distinction rapidly poured in upon him, and he attained the particular favour and confidence of the governor Warren Hastings In Bengal he was always remarkable for the closeness of his application, his unabating perseverance, and extraordinary mental vigour

After a number of years he returned to England with a fortune estimated at half a million of money On landing at Gravesend, it is said that, to save coach hire, he walked to London, and, requiring a few pounds, his first visit was to his banker Covered with dust and dirt, with clothes not worth a guinea, he presented himself at the counter, and asked to see Mr Hoare Believing him to be some poor unimportant personage come to solicit charity, the clerks paid no attention to his request, but allowed him to wait in the cash-office, until Mr Hoare, accidentally passing through it, after some explanation, recognised his Indian customer, a man whom he expected to see with all a nabob's pomp Mr Farquhar requested £25, and took his leave

Having subsequently hired a house in Upper Baker Street, Portman Square, London, his residence became remarkable for its dingy appearance, uncleaned windows, and general neglect An old woman was his sole attendant, and she was not allowed to enter his own apartment, to which a brush or broom was never applied His neighbours were not at all acquainted with his character, and there have been instances of some of them offering him money as an object of charity, or as a reduced gentleman The parsimonious habits, which poverty had compelled him to adopt in early life, never forsook him, even when master of a princely fortune, but adhered to him through life

He became a partner in the great agency house in the city, of Basset, Farquhar, and Co, and also purchased the late Mr Whitbread's share in the brewery Part of his wealth was devoted to the purchase of estates, but the great bulk was invested in stock, and allowed to increase on the principle of compound interest Every half year he regularly drew his dividends, his mercantile profits, and his rents, and purchased in the funds In this manner his wealth accumulated to an enormous amount In the summer of 1822 he bought Fonthill Abbey, at the sum of £330,000, and afterwards occasionally resided there, sometimes visited by his relations, till the fall of the tower in December 1825

Slovenly in his dress, and disagreeable at his meals, Mr Farquhar was yet courteous and affable in his manners He was deeply read in the classics, and though adverse through life to writing and figures, when prevailed upon to pen a letter or a note, his style was found to be at once terse, elegant, and condensed In the more difficult sciences, as a mathematician, chemist, and mechanic, he greatly excelled His religious opinions were said to be influenced by an admiration of the purity of the lives and moral principles of the Brahmins It is stated that he offered to appropriate £100,000 to found a college in Aberdeen on the most enlarged plan of education, with a reservation on points of religion, to which, however, the sanction of parliament could not be procured, and the scheme dropped He was diminutive in person, and by no means prepossessing in appearance His wealth, at his death, was computed to amount to a million and a half! Though penurious towards his own comforts, he was liberal and generous to the poor, and many mornings when he had left his house with a crust of bread in his pocket, to save the expense of a penny at an oyster shop, he has given away hundreds of pounds in acts of charity Mr Farquhar died suddenly of apoplexy, July 6, 1826 Having left no will, his immense property was divided between seven nephews and nieces, almost all of them belonging to Aberdeenshire

FARQUHARSON the surname of one of the Highland clans, a division of the great clan Chattan, particular badge of distinction, the foxglove or red whortleberry, rallying cry, carrn-a-chaisteal, 'the cairn of remembrance,' chiefship claimed by Farquharson of Finzean on the ground of being heir male of the clan, of which the heir of line is Farquharson of Invercauld. It had large possessions in the district of Braemar, in the south-west extremity of Aberdeenshire, and also, at a later period, in Perthshire

The immediate ancestor of the family of Invercauld was Farquhar or Fearchard, a son of Shaw Macduff of Rothiemurchus in Strathspey, lineally descended, according to tradition, which has been accepted by Nisbet (Heraldry, vol. i p. 283, and App. vol ii. p. 26), and generally adopted, from a younger son of the ancient thanes of Fife, but without good grounds, as from the MS of 1450, discovered by Mr Skene, the Farquharsons, like the Macintoshes and all the other branches of the great native sept of clan Chattan, appear to have been, from the beginning, a purely Celtic race. Shaw Macduff joining the Macphersons, was very active in the expulsion of the Cummings of Badenoch, and is said to have obtained several large grants of land from Robert the Bruce. It is certain that his son Farquhar, who lived in the reigns of Robert the Second and Robert the Third, settled in the Braes of Mar, and was appointed bailie or hereditary chamberlain thereof The sons of the latter were called Farquharson, the first of the name in Scotland. It is stated in Skene's History of the Highlanders (vol ii p 177) that the leader of the clan Tha, in the celebrated conflict on the Inch at Perth in 1396, with the clan Quhele, is by old authorities styled Sha Fercharson.

Farquhar's eldest son, Donald, by his wife, a daughter of Patrick Duncanson or Robertson, first of the family of Lude, had an only son, Farquhar, who married a daughter of Chisholm of Strathglass, and died in the end of the reign of King James the Third. The younger sons of this Farquhar settled in the Braes of Angus, and founded there several considerable families of the name His eldest son, Donald, married a daughter of Duncan Stewart, commonly called Duncan Downa Dona, of the family of Mar, and obtained a considerable addition to his paternal inheritance, for faithful services rendered to the crown

Donald's son and successor, Findla or Findlay, commonly called, from his great size and strength, Findla Mhor, or great Findla, lived in the beginning of the sixteenth century His descendants were called MacIanla or Mackinlay Before his time the Farquharsons were called in the Gaelic, clan Erachar or Earachar, the Gaelic for Farquhar, and most of the branches of the family, especially those who settled in Athol, were called MacEarachar Those of the descendants of Findla Mhor who settled in the Lowlands had their name of Mackinlay changed into Findlayson [Family MS quoted by Douglas in his Baronage]

Findla Mhor, by his first wife, a daughter of the baron Reid of Kincardine Stewart, had four sons, the descendants of whom settled on the borders of the counties of Perth and Angus, south of Braemar, and some of them in the district of Athol By his second wife, Beatrix, a daughter of Gardyne of that ilk or Banchory, he had five sons and five daughters. He was killed, bearing the royal standard, at the battle of Pinkie in 1547

His eldest son, William, who died in the reign of James the Sixth had four sons. The eldest, John after succeeding to the estate, was in 1641 ordered by the Scots parliament to levy one hundred men for securing the shires of Angus, Mearns, Mar and Banff for two months, the country to compensate him and the committee to give him an ample commission, and instructions from the parliament. [Balfour's Annals vol iii p. 38] He had an only son, Robert, who succeeded him He died in the reign of Charles the Second.

Robert's son, Alexander Farquharson of Invercauld, married Isabella, daughter of William Macintosh of that ilk captain of the clan Chattan and had three sons.

William the eldest son dying unmarried, was succeeded by the second son, John, who carried on the line of the family Alexander, the third son got the lands of Monaltrie and married Anne, daughter of Francis Farquharson, Esq of Finzean.

The above-mentioned John Farquharson of Invercauld, the ninth from Farquhar the founder of the family, was four times married. His children by his first two wives died young. By his third wife, Margaret, daughter of Lord James Murray, son of the first marquis of Athol, he had two sons and two daughters. His elder daughter, Anne, married Eneas Macintosh of that ilk, and was the celebrated Lady Macintosh, who, in 1745, defeated the design of the earl of Loudoun, to make prisoner Prince Charles, at Moy castle By his fourth wife, a daughter of Forbes of Waterton, he had a son and two daughters, and died in 1750

His eldest son, James Farquharson of Invercauld, greatly improved his estates, both in appearance and product. "No place that I have seen," says Dr Stoddart, in his 'Remarks on Local Scenery and Manners in Scotland,' (published in 1801,) "is more characteristically adapted to the residence of a Highland chieftain than Invercauld, and few are more judiciously preserved in an appropriate state of decoration. There are many natural woods, but the extent of plantation is still greater, Mr Farquharson himself, in the course of a long possession, having planted no less than sixteen millions of fir, and two millions of larch But the most remarkable of Mr Farquharson's improvements are the roads, which he has carried, in a variety of directions, through his estate, for purposes both of utility and pleasure They are in all considerably more than twenty miles, they are excellently constructed, and their level so well kept, that you reach, by a regular progress, the very tops of the mountains, ere you are well aware of having ascended" He married Amelia, the widow of the eighth Lord Sinclair, and daughter of Lord George Murray, lieutenant-general of the Pretender's army, and had a large family, who all died except the youngest, a daughter, Catherine. On his death, in 1806, this lady succeeded to the estates. She married, 16th June 1798, Captain James Ross, R N, (who took the name of Farquharson, and died in 1810,) second son of Sir John Lockhart Ross of Balnagowan, baronet, and by him had a son, James Farquharson, (married, and has issue,) a magistrate and deputy lieutenant of Aberdeenshire, representative of the family

The Farquharsons of Whitehouse are descended from Donald Farquharson of Castleton of Braemar, and Monaltrie, living in 1580, eldest son, by his second wife, of Findla Mhor, above mentioned This Donald, usually called Mhor-Tossach, 'a son of the leader,' was chamberlain and bailie to George Earl of Huntly, in Strathdee, then administrator of the earldom of Mar, under Queen Mary He had seven sons, namely, Donald, who succeeded his father, Robert of Finzean; Alexander of Allanquoich, James of Inverey, John of Tullycairn, George of Milltown, and Thomas, who went abroad. Donald M'Fheanlay of Castleton and Monaltrie, had for his second wife Elspet Ogilvie, daughter of Ogilvie of Inverquharity, and left by her three sons and two daughters.

The above Donald Farquharson of Castleton of Braemar was elder brother of Robert of Invercauld

Donald, the eldest son, by his wife Beatrix, a daughter of Gordon of Knockespock, had five sons. The eldest, Donald Oig Farquharson of Monaltrie, called 'the pride of Braemar' in 1689, at the head of some hundreds of the Highlanders of Strathdee, Braemar, Strathawine, or Strachan, Glenlivet, &c. appeared in arms against the Covenanters, having with him Lord Ludovick Gordon, third son of the marquis of Huntly, who had escaped from his grandmother at the Bridge of Gight and from school This truant lad, in Highland garb, had the name of leader of this royalist band. [Gordon of Rothiemay's Hist. of Scots affairs, printed for the Spalding Club, 1841, vol. ii. p. 361]

In 1645, as colonel of the Braemar and Strathdee men under the great marquis of Montrose, Donald Oig distinguished himself alike by his gallant conduct and his mild and affable manner A contemporary writer, Patrick Gordon of Ruthven, in a chronicle of the period from 1639 to 1649, entitled 'Britanes Distemper,' published in an abridged form by the Aberdeen Spalding Club in 1844, speaks of him in the most eulogistic terms, as one generally beloved. He was six months at court, and so won upon the good graces of the king, that he ever after called him his man At the parliament in Edinburgh, on being informed of his being threatened in a fray by some Covenanters, the king angrily exclaimed, "Who dares be so bold as to touch my man, Donald Farquharson?" When a party of royalists had possession of Aberdeen, Sir John Urry, with a troop of Covenanters' horse, was sent for from Montrose at night, and on his arrival, Colonel Gordon and other royalist officers fled from the town, but Colonel Farquharson, on the first alarm, hastened into the street, with some of his friends and servants, and was attacked, and slain by a pistol-shot, 16th March 1645 For his great losses in the cause of the king he never received any compensation, and his son Charles found it necessary in 1702 to dispose of his patrimonial property, the lands of Monaltrie, to Alexander Farquharson, younger brother of John Farquharson of Invercauld James, the second son, a writer to the signet in Edinburgh, was properly the first of this branch of the Farquharsons, as he purchased the lands of Whitehouse in Cromar On his death in 1666 he was succeeded in the lands of Ballabrach and Whitehouse, by his son Harry, whose eldest son, Francis, purchased the lands of Shiells, in the parish of Cluny, Aberdeenshire The latter's son, Harry Farquharson of Shiells, was twice married His eldest daughter by his first wife married John Henderson, Esq of Caskieben, Aberdeenshire, and had an only son, Alexander Farquharson Henderson of Caskieben, M D

Harry Farquharson, the only surviving son, a captain in a regiment of infantry commanded by Colonel Francis Farquharson of Monaltrie, was killed at the battle of Culloden in 1746 He had four sons and two daughters. His second daughter, Grace, was the wife of the Rev George Campbell, D D and F R S, principal and professor of divinity in Marischal college, Aberdeen

His eldest son, Harry, having predeceased him, his second son, William Farquharson, M D of Dundee, succeeded The latter's son, Patrick Farquharson, Esq of Whitehouse, a justice of peace for Aberdeenshire died about 1854, and was predeceased by his eldest son, George Andrew Farquharson a younger son, succeeded, and is now proprietor of Whitehouse

From the Inverey branch descended the Farquharsons of Balmoral, as well as several others.

Farquharson of Baldovie in Forfarshire, is descended from Lauchlan Farquharson of Broughdarg in Perthshire, third son of Findla Mhor, above mentioned, the common ancestor of the various families of Farquharson

John Farquharson of this branch married, in 1766, Elizabeth Ramsay, and with her acquired the estate of Baldovie, which she inherited from her uncle, Dr Thomas Ogilvie. His son, Thomas Farquharson of Baldovie, born in 1770, a magistrate and deputy lieutenant of Forfarshire, succeeded to the estate He died Nov 21, 1860, aged 90

Farquharson of Finzean is heir male of the clan. His estate forms nearly the half of the parish of Birse, Aberdeenshire. The family, of which he is representative, came originally from Braemar, but they have held property in the parish for many generations. On the death of Archibald Farquharson, Esq of Finzean, in 1841, that estate came into the possession of his uncle, John Farquharson, Esq, residing in London, who died in 1849, and was succeeded by his third cousin, Dr Francis Farquharson This gentleman, before succeeding to Finzean, represented the family of Farquharson of Balfour, a small property in the same parish and county, sold by his grandfather

The Farquharsons of Inverey, also in Aberdeenshire, on succeeding to the property of Ballogie in Birse, towards the end of last century, by the extinction of the family of Innes of Balnacraig and Ballogie, in the parish of Aboyne and adjacent parishes assumed the name of Innes in addition to their own On the death of Lewis Farquharson Innes of Ballogie in 1840, that estate devolved upon his four sisters, the Misses Farquharson Of these, Louisa married L. N Barron of Denmore, staff-surgeon, and another is Mrs. Lynch of London. Their father was the male representative of the ancient house of Inverey Balmoral, the seat of the Farquharsons of Inverey, was purchased in 1848 by the Prince Consort, and is the favourite autumn residence of Queen Victoria and the royal family

The Farquharsons, according to Duncan Forbes, "the only clan family in Aberdeenshire," and the estimated strength of which was 500 men, were among the most faithful adherents of the house of Stuart, and throughout all the struggles in its behalf constantly acted up to their motto, "Fide et Fortitudine," with faith and fortitude The old motto of the clan was, "We force nae friend, we fear nae foe." They fought under Montrose, and formed part of the Scottish army under Charles II at Worcester in 1651 They also joined the forces under the viscount of Dundee in 1689, and at the outbreak of the rebellion of 1715, they were the first to muster at the summons of the earl of Mar It was from the house of Invercauld the seat of the chief of the Farquharsons, that the latter addressed that singular letter to his bailie or factor on his estate of Kildrummy, desiring him to inform his own tenants, that if they did not join his standard, he would send a party to burn "what they shall miss taking from them" even though it should be to his own loss, for an example to others, and that he expected the gentlemen "in their best accoutrements on horseback, and no excuse to be accepted of" The Farquharsons accompanied the division under Brigadier Macintosh of Borlum into England, and behaved with great courage at Preston, where Captain Peter Farquharson of Rohailly, "a gentleman of invincible spirit and almost inimitable bravery," was shot in the leg, and being carried into the White Bull inn, where all the wounded were conveyed, "he called," says Patten, "for a glass of brandy, and thus addressed his comrades, 'Come, lads, here is our master's health, though I can do no more I wish you good success.' His leg was cut off by an unskilful butcher rather than a surgeon, and he presently died"

The family of Rohailly was a Perthshire branch, a cadet of the family of Farquharson of Broughdarg, being a third son of Lauchlan Farquharson of Broughdarg The property has been long alienated. The Broughdarg family is said to be represented by W Macdonald Macdonald, Esq of Rossie and St. Martins, who assumed that name, his own being Farquharson.

In 1745, the Farquharsons joined the Pretender, and formed two battalions, the one under the command of Farquharson of Monaltrie, and the other of Farquharson of Balmoral; but they did not accompany the prince in his expedition into England. Under Lord Lewis Gordon they contributed greatly to the defeat of the Macleods at Inverury, and afterwards marched to the general rendezvous of the Pretender's forces at Perth, from which, with the other reinforcements, they were ordered to proceed to the main body of the insurgent army at Stirling, after its return from England At the battle of Falkirk the battalion of Farquharsons under Balmoral occupied a position on the right of the first line, while the other battalion, under Farquharson of Monaltrie, had the charge of the cannon belonging to the prince's army, and were not in the battle. At Culloden they fought in the centre of the front line, along with the Macintoshes, Frasers, Maclachlans, and Macleans. Farquharson of Invercauld was treated by government with considerable leniency for his share in the rebellion, but his kinsman, Farquharson of Balmoral, was specially excepted from mercy in the act of indemnity passed in June 1747

The Farquharsons of Haughton, in the parish of Alford, Aberdeenshire, are descended from the Cummings of Altyre, their immediate progenitor being Ferquhard, ancestor of the Cummings of Kellas, Morayshire, who, on account of the refusal of their chief to allow them to bury their dead in the family burial-place, and other causes, adopted the surname of Farquharson, instead of that of Cumming as descendants of Ferquhard The fourth in direct male descent from him, William Farquharson, married about 1580, Jean, third daughter of John, grandson of Findla Mhor progenitor of the clan Farquharson, by his second wife, a daughter of Baron Roy, as above mentioned, and had issue. He was one of the barons of the north, who signed a "band" or roll for the protection of James the Sixth, after the Gowrie conspiracy

The Farquharsons of Kellas adhered faithfully to King Charles the First, whom they followed to York, and in consequence lost their estate They were all killed in battle but one, named John Farquharson, who, on his return to Scotland, took up his abode at Monymusk, Aberdeenshire, and purchased the estate of Haughton He married, in 1656, a daughter of Donald Farquharson fifth son of Invercauld.

His son and successor, John Cumming Farquharson, of Kellas and Haughton, had two sons and a daughter John, the elder son, married Anne Stewart, countess of Blessington, in the peerage of Ireland, but died before his father, without issue. Mary, the daughter, married the Rev Alexander Ogilvie of Cairnstown, Morayshire, the son of John Ogilvie, Esq of Cairnstown, a lineal male descendant of Ogilvie of Findlater and Deskford

The only surviving son, Francis Farquharson of Haughton, purchased the two baronies of Alford, and having only a daughter who died young, he was succeeded at his death by his nephew, Alexander Ogilvie, who assumed, upon inheriting the Haughton estate, the name and arms of Farquharson. He had two sons and two daughters, and died in 1788.

His elder son, Francis Farquharson of Haughton, died, unmarried, in 1808, and was succeeded by his brother, John Farquharson of Haughton, born in 1779, married in 1812, Mary Anne, eldest daughter of Sir Archibald Grant of Monymusk, with issue His eldest son, John Alexander Ogilvie Farquharson, was succeeded by his brother Robert, who married Mary, a daughter of Leith of Glenkindy and Freefield The dormant earldom of Findlater is claimed by this family

FENTON, a secondary title of the earl of Kellie, derived from the village of Fenton, East Lothian (see KELLIE, earl of). It is also a surname. In the Ragman Roll occurs the name of Willielmus de Fenton, as among those barons of Scotland who swore fealty to Edward I in 1296. This Sir William de Fenton, styled dominus de Beaufort, married Cecilia de Basset, daughter of one of the barons of Lovat of that name, and appears to have been of the family of the Fentons of Baky, in the barony of Ard, Inverness-shire, mentioned under the article Chisholme (see vol i. of this work, p. 640).

FENWICK, a surname derived from the parish of Fenwick, Ayrshire, so named from its situation in a fen or moss, on the water of Irvine, the Saxon word wick or wick meaning a town upon the bend of a river, as well as on the sea-coast

FERGUS, a surname derived from feargachas, wrathful, or of a fiery disposition, fearg in the Gaelic signifying anger, or wrath, and feargach, one of a bold, irascible, haughty, or imperious temper, having nearly the same meaning as the Teutonic word fierce. The conjecture that fear, a man, and ghais, (both Gaelic words,) a spear, constitute the True roots of the name, does not seem entitled to much consideration Fergus is a name of great antiquity in Scotland, the Scots having arrived and settled in Argyle from Ireland in 496, or according to some writers, in 503, under King Fergus, the founder of the Scottish monarchy Like most other son names, it is often used as a first or Christian name.

Fergus, lord of Galloway, in the 12th century the most potent feudatory subject of the Scottish crown, was a frequent witness to the charters of David I, but threw off his allegiance to David's son, Malcolm IV, and declared himself independent of the Scottish throne. Malcolm, in consequence, twice invaded his territories, and though twice repulsed and discomfited, he eventually, on a third invasion, in 1160, overpowered him, and obliged him to resign the lordship of Galloway to his sons, Uchtred and Gilbert. Fergus retired to the abbey of Holyrood, where he died of a broken heart in 1161 He was a prince of great piety, and founded, in 1142, the abbey of Dundrennan He married Elizabeth, illegitimate daughter of Henry I of England, and his descendants ranked high among the nobles of England and Scotland

FERGUSHILL, the surname of an old family, now extinct, who possessed the lands of Fergushill, Ayrshire. John Fergushill, an eminent minister of the 17th century, a life of whom was left in manuscript by Wodrow, was the son of David Fergushill, merchant and for some time provost of Ayr, and received the first part of his academical education at the university of Edinburgh, but in consequence of the plague he went for a time to France. His name occurs twice in the register of matriculations of the university of Glasgow, first in March 1605, and again in 1611 Licensed to preach about the end of 1616, he afterwards became minister of Ochiltree In March 1620 he was cited before the court of high commission at Glasgow, for nonconformity to the Perth articles. As he declined the jurisdiction of the court, he was suspended and sentenced to confinement within the town of Perth, but by the good offices of Robert Boyd of Trochrig, who was his relation, and Mr John Chalmers, the last part of his sentence was modified, and he was allowed to return to his parish, under certain restrictions. Appointed minister of Ayr, Aug 1639, in Nov 1643 he presided at the administration of the solemn league and covenant to his people. He died 11th June 1644

FERGUSON, or FERGUSSON, the surname (son of Fergus) of a Highland sept, which had its seat on the borders of the counties of Perth and Forfar, immediately to the north of Dunkeld, and the distinctive badge of which was the little sunflower In the Roll of 1587, they are named as among the septs of Mar and Athol, where their proper seat as a clan originally lay, having chiefs and captains of their own. In Galloway, the Craigdarroch Fergussons, of whom afterwards, have flourished from an early date, and in Fife the Fergusons of Raith have long held a high position as landholders.

In Ayrshire, the family of Fergusson of Kilkerran have been settled from an early period. From the loss of most of the early writings of the family, their origin and first settlement in that county has not been ascertained Robert the Bruce granted a charter to "Fergusio Fergusii filio," (Fergus the son of Fergus,) and King James the Third granted one, dated 21st April 1466, to "Fergusio Fergusson and Janetæ Kennedy," his spouse. This last is the first clear and undoubted charter of the family to be met with in the public register, and from this Fergus Fergusson, who was the son of John Fergusson of Kilkerran, is supposed to have descended, Sir John Fergusson of Kilkerran, knight, who was possessed of a large estate in the shire of Ayr, and also of property in Galloway, but having by his adherence to the interest of Charles the First, for which he was knighted, contracted large debts, and his estate being forfeited, the lands of Kilkerran were adjudged from his eldest son, Alexander, and transferred to the lord Bargeny Honourable mention is made of him in Burnet's Memoirs of the Dukes of Hamilton, as one who had firmly adhered to the king, and who had received several marks of his majesty's favour He had four sons Alexander, who succeeded his father, James and John, who were both captains in the army during the civil wars, and died unmarried, and Simon, proprietor of the lands of Auchinwin, and other parts of the estate of Kilkerran, which he acquired by adjudication led at his instance against his brother

Simon's son, John, afterwards Sir John Fergusson, acquired considerable wealth as an advocate, and with the concurrence of his cousin, Alexander Fergusson, and of John Fergusson, son of the latter, he advanced the money necessary for clearing off the adjudication of the lands held by Lord Bargeny, and Alexander, with his sons John and William, having, by a formal declaration in his favour, renounced their right to the estate, or to the reversion thereof, Sir John assumed the title of Fergusson of Kilkerran, of which family, upon the extinction of the male issue of Alexander Fergusson and his sons, his descendants became, of course, the lineal representatives. Nesbit (Heraldry, vol. i p 412) states that John, the eldest son of Alexander, the heir to Kilkerran, with his father, sold these lands to Sir John, the first baronet, in the year 1700 He also adds that he saw a separate writ, signed by Alexander, the father and the sons, John and William, by which they renounced all interest and title to the lands, and wished a happy enjoyment thereof to the said Sir John, and his, "yet still the primogeniture and right of blood, as heir male, is in the person of William Fergusson of Auchinblain," who acquired that property by marriage with the eldest daughter and coheiress of John Kennedy of Auchinblain In 1703 Sir John was created a baronet, by patent, from Queen Anne, to him and the heirs male of his body He died in 1729 By his wife, Jean, daughter of James Whiteford of Dunduff, he had two sons, the second of whom, Adam, a major in the army, died in 1770

The elder son, Sir James, second baronet, an eminent lawyer, was admitted advocate, 20th February, 1711, and elected member for the county of Sutherland in parliament, in 1734.

He was appointed a lord of session 7th November 1735, when he took the judicial title of Lord Kilkerran, and nominated a lord of justiciary, 3d April 1749 He died 20th January 1759, aged seventy-one. He collected the decisions of the court of session from 1738 to 1753, digested in the form of a dictionary, which were published by his son in 1775. Lord Woodhouselee states that he was one of the ablest lawyers of his time, and in his Life of Lord Kames (vol. i.) he gives a very high character of him By his wife, Lady Jean Maitland, only child of James, Lord Maitland, eldest son of James earl of Lauderdale, he had nine sons and five daughters, but only five of the former attained the age of manhood, namely, John, cornet in Sir John Mordaunt's dragoons, who died in the 22d year of his age, unmarried, Adam, who succeeded his father, Charles, a merchant in London, who married Anne, daughter of John Fordyce, Esq of Ayton, and was father of James, who succeeded as fourth baronet, George, a lord of session under the title of Lord Hermand, of whom afterwards, and James, who died in the island of Tobago in 1778. The youngest daughter, Helen, married Sir David Dalrymple, the celebrated Lord Hailes, senator of the college of justice, and lord of justiciary

George, already mentioned, the eighth but fourth surviving son, was admitted advocate 17th December 1765, appointed a lord of session, 11th July 1799, when he took the title of Lord Hermand, from a small estate of that name which he possessed about sixteen miles west of Edinburgh, and was constituted a lord of justiciary, 4th August, 1808. He was one of the last of the old race of Scottish advocates, and when on the bench was distinguished by his hasty temper, sarcastic remarks, and other peculiarities. He was a great favourite with the younger advocates especially, and at the convivial board, his vast store of anecdotes and amusing stories, with a vein of dry caustic humour peculiarly his own, rendered his society most fascinating He was a keen farmer, and during the vacations of the court of session, spent his time entirely in the country He was, however, a "capital lawyer," and an honest upright judge In Peter's Letters to his Kinsfolk it is stated that he was so much delighted with the picture of the life of the old Scottish lawyers in Guy Mannering, that when that novel came out, he carried it about with him, and actually read aloud a passage from it from the bench! He married Miss Graham M'Dowall, daughter of William M'Dowall of Garthland, Esq but had no issue He resigned his offices as a lord of session and justiciary in 1826, and died at Hermand 9th August 1827, upwards of eighty years of age He left the liferent of his estate of Hermand to his widow, and after her death, to her niece, the wife of Thomas Maitland, Esq., advocate, (afterwards a lord of session under the title of Lord Dundrennan,) and their second son; with special legacies to the second son of each of his other nieces, Mrs. Cockburn and Mrs. Fullerton, the wives of Lords Cockburn and Fullerton, also lords of session

The second son of the second baronet, Sir Adam, third baronet, was M P from 1774 to 1796, having sat for Ayrshire eighteen years, and for the city of Edinburgh, four On the death of the last earl of Glencairn in 1796 Sir Adam Fergusson entered a claim to the House of Lords for the titles of earl of Glencairn and Lord Kilmaurs, as lineally descended from, and heir-general to, Alexander Cunningham, created earl of Glencairn in 1488, and to Alexander, earl of Glencairn, who died in 1670, whose eldest daughter, Lady Margaret Cunningham, was the wife of John earl of Lauderdale, and mother of James Lord Maitland, Sir Adam's grandfather The judgment of the Lords was "That Sir Adam Fergusson has shown himself to be heir-general of Alexander earl of Glencairn, who died in 1670, but hath not made out the right of such heir to the dignity of earl of Glencairn." He died 23d September 1813, without issue.

His nephew, James, already mentioned, born 22d October 1765, became fourth baronet. He was twice married; first, to his cousin Jean, daughter of Sir David Dalrymple, baronet, Lord Hailes, (by Helen, his wife, daughter of Lord Kilkerran,) issue, a son, Charles Dalrymple, his successor, and two daughters, 2dly, to Henrietta, daughter of Admiral Viscount Duncan, issue, 8 sons and 5 daughters. He died 14th April 1838.

His eldest son, Sir Charles Dalrymple Fergusson, born 26th August 1800, became an advocate in 1822 He was a member of the Speculative Society, and at its meetings read two essays, one on the Origin and Progress of Criminal Jurisprudence, and another on the History of Painting. He married Helen, second daughter of Right Hon David Boyle, lord-justice-general of Scotland, issue two sons and five daughters. On the death of his aunt, Miss Christian Dalrymple of New Hailes, 9th January 1839, he succeeded her in that estate (see DALRYMPLE, Sir David, Lord Hailes), and died in 1851

His eldest son, Sir James Fergusson, born in Edinburgh 11th March 1832, became the sixth baronet. Educated at Rugby, and appointed lieutenant and captain of the grenadier guards in 1851, he was wounded at the battle of Inkermann He retired from the army in 1855, and became lieutenant of the Ayrshire yeomanry, and lieutenant-colonel Royal Ayrshire Rifles in 1858 In 1853 he was appointed a deputy-lieutenant of Ayrshire, and was M P for that county from Dec. 1854 to April 1857, re-elected in Oct. 1859 He married Lady Edith Christian, 2d daughter of 1st Marquis of Dalhousie.

In Ayrshire were also the Fergussons of Monkwood. John Fergusson of Doonholm, one of the most enterprising British merchants of his day in Calcutta, where he established an extensive mercantile house, which long continued to perpetuate his name, left the following bequests, namely one thousand pounds, the interest of which to be divided yearly between the two ministers of Ayr, and the same sum for behoof of the public teachers of that town, which formed the germ of the fund for the formation of the Ayr Academy established in 1798, also one thousand pounds for the behoof of the poor of Ayr His descendant, James Fergusson of Monkwood, born in 1769, passed advocate in 1791, was a member of the Speculative Society, and became one of the principal clerks of the court of session In 1817 he published 'Reports of Decisions by the Consistorial Court of Scotland in Actions of Divorce,' having been previously a judge in that court; and in 1829, 'A Treatise on the present state of the Consistorial Law in Scotland, with Reports of Decided Cases.' He died in 1842

The Fergussons of Craigdarroch are of old standing in the parish of Glencairn, Dumfries-shire, and several families derive their origin from them Burns celebrates them as "A line that have struggled for freedom with Bruce."

According to an account of the family inserted in the Appendix to Nisbet's Heraldry (vol ii. p 97), the first charter that is extant among the family muniments was granted by John of Crawford, son of the laird of Dalgarnock, to John Fergusson "dominus de Craigdarroch," his cousin, "pro suo consilio et auxilio," of the mill of Balmacannie in Jedburgh, barony of Glencairn, Dumfries-shire. This charter is without a date, but is supposed, from the names of the witnesses, to have been executed in the early half of the fourteenth century

From John Fergusson of Craigdarroch who, in 1484, was infeft as son and heir of Matthew Fergusson of Craigdarroch, lineally descended Alexander Fergusson of Craigdarroch, chosen M P in 1717, who married Anne, daughter of Sir Robert Lawrie of Maxwelton, and had, with a daughter, Jean, married in 1731 to Robert Riddell Esq of Glenriddell, two sons, James and Robert, from one of whom descended Alexander Fergusson, Esq of Craigdarroch, an eminent advocate, "so famous for wit, worth, and law," the hero of Burns' ballad of 'The Whistle.'

His eldest son, the Right Hon Robert Cutlar Fergusson of Craigdarroch, celebrated as an accomplished lawyer and scholar, was born in 1768 Besides his own family he was the representative also of the old and honourable family of the Cutlars of Orroland in the stewartry of Kirkcudbright. One of his ancestors was among the first that signed the solemn league and covenant, another headed a small handful of men, who, in 1651, defeated a portion of Cromwell's army at Glencairn, and another fell at the battle of Killiecrankie.

Mr Fergusson received a liberal education and early gave proofs of future eminence. Mrs Riddell of Glenriddell, writing to Mr William Smellie, the celebrated naturalist, in 1793, thus mentions him:—"Craigdarroch has a source of happiness and comfort few parents can boast of, in his eldest son, who seems everything that is elegant and accomplished" From some hints contained in the same letter and others to be found in 'Kerr's Life of Smellie,' it appears that young Fergusson was an admirer of the writings of Mirabeau and the French Jacobins His political opinions being liberal in the extreme, he became a member of "the friends of the people," and connected himself with Lord Daer and the other parliamentary reformers of that period. So early as 1792 he had published a pamphlet entitled 'The proposed Reform in the Representation of the Counties of Scotland considered'

With the intention of studying the English law, Mr Fergusson entered at Lincoln's Inn, and was called to the bar in July 1797 Being connected with Arthur O'Connor and others, who were apprehended when going to France with O'Coighly, he was in the court at Maidstone during their trial for high treason, and an attempt having been made to assist O'Connor in his escape, the earl of Thanet and Mr Fergusson were charged with joining in the rescue, for which they were tried, and being found guilty, were sentenced to twelve months' imprisonment, his lordship in the Tower of London, and Mr Fergusson in the King's Bench prison On this occasion he published Proceedings against the Earl of Thanet, Robert Fergusson, Esq, and others, upon an information, ex officio, for a Riot, to which are added Observations on his own case,' 1799, 8vo

Mr Fergusson afterwards proceeded to Calcutta, and commenced there the practice of his profession His success was so great that he was soon regarded as at the head of that bar, and he acted for some time as attorney-general After a brilliant career of about twenty years, he returned to his native country with a liberal fortune, and at the general election in 1826, was chosen member of parliament for the stewartry of Kirkcudbright, which he continued to represent till his death In 1834 he was appointed judge-advocate-general, and sworn a privy councillor on the 16th of July He resigned this office on Sir Robert Peel being nominated prime minister, but was re-installed on the return of Lord Melbourne to power Late in life he married a French lady, named De Beauchamp, by whom he had two children He died November 16, 1838, and was succeeded by his son, Robert Fergusson, Esq of Craigdarroch and Orroland.

A family of the name of Fergusson possessed the estate of Auchtererne in Cromar, from the time of David the Second to that of James the Fifth, when it seems to have become extinct. Another family of the name possessed the lands of Badiforrow, near Inverury, in the sixteenth century, and afterwards acquired the estate of Pitfour, in the parish of Old Deer One of the later members of this family, James Fergusson of Pitfour, was distinguished, in his day, by his agricultural improvements, planting, &c., and was the first to introduce the alternate system of husbandry on his estates.

A family of the same name possess the lands of Kinmundy, in the same county The ancestor of this branch of the name is said to have settled in Aberdeenshire about the year 1690

The family of Ferguson of Raith in Fife is also an ancient one They have possessed that estate since the death of the first earl of Melville, to whom it belonged, in 1707 The uncle of the present representative of the family, Robert Ferguson, Esq of Raith, M P for the Kirkcaldy district of burghs, and lord-lieutenant of the county of Fife, was the eldest son of William Ferguson, Esq, by Jane, daughter of Ronald Crawford of Restalrig, and sister of Margaret, countess of Dumfries. He was elected in 1806 for Fifeshire, and in 1831 was returned for the Kirkcaldy district of burghs. In 1835 he was chosen for Haddingtonshire, but at the general election of 1837 he was defeated by Lord Ramsay, and again returned for Kirkcaldy He was a cordial supporter of the measures of the Whig government, and died 3d December 1840 He married Mary, only child and heiress of William Hamilton Nisbet, Esq of Dirleton, who had previously been countess of Elgin (see ante, p 128 of this volume), but had no children by her

His brother, General Sir Ronald Crawford Ferguson, colonel of the 79th regiment, and M P for Nottingham, succeeded him, but died 10th April 1841, aged 68. He was born at Raith House in 1773, and entered the army at the age of seventeen as an ensign in the 53d foot, and in 1793, with the rank of captain, accompanied his regiment to Flanders. With the 14th and 37th regiments it was formed into a brigade, commanded by Sir Ralph Abercromby, which served at Valenciennes and Dunkirk In the course of this campaign Captain Ferguson received a severe wound in the knee. In 1794 he became major in the 84th foot. Upon a second battalion being raised, he was appointed lieutenant-colonel of that regiment, and was employed in the reduction of the Cape of Good Hope. In 1800 he attained the rank of colonel and was employed in the expedition under Brigadier-general Maitland, destined to attack various ports on the French coast. In 1804 he was appointed brigadier general, with the command of the York district, and at the conclusion of 1805 he was appointed to the command of the Highland brigade, consisting of the 71st, 72d, and 93d regiments, in the expedition under Major-general Sir David Baird, for the recapture of the Cape of Good Hope. On the surrender of Cape Town, 10th February 1806, ill health obliged him to return to England. In 1808, with the rank of major-general, he was appointed to the command of a brigade under Sir Arthur Wellesley, (afterwards duke of Wellington,) who, in his despatches relating to the battles of Roleia and Vimiera, fully detailed the operations of the troops under Major general Ferguson and dwelt with high commendation on the conduct of their commander After the convention of Cintra he returned to England, and was examined by the court of Inquiry appointed on that business. He was presented with an honorary medal by his majesty for his distinguished conduct, and included in a vote of thanks which both houses of parliament bestowed upon the gallant officers engaged at Roliça and Vimiera. On 25th January 1809, he was appointed colonel of the Sicilian regiment, and in the same year was nominated to a command in the army under Sir David Baird, but he did not arrive at Corunna until the British troops had quitted that place. In the following year he was appointed second in command at Cadiz, but in a few months the return of a liver complaint, to which he was subject, rendered it necessary for him to resign his command and repair to England. On 4th June 1813, he received the rank of lieutenant-general, and in 1814 he was appointed second in command of the troops in Holland. At the enlargement of the order of the Bath in 1815, he was nominated a knight commander, and subsequently a grand cross. He attained the full rank of general 22d July 1830 He first sat in parliament for the Kirkcaldy burghs, and subsequently for Nottingham

Sir Ronald's son, Robert Ferguson, Esq, born in 1802, succeeded to the estate of Raith, and in January 1841 became M P for the Kirkcaldy burghs. He married in 1859, Emma, daughter of James Henry Mandeville, Esq

FERGUSON, DAVID, one of the early ministers of the Church of Scotland, supposed to have been descended from a respectable family of that surname in Ayrshire, was born about 1532, and received his education in the university of Glasgow In 1559, he was one of the reformed teachers, and appears first to have been settled at Carnock, but in July 1560 the committee of parliament, when distributing ministers to the chief places in the kingdom, allotted Mr Ferguson to the town of Dunfermline He was moderator of the Assembly which met at Edinburgh on the 6th of March 1573, and again on the 24th October 1578, and was usually afterwards, for many years, chosen one of the assessors to the moderator, to prepare matters to be treated in the Assembly He took a prominent part in all the ecclesiastical proceedings of the period, and was one of the ministers who were with the regent Morton previous to his execution, June 2, 1581 On that occasion, with two of his brethren, he was sent to the king at Holyroodhouse, to report to him the exact truth of Morton's confession In 1582 he was appointed by the Assembly, commissioner for the west end of Fife, to plant ministers and establish churches in that district, and was often one of the ministers sent to wait upon the king on the affairs of the church In July 1583, when Mr Robert Pont, Mr Robert Lindsay, and Mr John Davidson were directed, by the presbytery of Edinburgh, to go to the king at Falkland, and admonish him to beware of innovations at court, &c., they were accompanied thither by Mr. Ferguson On being admitted to the king's cabinet, his majesty asked "where were all their admonitions that time twelvemonth?" Mr Ferguson replied, "If it were not for love of your grace, we could have found another place to have spoken our minds than here," which saying made the king 'to shrink in his face' Mr Ferguson then merrily said, "Sir, I would there were not a surname in Scotland, for they make all the cummer" The king answered, "And so would I." "No, Sir," he continued in the same strain, "if you go to surnames with it, I will reckon with the best of you in antiquity, for King Fergus was the first king in Scotland, and I am Fergus-son, but, always, because, Sir, you are an honest man, and hath the possession, I will give you my right," which put the king in a good humour, and he exclaimed, "See, will you hear him!" He afterwards said, "There was no king in Europe would have suffered the things that he had suffered," to which Mr Ferguson answered, "I would not have you like any other king in Europe What are they all but murderers of the saints of God? the king of France especially, but you have been otherwise brought up" "I am catholic king of Scotland," said the king, "and may choose any that I like best to be company with me, and I like them best that are with me for the present" Some of the ministers were not well pleased with this speech Mr Ferguson, addressing them, said, "No, brethren, he is universal king, and may make choice of his company, as David did, in the 110th Psalm" He had previously told the king that he had seen his version in metre of that psalm, and, commending it highly, he exhorted him that, as he had acquainted himself especially with it, so he should follow David's example On Mr Davidson making some severe remarks to the king, Mr Ferguson, fearing that he was going too far, said to his majesty, "There was no wisdom in keeping the murderers that slew his 'goodschir' and father, or their posterity, about him" He subsequently directed his speech to Colonel Stewart, (created earl of Arran,) the king's favourite at that time, and exhorted him to beware what counsel he gave to the king, "for, assure yourself," said he, "if you counsel him to place and displace the nobility as you please, they will not bear it at your hands, who is but a mean man." The colonel, we are told, stormed at the first, but was soon glad to cool down After some fair speeches, they took their leave, the king laying his hands upon every one of them [Calderwood's Hist of the Kirk of Scotland, vol iii p 717 and App vol viii pp 247, 248] In the following month he and six other ministers were cited by the king to attend a convention at St Andrews, when they appeared and gave in a paper, in answer to certain allegations made against them, but nothing of importance was done, except the issuing of a new proclamation against those engaged in the Raid of Ruthven

On the renewal of the covenant in the synod of Fife, 12th May 1596, after an exhortation and address by the moderator, Mr Ferguson "spoke," says Melville, "very pleasantly and comfortably" of the beginning and success of the reformation in Scotland, when the ministers were few in number, only six, whereof he was one, but they went mightily forward in the work, without fear or care of the world, and prevailed, when there was no mention of stipend, and the authorities, both ecclesiastical and civil, opposed themselves, and scarcely a man of name or reputation gave the cause their support, but now it had fallen to that, that the fear or flattery of men, care of getting, or fear of losing stipend and means of life, had weakened the hearts of a multitude of ministers, and others He concluded by joining to his remarks an exhortation suitable to the occasion [Melville's Diary, p 236]

At the meeting of the synod of Fife in February 1597, Mr Ferguson, the oldest minister at that time in Scotland, spoke 'gravely, clearly, and at length,' against the bishops, showing how that the corruptions of that office had been espied by the Church of Scotland from the beginning, and what pains had been taken both in doctrine from the pulpits and in assemblies, for purging and altogether putting away thereof, but now he perceived a design of erecting them again, conveyed in such a manner as he could compare to nothing better than that which the Greeks used for the overthrow of the ancient city and kingdom of Troy, busking up a brave horse, and by a crafty Sinon persuading them to pluck down the walls with their own hands, to receive that in for their honour and welfare, which served for their utter wreck and destruction Therefore, he would, with the brethren who had given good warning, cry, 'Equo ne credite Teucri!' [Ibid p 289]

Mr Ferguson died the following year (1598) Three years before, his daughter Grizel was married to Mr John Row, minister of Carnock, one of the sons of Mr John Row, the eminent reformer In all the church histories, Mr Ferguson is spoken of in the most respectful terms Spottiswood says of him that "he was jocund and pleasant in his disposition, which made him well regarded in court and country," and that "he was a wise man and a good preacher" Some of what were called his "wise and merry sayings," which he directed against the prelates, whom he always opposed, have been recorded It is supposed that he was the person who first applied the ludicrous name of 'Tulchan bishops' to those ministers who accepted of bishoprics, the revenues of which were chiefly enjoyed by the nobles and great barons A tulchan in the old Scottish language means a calf's skin, stuffed with straw, set up beside a cow, to make her yield her milk While the new order of bishops, established in 1572, nominally held the benefices, the greater part of the revenues were drawn by some nobleman or another, and thus the term was a very appropriate one

Mr Ferguson began a History of the Church of Scotland, which was continued by his son-in-law, the minister at Carnock, whose son, Mr John Row, principal of King's college, Old Aberdeen, enlarged it with additional information The work bears the name of Row's manuscript, and consists chiefly of an abridgment of the acts of the General Assembly A collection of Scots Proverbs, published at Edinburgh, shortly after his death, were said to have been collected by the minister of Dunfermline, who both in speaking and preaching, used to talk proverbs, and there is no doubt that we owe to him many of those colloquial sayings which have long, in Scotland at least, been "familiar as household words"

FERGUSON, ROBERT, styled "The Plotter," a famous Independent preacher and political intriguer, was born in Scotland about 1638. It is stated in some of the accounts regarding him that he at one time held a benefice in the county of Kent, from which he was ejected in 1662 for nonconformity He afterwards taught an academy at Islington, in the neighbourhood of London, and preached at a chapel in Moorfields. His intriguing disposition, restless and unprincipled character, and great influence as a popular preacher in the city, recommended him to the earl of Shaftesbury as a fit person to engage in the plans then in agitation against the government His chapel was crowded by fanatics, whom he fired by his political sermons, and occasionally excited by libels and pamphlets, printed from a private press of which he had the management His style was of that diffuse, coarse, and periphrastic nature, which is most suited to the mob Among other pamphlets he wrote an 'Appeal from the Country to the City,' in which he plainly pointed out the duke of Monmouth as successor to the crown

In the Ryehouse plot, and particularly with regard to the ten thousand London boys whom Shaftesbury was to head, Ferguson acted a prominent part, and was intrusted with the secret of that statesman's place of retirement in the neighbourhood of Wapping, while it was concealed from Russell and Monmouth In the proclamation, dated August 2 1683, issued for apprehending the conspirators, he is thus described "Robert Ferguson, a tall lean man, dark brown hair, a great Roman nose, thin-jawed, heat in his face, speaks in the Scotch tone, a sharp piercing eye, stoops a little in the shoulders He has a shuffling gait that differs from all men, wears his periwig down almost over his eyes, about 45 or 46 years old" When Shaftesbury left England, Ferguson was one of the companions of his flight He soon, however, returned from Holland, and engaged in a new conspiracy for assassinating the king and the duke of York, on their return from Newmarket' As treasurer of those involved in it, he paid for the arms, and by his daring language encouraged them to the enterprise, offering, in mockery, to consecrate the blunderbuss which was to be fired into the carriage When the plot was discovered, he took leave of his associates with so much gaiety that he was suspected of having correspondence with the Government

Ferguson now retired a second time to Holland, where he joined the unfortunate Monmouth, and drew up the declaration issued on his landing. He earnestly entreated Monmouth to assume the title of king, and at their last interview, the duke informed his uncle that Ferguson had been the chief instigator of the whole affair Ferguson was taken the third day after the battle of Sedgemoor, and James freely pardoned and dismissed him, when he returned to Holland, and took an active part in the intrigues which preceded the Revolution He secured the support of the Dissenters for the prince of Orange, and endeavoured to press upon William a due sense of the importance of that section of the people After the Revolution, he was rewarded with the post of housekeeper to the Excise Office, worth five hundred pounds a-year But he was only in his element when engaged in "treasons, stratagems, and spoils," and having taken an active share in all the cabals which had for their object the expulsion of James from the throne, he now joined with the same zeal in endeavouring to get him restored to it In 1689 he became deeply engaged with Sir James Montgomery and the other presbyterians, who, discontented with King William, had united with the Jacobites The marquis of Annandale having absconded, Ferguson secreted him for several weeks, a kindness which the marquis repaid by betraying him to the Government With his usual good fortune, he was dismissed without trial or punishment, yet still continued to show himself worthy of the title of "the Plotter," by engaging in every new conspiracy, and every year published one or two political pamphlets, the last being an attack upon Trenchard, the secretary of state, for the use of blank and general warrants What was perhaps the most remarkable feature in the character of this extraordinary individual was, that although he was an active agent in all the plots of that period, and was intrusted with the secrets of all parties, he never betrayed any of his associates He died in 1714 His publications are

FERGUSON, WILLIAM, a painter of some eminence, who flourished in the seventeenth century, was a native of Scotland, and after learning the rudiments of his art in his native country, travelled to Italy and France He excelled in painting dead fowls, particularly pigeons and partridges, and other subjects of still life He died about 1690

FERGUSON, JAMES, an eminent self-taught experimental philosopher, mechanist, and astronomer, was born of poor parents in the neighbourhood of Keith in Banffshire, in 1710 He learned to read by hearing his father teach his elder brother the Catechism, and very early discovered a peculiar taste for mechanics, which first arose on seeing his father use a lever in mending a part of the roof of the house which had become decayed He afterwards made a watch in wood-work, on being once shown the inside of one When very young he was employed by a neighbouring farmer to tend his sheep, in which situation he acquired a knowledge of the stars, and constructed a celestial globe By another self-informed genius, one Alexander Cantley, butler to Thomas Grant, Esq of Achoynamey, he was taught decimal arithmetic, algebra, and the elements of geometry His extraordinary ingenuity introduced him to Sir James Dunbar of Durn, and some of the neighbouring gentlemen, who assisted him by their countenance and advice, and having learned to draw, he soon began to take portraits in miniature with Indian ink, by which employment he supported himself and family (for he had married in May 1739) for several years, at first in Edinburgh, and afterwards in London It appears that having acquired, during his first residence in Edinburgh, some knowledge of anatomy, surgery, and physic, he endeavoured to establish himself as a doctor in that part of the country where his father lived, but to his mortification he found that all his medical theories were of little use in practice, and he soon relinquished the attempt

In 1740 he invented his Astronomical Rotula for showing the new moons and eclipses, and having got the plates engraved, he published it, and this ingenious invention sold very well till 1752, when the change in the style rendered it useless In 1743 he went to London, where he published some Astronomical Tables and Calculations, and afterwards delivered public lectures in experimental philosophy, which were very successful He was the author of various other works in astronomy, mechanics, &c, a list of which is subjoined But his greatest work is his 'Astronomy explained upon Sir Isaac Newton's Principles, and made easy to those who have not studied mathematics' His delineation of the complex line of the moon's motion procured him, in 1763, the honour of being elected a Fellow of the Royal Society of London, without the payment of the usual fees His dissertations and inventions in mechanics and other branches of the mathematics introduced him to the notice and favour of George the Third, who, when prince of Wales, attended his lectures, and on his accession to the throne, conferred on him a pension of fifty pounds a-year Subjoined is his portrait

Mr Ferguson died November 16, 1776 By occasional presents, which were privately sent to him, under the belief that he was very poor, as well as by his own frugality and prudence, he had saved money to the amount of six thousand pounds. His works are

FERGUSON, ADAM, LL D, an eminent historian and moral philosopher, was born, in 1724, at Logierait, Perthshire, of which parish his father was minister He was the youngest of a numerous family of children, by a lady who was a native of Aberdeenshire He was educated at the school of Perth, from whence he removed, in October 1739, to the university of St Andrews, and after obtaining his degree of M A he went to Edinburgh to attend the divinity class The Scottish capital, at this period, seemed justly to merit the appellation, subsequently bestowed by Dr Johnson, of "a hot-bed of genius," and soon after his arrival young Ferguson became a member of a philosophical society, which numbered among its members Dr Robertson, Dr Blair, Mr John Home, the author of 'Douglas,' Mr Alexander Carlyle, and other distinguished names By the influence of Mr Murray, brother to the celebrated Lord Elibank, Mr Ferguson obtained the situation of chaplain to the 42d regiment, with which he served in Flanders till the peace of Aix-la-Chapelle, when he returned home on leave of absence In 1757 he resigned his chaplaincy, and soon after became tutor in the family of the earl of Bute, in which situation he continued for two years

In 1759 he was appointed professor of natural philosophy in the university of Edinburgh, which chair he resigned, in 1764, for that of moral philosophy In 1767 he published his 'Essay on Civil Society,' a work which contributed not a little to raise him in public estimation, and the university accordingly hastened to confer on him the degree of LL D Soon after this he married a Miss Burnet, the niece of Dr Black In 1778 he accompanied the late earl of Chesterfield in his travels on the Continent. After an absence of a year and a half he resumed his former occupations, the chair of moral philosophy having been, in the meantime, filled by Dugald Stewart

In 1778, through the influence of his friend, Mr Henry Dundas, afterwards Lord Melville, he was appointed secretary to the commissioners sent out to America, to endeavour to effect a reconciliation with the revolted colonies, and accordingly accompanied them to Philadelphia, but the mission, as might have been expected, proved a failure On his return, Dr Ferguson resumed the duties of his professorship, and proceeded with the preparation of his 'History of the Progress and Termination of the Roman Republic,' on which he had been engaged before going to America In 1785 he resigned the chair of moral philosophy in favour of Mr Dugald Stewart, while he himself was permitted to retire on the salary of the mathematical class The subjoined woodcut is from a portrait by Reynolds

Being now in the enjoyment of good health and a competent fortune, he again visited the Continent, with the intention of proceeding to Rome, but was prevented by the events of the first French Revolution On his return he settled at St. Andrews, where he died, February 22, 1816, at the patriarchal age of ninety-three, leaving three sons and three daughters He was the last of the great men of the preceding century whose writings did honour to their age and to their native country His works are

FERGUSSON, Robert, a poet of considerable merit, was born at Edinburgh, September 5, 1750, the third son of William Fergusson, who came originally from Tarland, Aberdeenshire, and Elizabeth, his wife, youngest daughter of John Forbes, tacksman of Templeton, Hillockhead, and Wellhead in the same county, a cadet of the family of Tolquhon His father was first a clerk to a haberdasher, afterwards to a company of upholsterers, subsequently to a namesake, a writer to the signet, and ultimately he became managing clerk in the linen department of the British Linen Company, now one of the wealthiest banking establishments in Scotland After being for about six months at the school of a Mr Philp, a teacher of English in Niddry's Wynd, of his native city, the poet was removed to the High School, in 1756, where he remained for four years, his attendance being occasionally interrupted by ill health While yet a mere child, he took great delight in reading the Bible, and as a proof of the impression which at this period its precepts made on his susceptible mind, one of his biographers (Peterkin) relates that one day, after perusing a portion of the Proverbs, he entered his mother's apartment in tears, calling on her to "whip him" On his mother asking him why? he answered, "O mother! he that spareth the rod, hateth the child" Through the influence of the earl of Findlater, then chancellor of Scotland, to whom his uncle, Mr John Forbes, was factor, a presentation was procured for him by his father, to a bursary, (or exhibition, as it is called in England,) of the Rev David Fergusson of Strathmartine, which provided for "the maintenance and education of two poor male children," of the name of Fergusson, at the Grammar school of Dundee and the college of St Andrews, and he was accordingly removed in 1762 to Dundee, at the school of which town he remained for two years At the age of fourteen he was transferred, in terms of the bursary, to the university of St. Andrews, and entered in the united colleges of St Salvator and St Leonard, with an allowance of ten pounds sterling yearly He was originally intended for the church, and on matriculating in February 1765, he became a student in the Latin and Greek classes, but although his attainments were respectable, he had no great predilection for the classics Possessing an inexhaustible fund of wit and good nature, with a natural talent for mimicry, he indulged, whilst at college, in many youthful frolics, one of which caused him to be "extruded" for four days, (not "formally expelled," as inconsiderately stated by one of his biographers) from the university From his excellent voice, he was required frequently to officiate as precentor in the college chapel, and to get rid of this to him distasteful employment, he had given up the name of a person to be prayed for, in the following very indecorous terms "Remember in prayer, a young man (then present) of whom, from the sudden effects of inebriety, there appears but small hope of recovery" He had also taken part in a riot It was while at college that he first began to rhyme, and 'certain Macaronic satires against some of the masters' were early ascribed to him His biographers generally have agreed that none of the college productions of his muse are among his published pieces The author, however, of his life prefixed to the edition of his poems published by A Fullarton and Co in 1851, thinks the 'Elegy on the death of Dr Gregory' one of these early pieces, written when Fergusson had not attained his fifteenth year, and he has accordingly placed it first in the poems His superior abilities, playful disposition, and turn for poetry, recommended him to the favour of Dr Wilkie, author of the 'Epigoniad,' then professor of natural philosophy at St. Andrews, who occasionally employed him to transcribe his lectures While at the university, it seems, that mathematics was his favourite study, and he had made considerable progress in natural philosophy

At the close of the session 1767-8, his bursary course being concluded, Fergusson left St Andrews, and his father having died the previous year, he returned to his 'widowed mother in Edinburgh' He had abandoned the design of becoming a minister, and after some time spent at home undecided what to do, he paid a visit early in 1769 to his uncle (a brother of his mother), Mr John Forbes, at Round Lichnot, near Aberdeen, who was in good circumstances, in the hope of procuring some employment through his influence He had previously during a college vacation spent several weeks with him, and he now, in consequence of a renewed invitation, remained with him six months Much unmerited obloquy has been thrown by Fergusson's biographers on this uncle for his treatment of the poet According to Dr Irving, who seems to have received very incorrect information on the subject, his clothes beginning to assume a shabby appearance, he received a hint that he was no longer considered a proper guest at his uncle's table, on which, in a highly indignant mood, he retired to a public-house in the neighbourhood, and wrote a letter of remonstrance to his relative, which induced the latter to send him a few shillings to assist him on his return to Edinburgh, which journey he performed on foot The author (A B G) of the Life of Fergusson published in 1851, deriving his information from Mr John Forbes, writer, Old Meldrum, grandson of the poet's uncle, gives the following account of the real circumstances attending the departure of the poet from his uncle's house, on the occasion in question "The earl of Findlater, having occasion to travel north to Mr Forbes' residence wrote to him that he intended to pass his house on a given day and that he should dine with him Mr Forbes, in consequence, invited Keith Urquhart, Esq, of Meldrum, his nearest employer, to meet his lordship, and on the day appointed he instructed Fergusson to dress himself, and to be in waiting to come into the dining-room, along with his own sons, one of whom was the father of the present Mr Forbes, and my narrator, when he should send for them after dinner, as he was very desirous to introduce his nephew to his guests, who might, from their high station and influence, materially forward his future prospects Fergusson timeously appeared in his 'best suit,' but finding the intervening hours hang heavily on his hands, he proceeded to the Wood of Lichnot at about a quarter of a mile's distance, and there consumed the time in climbing trees and swinging on the branches He returned in the nick of time to answer the summons to the dining-room, but without having had leisure either to brush the 'green' and soil from his clothes, or to get some unseemly 'rents' repaired Seeing him appear in such a sorry plight, Mr Forbes was greatly irritated, and from his disreputable appearance, to a certain extent lost his 'temper,' and sharply ordered Fergusson out of the room On the party rising from table some hours afterwards, it was found that the poet had disappeared On inquiry being made, a servant remembered seeing him, 'with a bundle under his arm,' on the road which led to Aberdeen His uncle at once surmising, from his peculiarly sensitive nature, that he had 'left,' despatched a messenger on horseback after him, to 'entreat his return,' or, at all events, his acceptance of the means to carry him comfortably to Edinburgh, which he sent with the servant The messenger overtook him, a dozen of miles or so on his journey, but he peremptorily declined coming back, nor would he accept the proffered supplies" It is farther stated that no inn or public-house existed within miles of Round Lichnot, and no letter of remonstrance or otherwise from Fergusson was ever received by Mr Forbes "As a proof," continues the biographer, "that the mother of the poet entertained no ill feeling against her brother for the (apocryphal) ungenerous treatment of her son, it may be mentioned that, after his death, she was accustomed to visit the north, when she invariably resided with her brother at Forresterhill." He relates, on the authority of his informant above mentioned that while at Round Lichnot, the poet was accustomed to assemble the servants who had been detained from public worship on the Sabbaths, and, taking his stand at the mouth of the peat-stack, he would address them for more than an hour at a time, in language so eloquent and fervid, that Mr Forbes (the uncle) distinctly remembered to have often seen them bathed in tears [Life, 1851, p lxxi]

Shortly after his return to Edinburgh he obtained an inferior situation in the commissary clerk's office, his sole occupation being the copying of law papers at so much per page This he soon relinquished, and, after some months' idleness, he accepted a similar situation in the office of the sheriff-clerk, where he continued for the remainder of his life Before he had reached his twentieth year, many of his poems had made their appearance in Ruddiman's 'Weekly Magazine' The great merit of his productions soon began to be acknowledged, he became a knight or member of the famous "Cape club," and as his powers of song and convivial qualities rendered him at all times an attractive companion, his society was eagerly sought after, and he was thus led into habits of excess and dissipation, which impaired his feeble constitution, and brought on, first, religious melancholy, and ultimately insanity Having experienced a temporary relief from this dreadful malady, he resumed his visits to his friends, but had one night the misfortune to fall down a stair, when he received a severe contusion on the head He was carried home insensible, but at length in his delirium became so outrageous, that it was not without difficulty that the united force of several men could restrain his violence The humble circumstances of his mother compelled her to remove him to the public lunatic asylum, or Bedlam Two of his most intimate friends called and induced him to go into a sedan-chair, as if he had been about to make an evening visit When they reached the place of their destination, and stopped within the porch, the poor youth discovered instantaneously the deception He looked with a strange, wild, questioning glance all around and with choking agony raised such a piteous and fearful cry as never departed from the memory of those who accompanied him He was restless and desperate the whole of the first night, but in the morning when his mother and sister visited him he was calm and resigned He had at first imagined himself a king, and had placed on his head a crown of straw neatly plaited with his own hands. This delusion, however, had vanished He thanked his mother and sister for their kindness He reminded them of his presentiment of the calamity that was now upon him He entreated his sister to bring her 'seam' and sit beside him To all which they could only reply with tears He checked their grief, told them he was well cared for, and expressed a hope that he should soon be restored to them At other times, however, he was greatly and painfully excited, exclaiming that he 'should be a minister of the glorious gospel,' that they 'should all see him a burning and a shining light.' Frequently too he would sing with a beauty and pathos and tremulous tenderness the 'Birks of Invermay,' and other favourite Scottish melodies, such as before he had never reached At the end of two months he died in the asylum, October 16, 1774, aged only twenty-four The circumstances of his death are peculiarly touching "The evening was chilly and damp His feet felt very cold He asked his mother to gather up the bed-clothes and sit upon them She did so He looked wistfully at his mother, and said, 'Oh! mother, this is kind indeed' but again he complained that his feet were 'cold, cold' When they prepared to leave he entreated them to remain 'O do not go, mother, yet,—do not leave me' It was the time however for 'shutting up' They parted And in the silence of that night, and alone, he died"

He was buried in the Canongate churchyard, and his grave remained without a stone to tell the place, till the kindred spirit of Robert Burns led him, in 1787, to erect one at his own expense, with the following inscription

"No sculptur'd marble here, nor pompous lay,
No storied urn, nor animated bust!
This simple stone directs pale Scotia's way,
To pour her sorrows o'er her poet's dust."

One of Fergusson's early associates of the name of Burnet, belonging, it is understood, to the Burnets of Kemnay, having prospered in the East Indies, had sent a pressing invitation to Fergusson to go out to India, enclosing a draught of a hundred pounds to defray the expenses of his outfit, but it arrived a few days after the poet's death The relatives in Scotland of the generous donor ordered the amount to be retained by his afflicted mother

The first edition of Fergusson's Poems, being a collection of such pieces as had appeared in the 'Weekly Magazine,' with the addition of a few others, was published in 1773, the year before his death, and they have often been reprinted. It is gratifying to know that the belief that Fergusson never reaped any pecuniary benefit from his poems, is not founded in fact According to a statement made by Miss Ruddiman to his biographer of 1851, for his contributions to the 'Weekly Magazine' the poet received from the proprietors thereof, W and T Ruddiman, "not large but regular payment, and two suits of clothes, an everyday and Sabbath suit every year" Moreover, his volume of 1773 was published by a subscription obtained the previous year, and "he sold upwards of five hundred copies, many of them at an advanced price He had a balance remaining of at least £50, a sum which was to him a little fortune" [Life of 1851, p lxxxv] An edition of his poems published at Glasgow in 1800, contains an account of his life by Dr Irving A Life by Peterkin is also prefixed to the London edition of his Poems, which appeared in 1807

Fergusson is represented by all his biographers as being of a humane and amiable disposition To the most sprightly fancy, we are told, he joined the more engaging qualities of modesty, a gentle temper, and the greatest goodness of heart, and such was the benevolence of his disposition that he would often bestow the last farthing upon those who solicited his charity His poems are admired by all who are capable of appreciating true poetry, and he is justly considered the third of Scotland's national poets, Burns and Ramsay only being classed before him

Of his personal appearance, Sommers, one of his biographers, who knew him personally, has left the following account —He was about five feet six inches high, and well-shaped His complexion fair, but rather pale His eyes full, black, and piercing His nose long, his lips thin, his teeth well set and white. His neck long, and well proportioned. His shoulders narrow, and his limbs long, but more sinewy than fleshy His voice strong, clear, and melodious Remarkably fond of old Scots songs, and the best singer of the 'Birks of Invermay' I ever heard. When speaking, he was quick, forcible, and complaisant In walking he appeared smart, erect, and unaffected "Fergusson's manners," says the author of the Life prefixed to his Works published in 1857, "were always accommodated to the moment he was gay, serious, set the table in a roar, charmed with his powers of song, or bore with becoming dignity his part in learned or philosophical disquisition" "In short, he had united," remarks Alexander Campbell (Life, p 300), "the sprightliness and innocence of a child, with the knowledge of a profound and judicious thinker"

The poet had a brother, Henry, who was at one time a teacher of fencing and sword exercise in Edinburgh His class book, entitled, 'A Dictionary, explaining the terms, guards, and positions, used in the art of the small sword By Hary Fergusson,' was 'Printed [at Edinburgh] in the year MDCCLXVII Tract, pp 23,' with the motto,

"Ah me! what perils do environ,
The man who meddles with cold iron"

Not meeting, it appears, with anything like adequate success as a teacher, he became a sailor, and served as master-at-arms on board the Tartar man-of-war, on the breaking out of hostilities with America He procured his discharge from the Tartar on 12th Feb 1776, and it is believed that he settled in America, where he is supposed to have died One sister, Barbara, was married to Mr David Inverarity, cabinetmaker, Edinburgh, whose son was father of Miss Inverarity, afterwards Mrs Martyn, a vocalist of some eminence in her day, who died at Newcastle in 1846, and was considered to bear a striking resemblance to her unfortunate grand-uncle Margaret, another sister of the poet, married a Mr Alexander Duval, purser in the navy She also had a taste for poetry

FERME, or Fairholme, Charles, a learned divine of the sixteenth century, and author of the Analytical Commentary on the Epistle to the Romans, was born and educated in Edinburgh Crawford, in his History of the University of Edinburgh, says that he was of obscure parentage, and was bred up in the family of Mr Alexander Guthrie. After he had acquired a knowledge of Latin, he was about the year 1584 transferred to the university, then recently opened under the auspices of the celebrated Robert Rollock, where he continued for four years In 1587, after studying Greek, logic, philosophy, and Hebrew, he took his degree of M A, and in October following he offered himself as a candidate for the office of regent or professor, but although on this occasion without success, early in 1589 he was, after a comparative trial, elected professor of theology in the room of Rollock, who had been appointed principal He was also occasionally employed in preaching, and at one time was invited to be second minister at Haddington Amongst others of his pupils, who distinguished themselves in after-life, were John, earl of Gowrie, Robert Kerr of Newbattle, subsequently earl of Lothian, David Calderwood, the historian of the Church of Scotland, Principal Adamson, Robert Scott, minister at Glasgow, William Craig, professor of theology at Saumur, and Oliver Colt, professor of Latin in the same university, and afterwards minister at Fulden

In 1599 he was appointed by Sir Alexander Fraser of Philorth, minister of the town of Fraserburgh, with the view also of his holding the office of principal of a university which he had recently founded there [See Fraser of Philorth] The writer of his life in the Scottish Congregational Magazine for May 1850, says that he "probably hesitated before accepting a post of so much responsibility and labour, it is certain that he declared to the General Assembly of the Church that he would not accept it without their command to do so" When the matter came before that venerable body at their session of 21st March 1600, in consequence of a 'supplicatione given in be the presbytry of Deir, having considered the necessity of the said works, and how the said laird of Phillorthe hes refusit to sustain ane pastor at the said kirk, unless he undertake both the saids charges,' they resolved to command and charge the said Mr Charles Ferme to undertake both offices

On the establishment of episcopacy in 1600

Ferme distinguished himself by his opposition to the bishops, and in consequence became an object of persecution by the prelatical party In the month of February 1605, he and Mr John Forbes appeared before the council to justify their process of excommunication against the earl of Huntly He was a member of the General Assembly held at Aberdeen the same year, and for his share in its proceedings was imprisoned in the castle of Doune, not Stirling, as Calderwood incorrectly states, [Hist of Kirk of Scotland, vol vi p 292] Along with other imprisoned ministers he was summoned to appear before the privy council at Edinburgh, 24th October of that year This summons they declined to obey, but sent under protest to the council a vindication of their conduct, both as to holding the Aberdeen assembly, and as to the business transacted during its sittings After a confinement of more than a year in Doune castle, Ferme was banished to some remote place in the Highlands, the name of which has not been ascertained Here he suffered the greatest severities, and a letter to Mr Robert Bruce, in 1608, gives a lamentable account of his condition, as quoted by Calderwood [Ibid p 702] He continued in confinement till after 1609, but was afterwards restored to his parish, and died at Fraserburgh 24th September 1617 His Logical Analysis of the Epistle of Paul to the Romans, which he wrote during his residence at Fraserburgh, was printed by Principal Adamson in a small 8vo volume in 1651 A translation of it, by William Skae, A M , has been printed in a volume of the Wodrow Society, issued in 1850, with a memoir by William Lindsay Alexander, D D , F S A Scot , the volume containing also a Commentary on the same epistle, by Andrew Melville, in the original Latin Another work of Ferme's, entitled 'Lectiones in Esterem,' (Prelections on Easter,) was never printed, and like other productions of his pen is supposed to have perished After his death the college of Fraserburgh fell into decay, eclipsed in all probability by the superior advantages of Marischal college, then newly founded in Aberdeen

Ferrier, a surname evidently derived from farrier, a professor of the veterinary art. In the reign of Alexander the Second a family of this name lived in Tranent in Haddingtonshire, whose seal of arms was appended to an alienation of some lands in that locality to the family of Seton, on which was a shield charged with three horse shoes. The Ferriers were a considerable family in England, (Nisbet's Heraldry, vol. i. p. 439,) and there were several distinguished persons of the name in France. The surname is originally Norman, and is one of the many derived from the working in iron, which is not confined to any country Among the Norman Knights who came into England with William the Conqueror, was one named Henry Ferrieres, from Ferriers or Ferrieres, a small town of Gastinois in France. He bore for his arms six horse shoes, and his descendants of the same surname possess the estate of Baddesley Clinton, Warwickshire.

The English surnames of Ferrars, Ferrers, Ferris, Ferrey Feuron, Farren, and Farrant have the same derivation.

The word Ferrier may also have been used for a ferryman, and thus become a surname.

Of the eminent Scottish novelist, Miss Susan Edmonstone Ferrier, authoress of 'Marriage,' a memoir will be found in the supplement to this work.

Fife, sometimes spelled Fyfe, a surname derived from Fiv, one of the ancient provinces of Scotland, now the county of Fife. The origin of the name is involved in some uncertainty Sibbald, in his History of Fife, (p. 11 edit. 1803,) mentions a monkish tradition, in which, however, he puts no faith, that "it was called Fife from Fifus Duffus, (of whom below) a nobleman who did eminent service in war" It has also been conjectured to have been derived from the Gothic word Veach, signifying painted, as applied to the Picts, softened into Fife in the English, "which," says Sibbald, "the permutation of letters easily admits, F expressing Ve very well" This Pictish word Veach is also supposed to have been the same as Fothe or Foithe, a very common name among the Picts, but as remarked by the Rev Dr Adamson, the editor of the edition of Sibbald's History published in 1803, "it requires a wonderful partiality for the word Veach to shape it into so many forms, Vec, Vac, Wauch, Pict, Foth, Fife" That gentleman has a theory of his own in regard to the derivation of the name. He thinks it probable that it was given to the district "from one of its most striking natural productions. Fifa, in the Scandinavian dialects, is the cotton grass,—Lanugo palustris,—a plant that must have been very common in a country full of lakes and marshes, and which still abounds in the remaining undrained spots." [Ibid. p. 12, note] The name, however, existed long before any dialect of Scandinavian or Teutonic origin prevailed in the country, and the cotton grass did not become so plentiful till after the destruction of the ancient forests of the district, when those mosses and marshes in which it is found were in a great measure originated The derivation of the name may be referred to some of the Celtic dialects. The word Pict does not mean painted, as commonly supposed, and this at once disposes of the favourite but ugly word Veach as the origin of the name According to Chalmers, in his Caledonia, the Pictish people received their distinctive appellation from their relative position beyond the Roman wall to the more civilized Britons of the Roman province. From their free unrestrained condition they were in the ancient British speech styled Peithi, which was Latinized into Picti, signifying "those that are out or exposed,"—"the people of the open country,"—"the people of the waste or desert,"—also, "those who scout, who lay waste." As the letter P, in the ancient Celtic changes in the oblique cases into Ph with the sound of F, the softening of the word Peithi into Fife does not seem more remarkable than many other changes in orthography from the Celtic language no less singular

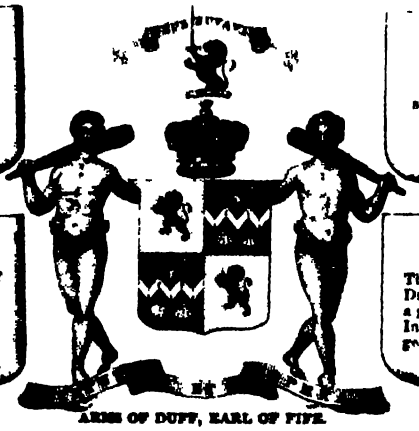
The ancestor of family of Braco, David Duff, received from Robert III. in 1401, a grant of barony of Muldavit, Banffshire. In what line descended from Macduff genealogists cannot ascertain.



ARMS OF DUFF, EARL OF FIFE.

Quarterings:—1. and 4. for Macduff, Earl of Fife. 2. and 3. for Duff of Braco.

Fife, Earl of, an ancient title in Scotland, Fibh or Fiv being one of the seven provinces into which that country was divided previous to the thirteenth century The first possessor of the title is stated to have been Duncan Macduff, chief or maormor of Fife (the celebrated thane of Shakspeare) famous in history as the enemy of the usurper Macbeth, (see article Macbeth,) who was overthrown and slain by Macduff at Lumphanan, in Aberdeenshire, in 1056. In reward for his signal services, which had secured the throne to Malcolm Canmore, that monarch is said to have bestowed on him the following privileges, namely, 1st, That he and his successors, lords of Fife, should have the right of placing the kings of Scotland on the throne at their coronation. 2d, That they should lead the van of the Scottish armies whenever the royal banner was displayed. 3d, That if he or any of his kindred committed slaughter of a suddenty, they should have a peculiar sanctuary, girth, or asylum, and obtain remission on payment of an atonement in money A cross, called Macduff's Cross, which stood near the town of Newburgh, but of which only the pedestal now remains, long formed the evidence of this privilege. Douglas (Peerage, vol i. p. 573, Wood's edition) states that Malcolm also created him earl of Fife The title earl, of Saxon origin, was not introduced into Scotland till after the settlement in the country of Saxon families, to which Malcolm, who had married a princess of the Saxon line of the kings of England, gave great encouragement. The Celtic title maormor was previously held by the chiefs or governors of the different divisions of the country, and it does not appear that Macduff ever bore the Saxon title of earl According to the absurd fables of Boece and Fordun, he was the eighth in descent from Fifus Macduff above mentioned, a potent chieftain who is stated to have lived about the year 834, and who is said to have given his name to the district of Fife, which had been conferred on him by Kenneth the Second, king of Scots, in return for the aid afforded him against the Picts, and of which he was appointed hereditary thane, but it is very doubtful if this Fifus Macduff ever lived In Sibbald's History of Fife (p 168) is the copy of a charter in which Etheldred, abbot of Dunkeld, a son of Malcolm Canmore, is styled earl of Fife, but this is considered a mistake of the monk who transcribed it if the charter itself is not a forgery Lord Hailes conjectures that this Etheldred had the custody of the earldom of Fife during the minority of the son or grandson of Macduff, and hence had received the title of earl of Fife as being custos constatus [Dalrymple's Annals, vol i p. 43, note.] The period of Macduff's death is unknown He is stated upon occasion to have commanded the king's army against the rebels in Mar

The son of Macduff, Dufagan, is styled by genealogists second earl of Fife, although many doubt his existence Douglas alleges him to have been witness to many charters of King Alexander the First. Sir James Dalrymple, in his Historical Collections, page 273, shows him to have been an assenter to a charter of that king, confirming the rights of the Trinity church of Scone, but although named, he is not styled comes or earl of Fife in the charter

Constantin, styled third earl, and supposed to have been the first who adopted the title, is mentioned in the supposititious charter of Etheldred above cited, and is witness to a charter of the monastery of Dunfermline. During his time a curious occurrence took place, which is very illustrative of the state of the country at that remote period Sir Robert Burgoner had violently oppressed the monks of Lochleven, who complained to the king David summoned a meeting of the whole county of Fife and Forteviot, to do justice between them Earl Constantin, who was great judge of Scotland, collected the strength of the county, and the bishop of St. Andrews sent his retainers to support the civil power The dispute was referred to three judges, Constantin the earl, Dufgal a judge, venerable for his age, and respected for his knowledge, and Meldometh, also a judge of high character After hearing evidence, the judges pronounced sentence against the knight, trial by jury, a Saxon institution, it would seem having not then been introduced into the Celtic portion of Scotland Constantin is said to have died in 1129, about five years after the accession of David the First to the throne

Constantin's oldest son, Gillimichel Macduff, fourth earl, is witness to the foundation charter of the abbey of Holyrood-house in 1128 and to several other charters of king David. He died in 1139, leaving two sons, Duncan, fifth earl, and Hugo, ancestor of the earl of Wemyss. [See Wemyss, earl of.]

Duncan, fifth earl, is witness to several charters of King David the First, and of Malcolm the Fourth, and was a liberal benefactor to the church. In 1138, the year before his father's death, he is conjectured to have been one of the five hostages delivered by David to Stephen, king of England, that the terms of the truce concluded after the battle of the Standard would be preserved by the Scots. According to Wintoun he was appointed, by David the First, regent of Scotland in the minority of Malcolm the Fourth, and under his guardianship, the young Malcolm then in his eleventh year, was sent by his grandfather, at the death of his father, Prince Henry, in June 1152 on a solemn progress through the kingdom In every district of Scotland he was proclaimed and received as heir to the crown, according to the practice of an age in which the laws were but too seldom attended to David the First died in 1153, and Earl Duncan in the following year after he had performed for the youthful Malcolm the ceremony of placing him on the inaugural stone, at his coronation From his younger sons are said to be descended the Macintoshes, Duffs, and Fifes.

His eldest son, Duncan the second, sixth earl, was one of the Scottish nobles who agreed to the convention made by William the Lion with Henry the Second of England at Falaise in Normandy in 1174 He is often named in charters of Malcolm the Fourth and William In 1175 he was associated with Richard Comyn, who was advanced in life, as Justiciarius Scotiæ Sibbald says he married Ada, niece of King Malcolm the Fourth, and got with her the lands of Strathmiglo, Falkland, Kettle, and Rathillet in Fife, and Strathbran in Perthshire, for which he quotes a charter, but gives no authority for the statement. He died about 1204, so that he held the office of justiciary for twenty-eight years. He had three sons Malcolm, seventh earl, Duncan, father, by his wife Alicia, daughter of Walter Corbet of Makerstoun, of Malcolm, eighth earl, and David, upon whom his father settled the lands of Strathbogie, which he had obtained from King William the Lion He assumed from them the name of Strathbogie, and was the father of John de Strathbogie, earl of Athol

Malcolm, seventh earl, married Matilda daughter of the earl of Strathearn, and received with her the lands of Glendevon, Carnbo, Adie, and Fossaway From a charter of King William it appears that Uthredus de Burgoner had, in the king's presence, acknowledged Malcolm, earl of Fife, to be his nearest heir, and resigned his lands of Burgoner in his favour Upon this narrative the king granted a charter of these lands to the earl and his heirs. Earl Malcolm founded a monastery of Dominican or Black friars at Cupar, and, in 1216 a convent of Cistertian nuns at North Berwick In 1217 he also established a monastery of Cistertian monks at Culross, where there had previously been an establishment of Culdees. He died, without issue, in 1229, and was buried in the church of St. Servanus at that place.

His nephew Malcolm, eighth earl, was one of the guarantees of a treaty with the English in 1237, and again in 1244, on occasion of the truce entered into between Alexander the Second and Henry the Third of England. In the minority of Alexander the Third, the earl of Fife was one of the faction in the English interests, and he was a member of the regency appointed 20th September 1255, under the influence of the English monarch, Henry the Third. In 1260, he was one of the Scottish nobles to whom Henry made oath that he would restore the queen of Scotland and her child, when she went to England to be confined that year. He died in 1266. He married a daughter of Lewellyn prince of Wales, and had two sons, Colbanus and Macduff.

Colbanus, the ninth earl, was knighted by King Alexander the Third in 1264, two years before he succeeded to the earldom, which he did not long enjoy, as he died in 1270, leaving a son, Duncan, tenth earl, only eight years of age, whose ward the king disponed to his son, Prince Alexander. This young prince, unfortunately for Scotland, died in 1284, the year previous to his father Alexander the Third's lamented death.

Duncan, tenth earl, was one of the regents appointed, in 1286, to govern the kingdom, after the death of Alexander the Third. He was assassinated at the age of twenty-six, on the 25th of September 1288, at a place called Potpollock, by Sir Patrick Abernethy and Sir Walter Percy, who had been instigated to the deed by Sir William Abernethy. [See vol. i. p. 14, art. ABERNETHY.] He left a son, also named Duncan, who must have been a mere infant at his father's death, as he remained for many years under the guardianship of William Fraser, bishop of St. Andrews.

At the coronation of John Baliol at Scone, November 30, 1292, the earl of Fife, being a minor, could not perform the usual ceremony of placing the new king on the regal stone, and Edward the First, having the young earl in his ward, granted a commission to John de St. John to act as the earl's deputy on the occasion. Macduff, the granduncle of the young earl, taking advantage of his nephew's minority and of the unsettled state of the country, seized the lands of Rires and Crov, belonging to the earldom, which he alleged had been bestowed upon him by his father the eighth earl. He was, however, dispossessed by the bishop of St. Andrews, the young earl's guardian, on which he complained to King Edward, and by that monarch's command, the regents of Scotland, after investigating the case, restored him to possession. But in the first parliament held by Baliol after his coronation, Macduff was summoned to answer for his conduct for taking forcible possession of lands which were in ward of the king. He acknowledged the possession, but denied the trespass, and pleaded that his father Malcolm had made a grant of the lands to him, and that Alexander the Third had, by charter, confirmed the grant. Judgment, however, was given against him, and he suffered a short imprisonment. On his release he petitioned Baliol for a hearing, and offered to prove his title by written evidence, but the petition was rejected, on which he again appealed to Edward, who summoned Baliol to appear in person before him, and answer the complaint of Macduff. This dispute is interesting in history as being, with Baliol's conduct in regard to it, the primary cause of that unfortunate monarch's downfall. At first he disregarded the summons of Edward, but the English king again peremptorily ordered him to appear, and unable to resist, he attended at a parliament held by Edward after Michaelmas in the year 1293, at which Macduff also was present. He was haughtily asked what excuse he had to give for his conduct. He had the spirit to reply, "I am king of Scotland. To the complaint of Macduff, or to aught else respecting my kingdom, I dare not make an answer without the advice of my people." "What means this refusal?" demanded Edward. "Are you not my liegeman? Have you not done homage to me? Is it not my summons that has brought you here?" Baliol, however, remained firm in his refusal to answer. The English parliament, in consequence, found him guilty of manifest and open contempt and disobedience to his liege lord, and they advised the king of England not only to do full justice to Macduff and to award damages against Baliol, but to seize three of his principal castles, and retain possession of them until he made satisfaction for his contempt and disobedience. Edward, however, at the request of Baliol, delayed proceeding farther till the day after the feast of the Trinity in 1294. A prolongation of the term for answering Macduff's complaint was afterwards granted by the king of England, but in 1296 he summoned Baliol to appear before him at Newcastle. Baliol's subsequent fate is matter of history, (see vol. i. p. 221, art. BALIOL). In the struggle for Scottish independence under the heroic Wallace, Macduff, who is supposed to have been put in possession of the disputed lands, joined the national standard, with the men of Fife, previous to the battle of Falkirk, 22d July 1298. Notwithstanding his obligations to Edward, and his having so far acknowledged his supremacy as to have appealed to him from the courts of Baliol, he was one of the few patriots who, with their adherents, remained with Wallace, after the greater part of the Scots nobles had deserted him, and, with the brave Sir John Graham, the 'fidus Achates' of that hero, he fell gallantly fighting in that disastrous action.

Besides his son, Duncan, eleventh earl, Duncan, the tenth earl, had a daughter, Lady Isabel, married to John third earl of Buchan, the romantic and high-spirited lady who, in the absence of her brother, then of the English party, exercised the privilege of her family in placing Robert the Bruce, on his second coronation, in the inaugural chair at Scone 29th March, 1306, (as related at page 415 of vol. i. art. BRUCE). This Duncan, eleventh earl, born about 1285, is styled by Sibbald, the twelfth earl, but it is obvious, even by his own computation, that this is a mistake. Lord Hailes has shown that the Duncan whom Sibbald styles the eleventh earl, never could have existed. Since the death of his father in 1288, the earl had resided at the English court, and in the memorable year 1306, while his heroic sister, the countess of Buchan, was suffering under the rigorous confinement of her cage at Berwick, for so nobly maintaining the ancient privilege of her race, the young earl was married to the grand-daughter (not the niece, as generally stated) of Edward the First, Mary de Monthermer, daughter of Ralph de Monthermer, earl of Gloucester and Hereford. He subsequently joined the party of Bruce, and received from him charters of the earldom of Fife, and of the baronies of O'Neil in Aberdeenshire, Kinnoul in Perthshire, and Calder in Edinburghshire. In 1317, when that monarch was absent in Ireland, assisting his brother, Edward Bruce, a considerable English force attempted to land at Donibristle near Inverkeithing, and a party of five hundred mounted men-at-arms hastily collected by the sheriff of Fife to oppose them, were disgracefully put to flight on the first attack. William Sinclair, bishop of Dunkeld, at the head of sixty of his retainers, meeting them in their flight, succeeded in rallying them, and charging furiously against the advancing English, repulsed them, and with a loss of more than five hundred men, drove them back to their ships. For this heroic deed, Bruce, on hearing of it, declared that Sinclair should be his own bishop. Lord Hailes, on the authority of Barbour, says that the earl of Fife commanded the Scots on this occasion, along with the sheriff, although other writers do not mention him He was the first of the earls who signed the celebrated letter to the Pope, asserting the independence of Scotland, in the parliament at Aberbrothwick, 6th April 1320 He fought at the fatal battle of Dupplin, 12th August 1332, on the side of his countrymen, and was taken prisoner, after a determined resistance, in which three hundred and sixty men-at-arms who fought under his standard, were killed He now submitted to Edward Baliol, the temporary victor, and at his coronation at Scone, on the 24th September following, he exercised his privilege of placing Baliol in the royal chair, while Sinclair, bishop of Dunkeld, whom Bruce had styled his own bishop, placed the crown upon his head It is very likely that the earl obtained his liberty on this occasion all the readier as the assistance of the possessor of the earldom of Fife, or his representative, at the coronation of a Scottish monarch, was, in those days, deemed an indispensable portion of the ceremony Perth having been fortified, the earl of Fife was by Baliol appointed governor of it, but that town was shortly after stormed and taken by Sir Simon Fraser and Sir Robert Keith, who destroyed its recently-erected fortifications, and took prisoners the earl and his daughter Isabella, afterwards countess of Fife in her own right. The English historians report that the earl betrayed the town to the English "It may seem strange," said Lord Hailes, "that Baliol placed such confidence in the earl, so lately an enemy, as to make him its governor But the forces of Baliol were not numerous, and he could not leave an English garrison in Perth He, therefore, judiciously intrusted that town to a lord whose territories lay open to the incursions of the English fleet. This circumstance might either serve to insure his fidelity, or afford means of chastening his bad faith" [Dalrymple's Annals, vol i p 156, note.]

At the battle of Halidon-hill, fought 19th July 1333, the vassals of the earl of Fife, under his banner were engaged At this time, says Lord Hailes, the earl himself was a prisoner, and it is not known who led his vassals. In a curious MS. preserved in the British Museum, containing a list of the nobles and leaders of the Scots at this disastrous battle, a copy of which has been printed by Tytler, the earl is mentioned as being one of the leaders of the division of the army commanded by the regent Douglas. If so, the probability is that he was among the slain Sibbald says he was killed the previous year, but this is obviously a mistake.

His son Duncan twelfth earl, was the last earl of Fife in the male line of their great ancestor Macduff He adhered to the fortunes of David the Second, and early in 1336, when Sir Andrew Moray of Bothwell, the regent, made an inroad into Fife, he was joined by the earl and the earl of March, and by their aid he demolished the tower of Falkland, took the castle of Leuchars, and after a siege of three weeks made himself master of the castle of St. Andrews, then held by the English In 1346 the earl accompanied David the Second in his ill-fated expedition to England and at the battle of Durham, fought 17th October of that year, he was taken prisoner, with his unfortunate sovereign, and many others of his nobles. Being tried for treason to the English king, he was found guilty, and sentenced to death on the ground of having appeared in arms against his liege lord, Edward the Third. He was, however, pardoned on account of his relationship to Edward the First, a consideration which did not always weigh with the English monarchs in regard to those unfortunate Scots nobles allied to them, who fell into their hands. Previous to 1350, he was allowed to return to Scotland, to raise money for his ransom, and in that year, in fulfilment of a vow which he had previously made, he mortified the church of Auchtermuchty, to the monastery of Lindores. He died betwixt 1353 and 1356, without male issue.

Sir George Mackenzie, in his 'Science of Heraldry,' gives a copy of one of the seals of the Macduffs, earls of Fife, of which the following woodcut is a representation

By his wife, Mary, the twelfth earl had an only daughter, Isabella, who succeeded as countess of Fife She married, first, William Ramsay, who, as earl of Fife, (in her right,) is witness to a charter of King David the Second, 12th April 1357 He also obtained from that monarch a charter erecting the town of Cupar into a free burgh, and soon afterwards died. She married, secondly, Walter Stewart, second son of King Robert the Second, by his first wife, Elizabeth More, daughter of More of Rowallan He died in 1360 She married, thirdly, Sir Thomas Byset of Upsettlington, to whom David the Second granted a charter of the earldom of Fife, 8th June, in the thirty-fourth year of his reign, that is, 1362 After his death she took for her fourth husband, John Dunbar, as among the missing charters of King David the Second is one to John Dunbar and Isabel, countess of Fife, of the earldom, with all its pertinents. The countess had no children by any of her husbands, and in consequence appears to have been prevailed upon to resign the earldom to Robert Stewart, the brother of her second husband, and earl of Menteith in right of his wife, afterwards the regent duke of Albany Sibbald says he had a copy of the agreement or indenture by which this arrangement was effected, and he gives its substance. By this agreement, she acknowledged the earl of Menteith to be her heir-apparent, as well as by the entail made by her deceased father, Duncan earl of Fife, in favour of Allan earl of Menteith grandfather of the Lady Margaret, spouse of the said Robert, then earl, as by the entail made by herself, and her late husband Walter Stewart, by which, on the said earl's assisting her in the recovery of the earldom, which she had by force and fear otherwise resigned, she, when the earldom was recovered, and had come into her possession, agreed to resign it into the hands of the king, that infeftment thereof might be given to the said earl. The countess was to receive, during all the days of her life, the free tenement of the lands of the earldom, except the third part allotted to Mary, countess of Fife, her mother Among other things it was also agreed that the earl should have the castle of Falkland, with the forest, in his own keeping, and that he should have right to place a constable therein, the countess to be entitled to live within the tower when agreeable to her In virtue of this indenture, which is dated 31st March 1371, Robert earl of Menteith became earl of Fife, and possessor of the palace of Falkland, the scene of the murder of his nephew, the young duke of Rothesay, in 1402 This earldom was forfeited by the attainder of his son, Murdoch, duke of Albany, in 1425, and annexed to the crown by act of parliament 4th August of that year [See vol i. pages 33—43, art. ALBANY, duke of]

The title of earl of Fife was revived as an Irish peerage in the person of William Duff, Lord Braco of Kilbryde, only son of William Duff of Dipple, in the county of Elgin, (by Helen, daughter of Sir George Gordon of Edinglassie, Aberdeenshire,) who derived his descent from David Duff, representative of the ancient earls of Fife, although the precise line of his relationship to them cannot now be traced This David Duff in 1401 received from Robert the Third a grant of considerable lands and of the barony of Muldavit, Banffshire, which continued to be one of the chief titles of the family, until alienated in the beginning of the reign of Charles the Second The above-mentioned William Duff, Lord Braco, succeeded to the estate of his cousin, William Duff of Braco, in 1719, and was chosen M P for Banffshire at the general election in 1727 He was created by Queen Caroline, regent in the absence in Hanover of her consort, George the Second, a peer of Ireland, by the title of Baron Braco of Kilbryde, by patent, dated 28th July 1735, to him and the heirs male of his body During the rebellion of 1745, he supported the interests of the government, and on the duke of Cumberland's arrival in Aberdeen in March 1746, he waited on his royal highness with an offer of his services in any way the king should require In 1751 he purchased, for three thousand pounds sterling, the superiorities and church patronages of King's college, Old Aberdeen, by which he acquired the right of presentation to about fifteen parishes. In consideration of his descent from Macduff, the conqueror of Macbeth, he was, on 26th April 1759, advanced to the dignity of earl of Fife and Viscount Macduff, with limitation to the heirs male of his body He died at his seat of Rothiemay, Banffshire, 8th September 1763. He was twice married first to the Lady Jane Ogilvie (or Forbes, widow of Hugh Forbes, eldest son of Sir William Forbes of Craigievar, baronet), daughter of James fourth earl of Findlater and first earl of Seafield, chancellor of Scotland, but by her had no issue, and, secondly, to Jane, daughter of Sir James Grant of Grant, baronet, and by her had seven sons and seven daughters.

The Hon William Duff, the eldest son, died before his father, in his twenty-seventh year, and James, the second son, in consequence became second earl of Fife The youngest son, the Hon. Arthur Duff, of Orton, in the county of Elgin, was admitted advocate in 1764, and chosen M P for Elginshire, at the general election in 1774. Early in 1779 he was appointed comptroller of excise in Scotland, an office which he resigned in 1804, in favour of his nephew, Richard Wharton, Esq, the son of his third youngest sister Lady Sophia Henrietta Duff, married 18th July 1774, to Thomas Wharton, Esq., commissioner of excise in Scotland. Dying unmarried at Orton, 26th April 1805, he was succeeded in his estate by his said nephew, who, on the 13th July following, obtained the king's license to assume the name of Duff in addition to his own.

James, the second earl of Fife, the second and eldest surviving son, born 29th September 1729, was chosen M P for the county of Banff at the general election of 1754, and was afterwards four times re-elected for the same county At the general election of 1784 he was elected for the county of Elgin. He had succeeded his father as earl of Fife in September 1763. He greatly increased his extensive property by several purchases of land in Banffshire, Morayshire, and Aberdeenshire. His plantations covered no less than fourteen thousand acres of till then barren and unproductive land, for which he twice obtained the gold medal from the Society for the encouragement of Arts, Manufactures, and Commerce. He zealously promoted the improvement of agriculture on his estates, and had a farm adjoining to each of his seats, where the most approved systems of cultivation were carried on under his own immediate notice. In the calamitous years 1782 and 1783 he not only sold his grain at reduced prices to the poor, but imported several cargoes of grain from England, for the same purpose, with a pecuniary loss to himself of three thousand pounds. The gain to his own feelings and character for such generous conduct is not to be estimated by money To the tenants on his Highland estates, during these years of scarcity, he allowed, besides, a deduction of twenty per cent. from their rents. In 1783 he received from the crown a charter of novodamus, erecting the thriving town of Macduff, in the vicinity of his splendid seat, Duff house, in Banffshire, into a burgh of barony He also built a harbour in that port, at an expense of five thousand pounds, and it is now one of the best in the Moray frith The earl, who was lord lieutenant of Banffshire, was created a British peer by the title of Baron Fife, 19th February 1790, with limitation to the heirs male of his body lawfully begotten He died at his house in Whitehall, London, 28th January, 1809, in the eightieth year of his age, and was buried in the Mausoleum at Duff house, Banffshire. He married, 5th June 1759, Lady Dorothea Sinclair, only child of Alexander, ninth earl of Caithness, but having no issue by her, his British peerage became extinct at his death, while his other titles devolved upon his next brother

Alexander, third earl of the new creation, born in 1731, was admitted advocate in 1754, and married on 17th August 1775, Mary, eldest daughter of George Skene, Esq of Skene in Aberdeenshire, and Carnaton, Forfarshire, and had by her two sons and four daughters, namely, James, fourth earl, Alexander, a general in the army, of whom afterwards, Lady Jane married 2d December 1802, to Major A F Taylor, R. E., Lady Anne, married in 1809 to Richard Wharton Duff Esq of Orton, and died 24th January 1829, Lady Sarah, married in 1807, to Daniel Collyer, Esq, and died in 1811, and Lady Mary, who died young. His lordship died 17th April 1811

James Duff, fourth earl, K T, G C H, born 6th October 1776, was created Baron Fife in the peerage of the United Kingdom, by patent dated 27th April 1827 During the Peninsular war he volunteered his services in the Spanish patriotic army, in which he obtained the rank of general. He was wounded at the battle of Talavera in 1809, and again at the storming of Fort Matagorda near Cadiz in 1810 In 1823 he was made a knight grand cross of the order of the Guelphs of Hanover, and in 1827 a knight of the Thistle. He married, 9th September 1799, when he bore the courtesy title of Viscount Macduff, Mary Caroline Manners, (died in 1805,) second daughter of the late John Manners, Esq of Grantham Grange, Lincolnshire, and Louisa, countess of Dysart in her own right, but had no issue. His lordship died March 9 1857

His brother, general the Hon Sir Alexander Duff of Delgaty castle, Aberdeenshire, G C.H , entered the army as an ensign in the 66th foot in 1793, and served at Gibraltar, in Flanders, in the East Indies in 1798, and in Egypt in the expedition under Sir David Baird. In 1806 he went to South America, where he commanded the centre column in the attack on Buenos Ayres. In 1816 he was presented with a sword by the officers of the 88th regiment, who had served under his command. He was appointed to the colonelcy of the 87th foot in 1831, and in 1833 was nominated a grand cross of the Hanoverian Guelphic order In 1834 he was knighted by King William the Fourth, and attained the full rank of general in 1838. In 1848 he was appointed lord lieutenant of the county of Elgin. He was also a deputy lieutenant of Banffshire. He married Anne, youngest daughter of James Stein, Esq of Kilbagie, and had two sons and two daughters. He died 21st March 1851, aged 78

His elder son James Duff, born in 1814, succeeded his uncle, March 9, 1857, as fifth earl of Fife, and soon after was created Baron Skene of Skene, in the peerage of the United Kingdom He married, 16th March 1846, Lady Agnes Georgiana Hay, 2d daughter of the 17th earl of Errol, with issue

The earl's brother, George Skene Duff, 2d son of General Sir Alexander Duff, born in 1814, was for some time an attaché to the British embassy at Paris, and M P for the Elgin burghs. To him and his sisters the queen granted 2d June 1857, the rank and precedence of children of an earl

FILLANS, a surname evidently having the same origin as St Fillan—the root also of Gilfillan—(which see), and probably derived from the Saxon word fyllan, to fill, although, doubtless, a Gaelic origin may also be assigned to it, the famous saint mentioned, whose name has been given to so many chapels and pools in Scotland, and is associated with so much absurd superstition, having lived so far back as the seventh century He was abbot of Pittenweem, but having turned a hermit, he died in the wilds of Glenorchy in Argyleshire in 649 In the old monkish legends regarding him it is stated that while engaged in transcribing the Scriptures, his left hand was observed to shine with so much splendour as to afford him light enough to enable him to proceed with his work, as he used to spend whole nights in that exercise Lesley, in his seventh book, says that this wonderful arm afterwards came into the possession of Robert the Bruce who enclosed it in a silver shrine, which he ordered to be carried at the head of his army, but that previous to the battle of Bannockburn, the king's chaplain, with the view of preserving it from the English, took it out and deposited it in some place of security While, however, the Bruce was addressing his prayers to the empty shrine, it was observed to open and shut suddenly, and, on inspection, the saint was found to have himself deposited his luminous arm in its old place, as an assurance of victory! The belief in the power of St. Fillan in the cure of lunacy was long held in the Highlands, and the superstitious observances by which his aid was supposed to be procured, were for centuries performed at his chapel and pool in Strathfillan, Breadalbane. There is a village in Perthshire of the name of St. Fillan

FILLANS, JAMES, an eminent sculptor, was born about 1808 at Wilsontown, Lanarkshire, but his parents having removed to Paisley when he was very young, he received his education in the latter place He owed his eminence to his own genius and indomitable perseverance In early life he evinced a natural talent for drawing and modelling, and to acquire a knowledge of carving, he became apprentice to a stone mason and served a regular time at Paisley, employing his leisure hours in his favourite pursuit During his career as a mason, we believe, he was engaged in carving the ornamental capitals of the columns of the Royal Exchange, Glasgow After serving his apprenticeship, Mr Fillans for a short period devoted his time to the modelling of small groups for a publisher in Paisley These were much admired, and brought the youthful artist before the public His earliest efforts at original busts were those of William Motherwell the poet, Sheriff Campbell of Paisley, &c. These exertions procured for Mr Fillans, at that time, the patronage of several influential gentlemen in the West of Scotland

In 1836 he visited the Continent, and improved himself by travel and the study of works of art He then settled in London, and in the first exhibition of the works of living artists in the Royal Academy at Trafalgar Square, London, he had no fewer than seven marble busts, among which was that of Allan Cunningham, which was much admired and commended by the most eminent artist of the day, Sir Francis Chantrey, who availed himself of the first opportunity that presented itself to advance the fortunes of the young and promising Scotch sculptor Being applied to by the friends of the late Archibald Oswald, Esq of Auchencruive, Ayrshire, for a bust of that gentleman, at a time when his own commissions were so numerous that he could not undertake the work, he at once recommended Mr Fillans, who undertook the commission, and executed it at Vienna in the course of the same year He afterwards received another commission for a cabinet statue of Mr Oswald Numerous copies of both works in marble were afterwards produced to order Having received extensive commissions in Scotland, Mr Fillans was induced, in the spring of 1852, to remove his studio to Glasgow, from the vicinity of Portman Square,

London, where for many years it had formed a centre of attraction to the admirers of art.

Among the most prominent of his works are the Birth of Burns, in alto relievo, a life-sized group, Blind Girls reading the Scriptures, life-sized group in marble, Madonna and Child, life-sized figure, Grief, or Rachel weeping for her children, the full-length statue of Sir James Shaw at Kilmarnock, the bust of Professor Wilson (Christopher North), busts of Allan Cunningham, Motherwell, and William Kennedy, Esq, author of Fitful Fancies, &c, posthumous busts of James Hogg, Sir Walter Scott, and Robert Burns, statuette in bronze of the racehorse Flying Dutchman, the property of the earl of Eglinton, Bas Reliefs, illustrative of catching the wild horse in the Texan Prairies, &c &c In the portrait department of his art, Mr Fillans stood on a position of the highest excellence He was possessed of a highly poetic mind, and his imaginative groups evinced great originality in conception, and freedom in the mode of treatment His execution was remarkable for its anatomical accuracy, delicacy, softness of touch, and careful finish

Besides his eminence as a sculptor, Mr Fillans had attained great proficiency as a painter, and received and executed commissions in that department of art His oil paintings are truthful to nature, and are possessed of great breadth of effect in light and shade

He was most obliging in his manners, modest and unassuming in his deportment, and possessed extensive information on almost all subjects connected with literature, science, and art Mr Fillans died on 27th September 1852, after a short illness, of rheumatic fever He left behind him a widow and eight young children, seven of whom were boys, to lament his untimely death

FINCASTLE, Viscount of, a title of the earl of Dunmore, derived from a district in the county of Perth, which stretches along the northern bank of the Tummel and is said to take its name from the great number of old castles with which it abounds. [See DUNMORE, earl of]

FINDLATER, a surname supposed to be derived from Finde-la-terre, the French for 'the land's end,' and strikingly descriptive of the locality of that name in the parish of Fordyce, Banffshire, from which the earls of Findlater (see next article) took their title, being bounded by the sea, and projecting far into it on that part of the coast.

FINDLATER, Earl of, a title (dormant since 1811) possessed by the Ogilvies, a branch of the Airlie family It was first conferred on James, second Lord Ogilvy of Deskford, Banffshire, on 20th February 1638, to him and the heirs male of his body succeeding to him in the estates of Findlater and Deskford. He was the son of Sir Walter Ogilvy of Deskford and Findlater created Lord Ogilvy, 4th October 1616, (see OGILVY, Lord,) and his second wife, Lady Mary Douglas, third daughter of the earl of Morton, being the sixth in direct lineal descent from Sir Walter Ogilvy of Auchleven, who, by his marriage in 1487 with Margaret, daughter and heiress of Sir John Sinclair of Deskford and Findlater, killed at the battle of Harlaw in 1411, acquired these lands, which became the distinctive possessions of his family The first earl was nominated a privy councillor for life by parliament in November 1641, and was a member of several committees of parliament from 1641 to 1647 He married, first, Lady Elizabeth Leslie, second daughter of the fifth earl of Rothes, relict of David Wemyss, younger of Wemyss, and by her had two daughters, namely, Lady Elizabeth Ogilvy, married to Sir Patrick Ogilvy of Inchmartin, Perthshire, and Lady Ann, to the ninth earl of Glencairn, lord-high-chancellor of Scotland He married, secondly Lady Marion Cunningham, fourth daughter of the eighth earl of Glencairn, without issue Having no sons, his lordship made a resignation of his titles into the king's hands, and on 18th October 1641, obtained a new patent, conferring the earldom of Findlater, after his death, upon his elder daughter, Lady Elizabeth and her husband, Sir Patrick Ogilvy, and his heirs male.

Patrick, second earl, descended from Patrick de Ogilvy, probably a younger son of Patrick de Ogilvy of Wester Powrie in Forfarshire, the brother of Sir Walter Ogilvy of Auchterhouse, Sheriff of Angus, was the son of Sir Patrick Ogilvy of Inchmartin, and Anne, daughter of Sir Duncan Campbell of Glenorchy After the grant of the new patent, he had the style of Lord Deskford in the lifetime of his father-in-law, the first earl of Findlater, and under that title was served heir to his father, Sir Patrick Ogilvy, in the lordship of Errol, Inchmartin, and other lands in Perthshire, on 5th October 1652 A fine of fifteen hundred pounds was imposed on him by Cromwell's act of grace and pardon, 12th April 1654 He had a son, James third earl and died 30th March 1658.

James, third earl, was served heir to his father, 15th April 1662 He steadily supported the treaty of union in the parliament of 1706 and died in 1711 He married, first, Lady Anne Montgomery (relict of Robert Seton, son of Sir George Seton of Hailes), and secondly Lady Mary Hamilton, third daughter of William second duke of Hamilton, killed at the battle of Worcester in 1651 By his first wife he had three sons and two daughters. The sons were, Walter Lord Deskford, who died before his father unmarried, James, fourth earl of Findlater, and the Hon. Col Patrick Ogilvy of Lonmay and Inchmartin, member for the burgh of Cullen in the Scots parliament, to which, on the 21st July 1704 he presented a petition, requesting the command of an independent troop of dragoons. He gave his support to the union, and was one of the representatives for Scotland chosen to the first parliament of Great Britain in 1707 and at the general election of 1708 he was elected for the Cullen burghs. He died at Inchmartin 20th September 1737, in the seventy-second year of his age. He married his cousin Elizabeth, daughter of the Hon Francis Montgomery of Giffen, with issue.

James, fourth earl of Findlater, and first earl of Seafield, chancellor of Scotland, born in 1664, was educated for the law, and after his return from his travels, he was admitted advocate, 16th January 1685 In 1681 he had been elected member for the burgh of Cullen in Banffshire, in the Scots parliament, and he was chosen for the same burgh to the convention of estates in 1689, when he made an energetic speech in favour of King James, and was one of the five members who dissented from the memorable vote which declared that monarch to have, by maladministration, forfeited the crown. He afterwards took the oaths to King William and Queen Mary He had an extensive practice as an advocate, and in 1693 he was constituted solicitor-general, at which time he was knighted and appointed sheriff of Banffshire. In 1695 he was promoted to the office of secretary of state, and in virtue of a letter from the king, he sat and voted in the parliament of 1696, as lord secretary On the 12th of September of that year, a new writ was issued to the burgh of Cullen to elect another commissioner in his room He was created Viscount Seafield, 26th June 1698, and appointed president of the parliament which met 19th July of that year On the 9th of the same month, he and the earl of Marchmont, lord-high-chancellor and commissioner to the parliament, arrived at Edinburgh, and met with a splendid reception In the parliament they carried all triumphantly for the king. He was high commissioner to the General Assembly of the Church of Scotland in 1700, 1703 1724, and 1727, and was advanced to the dignity of earl of Seafield 24th June 1701 [See SEAFIELD, earl of] On the accession of Queen Anne, in March 1702, he was continued secretary of state, in conjunction with the duke of Queensberry The same year he was named one of the commissioners to treat of a union, and on the first of November was appointed lord-high-chancellor of Scotland At this period a contemporary thus describes his lordship "He has great knowledge of the civil law and the constitution of Scotland—understands perfectly how to manage a Scottish parliament to the advantage of the court. This, together with his implicitly executing whatever King William pleased, without ever reasoning on the subject, established him very much in that monarch's favour, but his conduct in the affair of Darien lost him with the people. He affects plainness and familiarity of manner, but is not sincere, is very beautiful in his person, with a graceful behaviour, a smiling countenance, and a soft tongue" [Macky's Memoirs.] His lordship was high commissioner, or representative of the king, to the parliament of Scotland in 1703, when he was invested with the order of the Thistle In the following year he was superseded in his office of chancellor by the marquis of Tweeddale, but on the 17th of October of the same year he was again constituted instead one of the secretaries of state. On the 9th March 1705 he was a second time appointed lord-high-chancellor of Scotland and nominated one of the commissioners for the union At this time so great was his unpopularity that he narrowly escaped with his life in a tumult which took place in Edinburgh, in 1705, after the trial of Captain Green and his crew, who were convicted of having committed piracy and murder on board one of the Darien Company's vessels. [Laing's Scotland, vol. ii. p 287] He was a zealous and active supporter of the union, setting forth the advantages of that measure in his speeches in parliament, and when it was at length accomplished, and the Scots estates rose for the last time he remarked with levity, "Now, there is an end of an auld sang." His residence at this period was the noble mansion of Moray house, in the Canongate, already associated with many historical recollections, which became the scene of the numerous secret deliberations that preceded the ratification of the treaty of union. He was one of the sixteen representatives of the Scots peerage elected by parliament in 1707, and was re-chosen in 1708, 1712, 1713 1722 and 1727

When in London in 1707, he was sworn a member of the privy council in England, and on his return to Edinburgh, 3d July of that year, he produced to the lords of session a new commission, appointing him chancellor of Scotland, and was accordingly sworn and admitted. Doubts having arisen however, as to the utility of this office in Scotland, while that of chancellor over the United Kingdom was held by Lord Cowper, the earl of Seafield was, it is supposed on that account, appointed lord chief baron in the court of exchequer, and admitted 25th May 1708 For his great services to the state he received also a pension of three thousand pounds per annum In Evans' Catalogue of British Portraits, vol i., is one of the fourth earl of Findlater, engraved by Smith, from the original by Kneller from which the following woodcut is taken

On succeeding to his father in 1711, he was thereafter styled earl of Findlater and Seafield When the malt tax was extended to Scotland he considered it an infringement of the articles of union, and was so greatly incensed on the occasion that, on 1st June 1713, he brought the subject before the House of Lords, and then was exhibited the spectacle of this the chief agent in promoting the union in the final session, only six years before, of the Scottish legislature being the first to propose its repeal in the imperial parliament. The grievances of the Scottish nation he reduced to four heads 1st The being deprived of a privy council 2d, The extension of the treason laws of England to Scotland 3d, Scottish peers being incapacitated from being peers of Great Britain, (this was found to be an inconvenience, and was afterwards remedied) and 4th, The Scots being subjected to the malt tax The National Scots Rights Association organised in 1853, in their list of grievances, do not include any of these In the change of times others of a different nature demand consideration But on these four, his lordship, seeing, as he said that the union had not produced those good effects which were anticipated from it, moved for leave to bring in a bill for dissolving the union between England and Scotland, and securing the protestant succession in the house of Hanover The motion was negatived, but only by the small majority of four, and these by proxies. There were on the occasion 108 peers present, who were equally divided, 54 for the motion and 54 against it; while of proxies 18 voted for and 17 against it. The same year he was appointed keeper of the great seal of Scotland, and he presided as chancellor in the court of session, where his knowledge of the law and a peculiar talent which he possessed for despatching business and abridging processes, rendered him eminently useful While he always lived in a style suitable to his high station, his great abilities, industry, and prudent management enabled him not only to retrieve the family estate, which had become much involved, and to pay his father's debts, but greatly to increase his landed property He died in 1730, in the sixty-sixth year of his age. He married Anne daughter of Sir William Dunbar of Durn baronet, and had three sons and two daughters, namely, James, fifth earl of Findlater, the Hon William Ogilvy, who was named after King William, the Hon George Ogilvy, who passed advocate in 1728, and died, unmarried, in January 1780, Lady Elizabeth who married the sixth earl of Lauderdale, and Lady Janet, whose second husband was the first earl of Fife, in the Irish peerage.

James, fifth earl of Findlater and second earl of Seafield, born about 1689, was, on the breaking out of the rebellion in 1715, one of those who were committed prisoners to the castle of Edinburgh, on suspicion of disaffection to the government. He was then styled Lord Deskford After succeeding to the earldom he was, in 1734 appointed one of the lords of the police, and in 1737 vice-admiral of Scotland, which office he retained till his death In 1734 he had been chosen one of the sixteen representative Scots peers, and was afterwards three times re-elected Under the act for abolishing the heritable jurisdictions in Scotland in 1747 he was allowed, for the regality of Ogilvy, the constabulary of Cullen and the bailliary of regality of Strathila, one thousand and eighty-five pounds nineteen shillings and fourpence, in full of his claim of five thousand five hundred pounds. He died at Cullen house, Banffshire, 9th July 1764 in the seventy-sixth year of his age He married first, Lady Elizabeth Hay, second daughter of Thomas sixth earl of Kinnoul, and, secondly, Lady Sophia Hope, eldest daughter of Charles first earl of Hopetoun, by whom he had no issue By his first countess he had one son, James, sixth earl of Findlater, and two daughters; Lady Margaret, married in November 1735 to Sir Ludovick Grant of Grant, baronet (see GRANT of Grant), and Lady Anne, who became the wife of the second earl of Hopetoun

James, sixth earl of Findlater and third earl of Seafield, born about 1714, completed an excellent education by foreign travel Douglas (Peerage, vol i Wood's edition, p 588, note) quotes the following extract from a letter by Horace Walpole to General Conway at Rome, 23d April, 1740 "Harry, you saw Lord Deskford at Geneva don't you like him? He is a mighty sensible man, there are few young people have so good an understanding He is mighty grave, and so are you, but you both can be pleasant when you have a mind. Indeed one can make you pleasant; but his solemn Scotchery is not a little formidable" [Orford's Works, vol. vi] In 1752 while yet Lord Deskford, he established a bleachfield in the north end of the parish of that name in Banffshire, where about 1,500 pieces of cloth and 1,700 spindles of thread yarn were annually whitened, but in the course of the present century, from the decay of the linen manufacture and household spinning in the parish the bleaching also fell off, and was given up. He also established at Cullen a considerable manufacture of linen and damask On 29th July 1754, he was appointed one of the commissioners of customs in Scotland, but resigned his seat at that board in 1761 Three years afterwards he succeeded his father, and in 1765 he was appointed one of the lords of police. He was also one of the trustees for the improvement of fisheries and manufactures, and for the management of the annexed estates in Scotland. For several years before his death he resided constantly at Cullen house, employing himself in the promotion of agriculture, trade, and all kinds of industry He was the first to attempt improvements both in agriculture and manufactures in the county of Banff. He brought an overseer from England, and cultivated a farm in the neighbourhood of Banff, in a manner totally unknown at that period in that part of the country He introduced the turnip husbandry, and granted long leases to his tenants, on condition that the latter should enclose the lands within a certain period, and that they should sow grass seeds, and summer fallow to a certain extent within the first five years of their occupancy To encourage them to preserve the plantations on his estate from any damage by their cattle, he adopted a plan with several of his tenants of giving them, at the termination of the lease, every third tree, (or the value in money,) which had been planted during the currency of the lease. The Findlater family within fifty years previous to 1806 had planted about eight thousand Scottish acres, or at least thirty-two millions of trees. His lordship died at Cullen house 3d November 1770, in the 56th year of his age. He married at Huntingtower, 9th June 1749, Lady Mary Murray second daughter of the first duke of Athol, and by her had two sons, James, seventh earl of Findlater, and the Hon John Ogilvy who died young, in 1763

James, seventh earl of Findlater and fourth earl of Seafield, born at Huntingtower 10th April 1750, was educated at the university of Oxford, and soon after succeeding to the earldom he went to the Continent, where he chiefly resided for the remainder of his life He was esteemed a good classical scholar, and though he admired Horace, his favourite author was Virgil. He married at Brussels in 1779, Christina Teresa, daughter of Joseph Count Murray of Melgum, baronet of Nova Scotia lieutenant-general in the armies of the emperor of Germany, and captain-general ad interim of the Low Countries. With his countess he did not reside long, and by her he had no issue He died at Dresden 5th October 1811, in his sixty-second year On his death the earldom of Findlater became dormant, but the earldom of Seafield, with estates in Scotland worth at that period thirty thousand pounds sterling, went to his cousin, Sir Lewis Alexander Grant of Grant, baronet, who, on becoming earl of Seafield assumed the surname of Ogilvy in addition to that of Grant. [See SEAFIELD, earl of]

The earldom of Findlater is claimed by Sir William Ogilvie of Carnousie, baronet, and by John Farquharson of Haughton, Esq, son of Alexander Ogilvie, Esq., by Mary Farquharson, his wife, as presumptive male heir of the Ogilvie family

FINDLAY, ROBERT, D D, a learned divine, the author of some works on divinity, was born March 29, 1721 He was the only son of William Findlay of Waxford and other lands in Ayrshire, which he had inherited from his father, John Findlay, who died in 1697 His mother was Barbara, daughter of Robert Hodsart, surgeon in Kilmarnock, and, on becoming a widow, she married, secondly, Alexander Cunninghame of Brighouse in the same county The son was educated at the university of Glasgow, after leaving which he went to Leyden, and on his return spent some time at Edinburgh, with a view to the medical profession, which he soon relinquished for the church In 1744 he was ordained minister of the parish of Stewarton, from which he removed, in 1745, to Galston, and next went to Paisley In 1756 he became minister of the North West parish of Glasgow, and in 1782 was appointed professor of divinity in that university He died in 1814, in his ninety-fourth year He had married in 1745, his cousin Annabella, daughter of Robert Paterson, Esq of Braehead, Ayrshire, and had a son, Robert Findlay, Esq of Easterhill, Lanarkshire, an eminent merchant in Glasgow Dr Findlay's works are

FINGLAND, a surname derived from the Fingland (otherwise Fingland) burn, Peebles-shire, a tributary of the Quair In the parish of Eskdalemuir, Dumfries-shire, there is a cascade called Finglandhill

FINLAY, JOHN, a minor poet, born in Glasgow in 1782, in 1802 published 'Wallace, or the Vale of Ellerslie, with other Poems,' 12mo, 2d edit 1804, 8vo In 1808 he brought out his 'Scottish Historical and Romantic Ballads, chiefly Ancient, with Explanatory Notes and a Glossary, to which are prefixed some remarks on the early state of Romantic Composition in Scotland' These productions display much acquaintance with the literary antiquities of the middle ages He died December 8, 1810, aged twenty-eight

FINLAYSON, JAMES, D D, an eminent divine, was born February 15, 1758, at Nether Cambusnie, a small farm in the parish of Dunblane, Perthshire, where his ancestors had been settled for several centuries He was sent first to the school of Kinbuck in the neighbourhood, and about the age of ten to that of Dunblane. In his fourteenth year he went to the university of Glasgow, to study for the ministry, and during the summer vacations he occupied himself in instructing his younger brothers at home To assist in defraying the expense of his attendance on the classes, he became a private tutor, and was engaged for two years in teaching the children of Mrs Campbell of Carie, and afterwards acted in the same capacity to the family of Mr Cooper, Glasgow He was next employed by Professor Anderson, founder of the Andersonian university, as his amanuensis, and, in 1782, he resumed the duties of a tutor by taking charge of two sons of Sir William Murray of Ochtertyre, baronet, these being the fifth baronet, Sir Patrick Murray, and his younger brother, Sir George As Mr Finlayson resided with the family in Edinburgh during the winter, he had an opportunity of pursuing his studies at the divinity hall, and of attending other classes in the university of that city

In 1785 he was licensed to preach, and in the summer of that year he received an offer of the living of Dunkeld from the duke of Athol, which he was induced to decline, on being informed, by Sir William Murray, that an arrangement was in progress for procuring for him the professorship of logic and metaphysics in the university of Edinburgh More than a year elapsed, however, before the negociation, which had been set on foot for securing him this appointment, was brought to a satisfactory conclusion, and, in the meantime, he accepted of the living of Borthwick, in the neighbourhood of Edinburgh, which Sir William Murray, by his interest with Dundas of Arniston, had obtained for him He commenced his duties as professor of logic in the winter session of 1786-7, and was ordained minister of Borthwick in the succeeding April From his knowledge of the laws and constitution of the Church of Scotland, he soon became a leader, on the moderate side, in the church courts, and as it was deemed advisable that he should have a metropolitan charge, he was, in 1790, translated to Lady Yester's church, Edinburgh, where he remained till 1793, when he succeeded Dr Robertson in the Old Greyfriars. A vacancy having occurred in the High church in 1799, he was chosen by the town council to fill it, when he became the colleague of Dr Hugh Blair, whose funeral sermon he was called upon to preach in little more than a year Mr Finlayson, not long after, received from the university of Edinburgh the degree of D D He was also elected fellow of the Royal Society of Edinburgh In 1802 he was elected moderator of the General Assembly The remaining years of his life were only distinguished by the quiet and unostentatious discharge of his duties In the beginning of 1805 his constitution began to decline On the 25th of January 1808, while conversing with Principal Baird, he was seized with a paralytic affection, and died on the 28th of the same month, in the fiftieth year of his age His only publications were two occasional sermons, and a short account of Dr Blair, annexed to the posthumous volume of his sermons He likewise printed, but did not publish, the 'Heads of an Argument' on a question depending before the ecclesiastical courts A volume of his own sermons, with a memoir prefixed, was published the year after his death

FLAKEFIELD, a surname derived, under peculiar circumstances, from a place of that name in the southern division of the parish of East Kilbride, and intimately associated with the rise and progress of a branch of the linen manufacture which has contributed so greatly to the prosperity of the city of Glasgow The origin of the surname is thus described in a note to the article Kilbride (East) in the Topographical, Statistical, and Historical Gazetteer of Scotland, p 100 Previous to the commencement of the eighteenth century, two young men of the name of Wilson the one from Flakefield and the other from the neighbourhood, proceeded to Glasgow, and there commenced business as merchants. The similarity of the name having occasioned frequent mistakes in the way of business, one of them, for the sake of distinguishing himself from the other, was designated by the cognomen of Flakefield, the place of his birth and the real name soon became obsolete, both the man and his posterity being known by the surname of Flakefield, instead of Wilson The original bearer of the new name put one of his sons to the weaving trade, but the lad, after having learned the business, enlisted about the year 1670, in the regiment of the Cameronians, and was afterwards draughted into the Scottish guards. During the wars he was sent to the Continent, where he procured a blue and white checked handkerchief, that had been woven in Germany, and at the time a thought struck Flakefield that should it be his good fortune to return to Glasgow, he would make the attempt to manufacture cloth of the same kind He accordingly preserved with great care a fragment sufficient for his purpose; and on being disbanded in 1700, he returned to his native city, with a fixed resolution to accomplish his laudable design. A few spindles of yarn, fit for his purpose, was all that William Flakefield could at that time collect the white was ill-bleached, and the blue not very dark, but they were nevertheless the best that could be found in Glasgow About two dozen of handkerchiefs composed the first web, and when the half was woven he cut out the cloth, and took it to the merchants, who at that time traded in salmon, Scottish plaiding, Hollands, and other thick linens. They were pleased with the novelty of the blue and white stripes, and especially with the delicate texture of the cloth, which was then set in comparison of the Hollands. The new adventurer asked no more for his web than the net price of the materials used, and the ordinary wages of his work; and as this was readily paid him he went home rejoicing that his attempt had not been unsuccessful. This dozen of handkerchiefs—the first of the kind ever made in Britain—was disposed of in a few hours, and fresh demands poured so rapidly in upon the exulting artist that the remaining half of his little web was bespoken before it was woven More yarn was procured with all speed, several looms were immediately filled with handkerchiefs of the same pattern, and the demand increased in proportion to the quantity of cloth that was manufactured The English merchants who resorted to Glasgow for thick linens were highly pleased with the new manufacture, and as they carried a few away with them, these rapidly sold, and the goods met with universal approbation. The number of looms daily increased, and in a few years Glasgow became celebrated for this branch of the linen trade. Variety in patterns and colours was soon introduced, the weavers in Paisley and the adjoining towns engaged in the business, and it soon became both lucrative and extensive. Manufactures having once obtained a footing in Glasgow, others of a more important kind were attracted to the spot. Checks were followed by the blanks or linen cloth for printing, to these were added the muslin, and finally the cotton trade, &c., which have elevated Glasgow to one of the proudest commercial and manufacturing cities in the world. It is painful to record, however, that neither William Flakefield, nor any of his descendants, ever received any reward or mark of approbation for the good services rendered by him, not only to Glasgow, but to the kingdom at large. Flakefield, however having, during his service in the army, learned to beat the drum, was in his old age promoted to the office of town-drummer in which situation he continued till his death

FLEMING, a surname derived from Flandrensis, a native of Flanders. In the Chartularies of Paisley and Kelso, it is written Flandrensis, Flaming, and Flammaticus, originally borne by one who came from Flanders. Among those who accompanied William the Conqueror to England was Sir Michael le Fleming, a relative of Baldwin earl of Flanders, whose descendants still exist, and enjoy a baronetcy, in the county of Westmoreland The Scots Flemings descended from natives of Flanders, the most enterprising merchants of their time, who in the twelfth century emigrated first to England, whence being banished they removed into Scotland [Chalmers' Caledonia, vol 1 page 600] Several of this name are witnesses to charters of Malcolm the Fourth, William the Lion, and the three Alexanders. Baldwin, a distinguished Flemish leader, settled, with his followers, at Biggar in Lanarkshire under a grant of David the First. He was first designated Baldewin Flamingus, but assumed from his lands the name of Baldwin de Biger He was sheriff of Lanark under Malcolm the Fourth and William the First, and it has been supposed that this office became for some time hereditary in his family His descendants, though legally designed of Biggar, retained the original name of Fleming, as indicative of the country whence their ancestors derived their origin The Flemings of Biggar appear to have obtained a footing in Lanarkshire earlier than even the more celebrated race of Douglas, for about 1150, Baldwin de Biger witnessed the charter granting lands on Douglas water to Theobald the Fleming, and the first of the Douglas name on record is after 1175 (see page 42 of this volume, art. DOUGLAS).

Baldwin's son, Waldeve, was taken prisoner with William the Lion at the siege of Alnwick castle in 1174. Willielmus Flandrensis, supposed to be Waldeve's son, is witness to two charters of William the Lion, and also to a donation of Richard le Bard (now Baird) to the monastery of Kelso, which was confirmed by Alexander the Second in 1228.

Sir Malcolm Fleming, probably his son, was sheriff of the county of Dumbarton in the reign of Alexander the Third. At this period the Flemings were very numerous in Scotland. Dominus Johanes Flemingum, and eight other principal persons of the name, swore fealty to Edward the First in 1296.

Sir Robert Fleming, supposed to have been the son of Sir Malcolm, was one of the chief men of Scotland who proposed the marriage of the Princess Margaret of Scotland to Prince Edward at Brigham, 12th March 1289-90 Although he had sworn fealty to the English monarch, he was among the first to join Robert the Bruce in his attempt to obtain the crown, and recover the independence, of Scotland, and assisted at the slaughter of Comyn at Dumfries in 1305 The barony of Cumbernauld in Lanarkshire, which had belonged to the Comyns, was, with the barony of Leny, bestowed on him by King Robert. He died before 1314 He had two sons, Sir Malcolm, his successor, and Sir Patrick Fleming, sheriff of Peebles, who got the barony of Biggar by his marriage with one of the daughters and coheiresses of the brave Sir Simon Fraser, lord of Oliver castle, county of Peebles, upon which account this branch of the Flemings quartered the arms of Fraser with their own

The elder son, Sir Malcolm Fleming of Cumbernauld, stood high in the favour of Robert the Bruce, by whom he was appointed sheriff of the county, and governor of the castle of Dumbarton He got grants of the whole barony of Kirkintilloch, which had also been their property, also of the lands of Auchindonan in the Lennox, and of the lands of Poltoun in Wigtonshire

His son, Sir Malcolm, also governor of Dumbarton castle, firmly adhered to the fortunes of King David Bruce, even when most overclouded. At the battle of Halidonhill, 19th July 1333, he was engaged in the second body of the Scots army, and was one of the few that escaped the carnage of that disastrous day He immediately secured the castle of Dumbarton, the last resource of the remaining adherents of the young king, then in his ninth year, and resolutely defended it against the English. For safety King David and his queen were conveyed to France, being attended thither by Sir Malcolm Fleming On the return of the latter he kept the castle of Dumbarton against Edward Baliol and the English and in it gave shelter to the high steward of Scotland, afterwards Robert the Second, who, after the fatal battle of Halidonhill, had first taken refuge in the island of Bute. Sir Malcolm subsequently went to France, and accompanied King David and his queen on their return to Scotland, in May 1341 (see Dalrymple's Annals, vol ii. p. 209, note). On 9th November 1342 he was created by his grateful sovereign earl of Wigton The king also bestowed on him a grant of regality, with power to judge in the four pleas of the crown. It is supposed that by this grant, the king intended, besides rewarding his fidelity, to circumscribe the overgrown power of the Douglases, lords of Galloway The earl of Wigton was taken prisoner at the battle of Durham 17th October 1346, and with his royal master and others was conducted to a long and dreary captivity in the Tower of London He sat in the meeting of the Scots estates at Edinburgh 26th September 1357, when commissioners were appointed to conclude the treaty for the release of King David, after a captivity of eleven years, which was accordingly done at Berwick on the 3d October following. The earl's seal is appended to the concluded treaty His only son, John, was one of the hostages for the ransom of King David, but he is said to have died before his father in 1351 The earl is supposed to have had also two daughters, the one married to Sir John Danzelston of that ilk, and the other, Marjory, to William de Fawside.

His grandson, Thomas Fleming, second earl of Wigton was also one of the hostages for King David, and as such he was in custody of the sheriff of Northumberland, 10th November 1358. He sold the earldom of Wigton to Archibald Douglas, lord of Galloway, who could not brook the erection of a new regality within his territory, and resolved to obtain it for himself The deed of sale, dated at Edinburgh 8th February 1371-2, was confirmed by King Robert the Second, on 7th October following Thereafter Sir Thomas Fleming ceased to be styled earl of Wigton, the title in those feudal times being inseparably connected with the territory which conferred it. He died without issue, and was succeeded by his cousin, Sir Malcolm Fleming of Biggar, the son of Sir Patrick, above mentioned.

Sir Malcolm Fleming, who thus inherited Cumbernauld as well as his own patrimony of Biggar, was taken prisoner at the battle of Durham, but soon made his escape. In 1364 he held the office of sheriff of Dumbarton He had two sons, Sir David, his successor, and Patrick, ancestor of the Flemings of Bord

Sir David Fleming of Biggar and Cumbernauld, the elder son, received a safe-conduct to pass into England, 20th May 1365 He distinguished himself at the battle of Otterbourn in 1388, and on 6th July 1404 he was one of the commissioners for a truce with the English He attended James prince of Scotland to the Bass in February 1405, and saw him safe on board the ship appointed to carry him to France, when on the voyage he was taken prisoner by the English. On his return home Sir David was attacked by James Douglas of Balvenv, afterwards seventh earl of Douglas, and killed at Longherdmanstoun, six miles west of Edinburgh, on the 14th of that month He was buried at Holyroodhouse Wintoun says of him

> "Schire Davy Fleming of Cumbernald
> Lord, a knycht stout and bald
> Trowit and luvit wel with the king;
> This like gud and gentyl knycht
> That wes baith manful, lele, and wycht."

He married, first, Jean, only daughter of Sir David Barclay of Brechin, and by her had a daughter, Marion, who became the wife of William Maule of Panmure, and in her right the latter claimed the barony of Brechin He married, secondly, Isabel, heiress of Monvcabow, by whom he had two sons, Sir Malcolm and David

Sir Malcolm, the elder son, was knighted by King Robert the Third. He was one of the hostages for James the First, when he was allowed to visit Scotland on 31st May 1421 He was also one of the hostages for his release, by the treaty of 4th December 1423, when his annual revenue was estimated at six hundred marks. He had a safe-conduct to go to England, to meet James the First, 13th December that year He was among those arrested with Murdoch duke of Albany in 1425 but was soon released He was the friend and counsellor of William sixth earl of Douglas, and on the treacherous invitation of the governor Livingston and the chancellor Crichton, he accompanied the former with his brother, David Douglas, to the castle of Edinburgh on 24th November 1440, when they were summarily arrested, and after a brief and hurried trial beheaded, Sir Malcolm Fleming sharing their fate. [See p. 44 of this volume, art. DOUGLAS.] He married Lady Elisabeth Stewart, third daughter of the regent, Robert duke of Albany, and by her had two sons, Malcolm and Robert, and a daughter, Margaret, married to Patrick, master of Gray

Malcolm, the elder son, is specified as one of the supplementary hostages for King James the First, 9th November 1427, and released 20th June 1432 He appears to have died before his father, without issue.

Sir Robert, the younger and only surviving son, entered a protest against the illegal and unwarrantable sentence of execution and forfeiture passed on his father, and King James the Second, when he came of age, issued precepts for infefting him as heir of his father, who was found by inquests to have died at the faith and peace of his majesty A safe-conduct was granted to him to accompany Sir James Stewart, called the Black Knight of Lorn, to England, 22d November 1447 He was created a peer of parliament, by the title of Lord Fleming, but the date of creation is not known, probably by James the Second, who died in 1460 His name occurs in the records of parliament, 11th October 1466 He had a safe-conduct to pass into England, with twenty persons in his retinue, 2d November 1484, and died in 1494 He was twice married, and by his first wife, Lady Janet Douglas, third daughter of James, seventh earl of Douglas, he had two sons and two daughters.

Malcolm Fleming of Monvcabow, the elder son was one of the commissioners appointed to negociate the marriage of James prince of Scotland and Cecilia, daughter of Edward the Fourth, 18th October 1474 He died before his father He married Euphemie, daughter of James Lord Livingston, and by her had two sons and two daughters Sir David, the elder son, died in the lifetime of his grandfather

John the younger son, second Lord Fleming, was one of the three lords appointed in July 1515, guardians of King James the Fifth in his infancy He was sent ambassador to France, and on his return he was, in January 1517, appointed chancellor of Scotland In 1519, he was sent over to France to urge the regent duke of Albany to return to Scotland; and he was one of the three noblemen appointed by parliament 1528, to abide with King James the Fifth, each for three months. He was assassinated while enjoying the sport of hawking, by John Tweedie of Drummelzier, James Tweedie his son, and others, 1st November 1524. He married, first, Euphemia, fifth daughter of David Lord Drummond, and by her, who was poisoned with two of her sisters in 1501, (see p. 68 of this volume, article DRUMMOND,) he had issue. He married, secondly, Lady Margaret Stewart, eldest daughter of Matthew second earl of Lennox. She got a charter from her husband of the lands of Biggar and Thankertoun March 12, 1508-9 They were soon after divorced, and she resigned the lands in his favour October 26, 1516, and was then designed 'olim reputate sponsa dicti Johannis.' She afterwards married Alexander Douglas of Mains. In 1508 he had been denounced rebel at the king's horn, and fined in the penalty of five hundred merks for not entering John Fleming of Boghall, for whom he had become surety or bail, for trial, charged with art and part of the rape or ravishment of the said Lady Margaret Stewart Lord Fleming married, thirdly, Agnes Somerville, whose parentage is not stated.

Malcolm, third Lord Fleming, the eldest son, born about 1494, was great chamberlain of Scotland. On December 1, 1539 he was constituted sheriff of Tweeddale and Peebles. A great number of charters were granted to him of lands in the counties of Peebles and Roxburgh. He accompanied King James the Fifth on his matrimonial expedition to France in August 1537, and was made prisoner at the rout of Solway in November 1542, but obtained his liberty 1st July 1543, on paying a ransom of one thousand merks sterling. In August of the same year he was one of the nobility to whom was committed the safe keeping of the queen-mother and the infant queen Mary in Stirling castle. When the project of marriage between Queen Mary and Prince Edward of England was set on foot, he at first joined the English party, but soon deserted it. He had been accused of treason, but parliament, on 3d October 1545, declared that he was innocent of all crimes alleged against him, and a true baron and liege to the queen. He was grand carver to William St. Clair, earl of Orkney, the founder of Roslin chapel, who lived in Roslin castle in the style of a prince. In 1545 Lord Fleming founded the collegiate church of Biggar, and largely endowed it for the support of a provost, eight prebendaries, four singing boys, and six poor men It is built in the form of a cross, the fabric is still entire, but the steeple and spire have never been finished He was killed at the battle of Pinkie, 10th September 1547, in the 53d year of his age By his wife, Johanna or Ionet Stewart, natural daughter of King James the Fourth, he had two sons, James, fourth lord, and John, fifth lord, and four daughters.

James, fourth Lord Fleming, with Lord Erskine, accompanied the young Queen Mary to France in 1548, her majesty having been committed to their faith and care. With them also went the Lady Fleming, his lordship's mother and aunt of the queen, with twelve young ladies and two hundred gentlemen and servants. He was continued great chamberlain of Scotland for life by letters patent under the great seal, 10th March 1558 He was also appointed guardian of the east and middle marches, and invested with a power of justiciary within the limits of his jurisdiction He was one of the eight commissioners elected by parliament, 18th December 1557, to represent the Scottish nation at the nuptials of Queen Mary with Francis, dauphin of France, 24th April 1558. Three of these commissioners died at Dieppe, on their return to Scotland, on the night of the 28th November 1558, supposed to have been poisoned Lord Fleming, who was also suddenly taken ill at Dieppe, being the youngest of them, was not immediately cut off and in the hope of recovery, hastened to Paris, where he died on the 15th December following, in the twenty-fourth year of his age He married Lady Barbara Hamilton eldest daughter of the regent duke of Chatelherault, and had by her one daughter

He was succeeded by his brother, John, fifth Lord Fleming who was appointed great chamberlain of Scotland for life, by commission, dated 30th June 1565, and in 1567 he had a grant of the office of justiciary within the bounds of the overward of Clydesdale, and sheriffdom of Peebles, and governor of the castle of Dumbarton, which he secured for Queen Mary He entered into the association on her behalf at Hamilton, 8th May 1568, and after the battle of Langside, he and Lord Livingston and the master of Maxwell, accompanied her majesty when she fled to Carlisle. He was forfeited by parliament, 17th November 1569 During the civil war that followed, he held out the castle of Dumbarton for the queen till it was taken by surprise on 2d April 1571, by Captain Thomas Crawford of Jordanhill, who scaled the rock during the night, and made prisoners of the garrison. Lord Fleming, the governor, managed to escape down the face of an almost perpendicular cleft or gully in the rock, and passing through a postern which opened on the Clyde, threw himself into a fishing-boat, and sailed over to Argyleshire. Thence he proceeded to France to obtain succours. He returned to Scotland in June 1572, and was mortally wounded by some French soldiers discharging their pieces for a volley on their entrance into Edinburgh, some of the bullets, rebounding from the causeway, having hit him above the knee, 5th July following. He was carried to the castle of Edinburgh, whence he was conveyed, in a litter, to Biggar, where he died of his wounds on the 6th September the same year. He married Elizabeth, only child of Robert, master of Ross, killed at Pinkie in 1547, and had a son, John, and three daughters. Among the prisoners taken at Dumbarton castle when that fortress was surprised in 1571, was Lady Fleming, the wife of the governor. She was treated by the regent with great courtesy, and permitted to go free, and to carry away with her, her plate and furniture.

John, sixth Lord Fleming, the only son, was created earl of Wigton, Lord Fleming and Cumbernauld, by patent dated at Whitehall, 19th March 1606. [See WIGTON, earl of.]

An ancient family of the name of Fleming possess the estate of Barochan in Renfrewshire. William Fleming (Flandrensis) of Barochan is mentioned as a witness to a charter granted by Malcolm earl of Lennox to Walter Spruel, in the reign of Alexander the Third, and in another charter of James high steward of Scotland, grandfather of Robert the Second [Nisbet's Heraldry, vol. i. p. 158, erroneously printed 192.] One of his successors, William Fleming of Barochan, was sheriff of Lanark in the reign of James the Fourth, and with six of his sons, was slain at the fatal battle of Flodden. In Crawfurd's Description of Renfrewshire and in the Old Statistical Account of Scotland, this laird of Barochan is called William, but in the New Statistical Account he receives the name of Peter, it being conjectured that he had two proper names. In those days, however, it was not usual for a person of his rank to bear more than one proper name. In 1488 William Fleming of Barochan was one of the arbiters betwixt the abbot of Paisley and the town of Renfrew. He was an expert falconer, and his tersel beat the falcon of James the Fourth, upon which the king took the hood from his favourite hawk, and put it on the tersel. The hood, which was richly ornamented with precious stones, and a pair of silver spurs which belonged to Fleming, are still preserved in the family. Most of the precious stones were stolen. One only remained of great value, but about 1832 it fell out, and not being missed at the time, it was lost. A few seed pearls only now remain. Falconry was long practised at Barochan. John Anderson, falconer on the estate, was present, in appropriate costume, under the patronage of the duke of Athol, at the coronation of George the Fourth. The above William or Peter Fleming, who by his wife Marion Houston, a daughter of the family of Houston, had seven sons, was succeeded by the youngest, James, from whom in direct descent was Alexander Fleming of Barochan who, with two of his sons, was in 1596 pursued at law by Patrick Maxwell of Dargavel, for the forcible abduction of Rebecca Maxwell his daughter. [Pitcairn's Criminal Trials, vol. i. p. 377.] This was a crime rarely attempted but with heiresses. He died in September 1622. He was succeeded by his second son, William, the eldest having predeceased him. The son of this William, Malcolm Fleming of Barochan, married in 1780, Elizabeth, eldest daughter of William Fergusson of Doonholm in Ayrshire, and had by her, with four daughters, two sons, namely, John, who died young, and William Malcolm Fleming, who succeeded his father, on his death in 1818. William Malcolm Fleming of Barochan Tower, a magistrate and deputy lieutenant of Renfrew, and a commissioner of supply for that county, was at one period in the civil service of the East India Company in the Bengal presidency.

One of the most striking antiquities of Renfrewshire is Barochan Cross, an ancient stone monument, the history of which is involved in obscurity. It is described in the Old Statistical Account, and in the Topographical, Statistical, and Historical Gazetteer of Scotland, (under the article HOUSTON, in which parish it is situated). It first stood in the barony of Barochan on the side of the public road, but was removed by Malcolm Fleming of Barochan (who died in 1818) to a neighbouring hill, where the old mansion-house of Barochan formerly stood. This house is reputed to have been burnt by the English, during one of the invasions of Scotland by Edward the First. An engraving of Barochan Cross, which is eleven feet high, forms the frontispiece (both the east and the west sides being represented) of Hamilton of Wishaw's Description of the shires of Lanark and Renfrew, printed by the Maitland Club in 1831, in one volume quarto.

Sir Alexander Fleming of Ferm, commissary of Glasgow, was created a baronet of Nova Scotia in 1666, but dying without issue, the title appears to have become extinct.

FLEMING, ROBERT, a much esteemed divine of the seventeenth century, author of the 'Fulfilling of the Scripture,' and other religious works, was born in 1630, at Bathans, or Yester, in East Lothian, of which parish his father, James Fleming, who was son-in-law of John Knox, having married Martha, the eldest daughter of the great reformer, was long the minister. The subject of this notice was his son by a second marriage. He was a very sickly child, and in his boyhood he nearly lost his life by the stroke of a club, which for some time affected his eyesight. These facts he himself recorded in a brief record found in manuscript after his decease, which he entitled 'A short Index of some of the great appearances of the Lord in the dispensation of his providences to his poor servant.' His choice of the ministry seems to have been fixed from a circumstance recorded in a short note in the 'Index,' where he specifies as a gracious manifestation from God, "a strange and extraordinary impression I had of an audible voice in the church at night, when being a child, I had got up to the pulpit, calling me to make haste." After having acquired the usual rudiments by part of education, he was sent first to the university of Edinburgh, and afterward to that of St. Andrews, and at the latter place he studied divinity under Samuel Rutherford. "At the age of twenty, and probably at the close of his college life," says one of his biographers, "and before he had been licensed to preach, we find him in the ranks of the Scottish army under David Leslie, but whether as a military volunteer in arms, or as a non-combatant, we cannot now discover It is certain, however, that he was present at the disastrous conflict at Dunbar, and had a full share in its dangers, experiencing also, as he has noted in his 'Index,' 'the Lord's gracious and signal preservation and deliverance'" He was soon after licensed, and in 1653, when the Church of Scotland was purely presbyterian, he was ordained minister of Cambuslang, in Lanarkshire, where he remained till after the Restoration In 1662, in consequence of the passing of the Glasgow act, he was ejected, along with four hundred other ministers, on the attempt to establish episcopacy in Scotland After this he resided mostly at Edinburgh, and in Fifeshire, and other parts of Scotland, preaching when opportunity offered, till September 1673, when he was summoned, along with the ejected ministers in Edinburgh and its neighbourhood, to appear before the privy council, to receive sentence of imprisonment, and have the place of his ward appointed, on which he withdrew to London During the following year his wife, who had remained in Scotland, died, when he ventured to return to his native country On his journey north he fell under the York coach the great wheel of which passed over his left leg, but without doing him any injury After making some stay in Scotland, he returned to London, preaching, as formerly, among the presbyterian congregations of the English metropolis and the adjacent counties In 1677 he received a call from the congregation of the Scots church at Rotterdam, to become their minister, which he cordially accepted In 1678 he passed over to Edinburgh for the purpose of bringing his children to Holland with him While in that city he ventured, in spite of the severe laws against holding conventicles, to collect meetings of his old friends, for preaching and devotional exercises, for which he was arrested and thrown into the Tolbooth, where he remained several months. A short time after the battle of Bothwell Bridge, he was brought before the council He agreed to their demand to give bail for his appearance when called upon, but refused to consent to yield passive obedience to the royal authority, in all things, and was in consequence remanded to prison He was soon, however, liberated, when he returned to Rotterdam He was escorted to the ship by three of his friends, and after an interval of silence, he was overheard uttering to himself that "God will put a period to the race of the Stuarts, and that very shortly" After the Revolution of 1688, he repeatedly visited London, where he remained several months at a time During one of these visits, in the summer of 1694, he was attacked with his last illness, a fever He died on the 25th July that year, in the fifty-eighth year of his age He was the author of the following works

The Fulfilling of the Scripture or an Essay, shewing the exact accomplishment of the word of God, in his works of providence performed, and to be performed, for confirming the believers, and convincing the atheists of the present time, containing in the end, a few rare histories of the works and servants of God in the Church of Scotland First part, Rotterdam, 1669, folio. The Second part, under the title of The Faithfulness of God, considered and cleared in the great event of his word, was afterwards published and the Third part had the title of The Great Appearances of God for his Church, under the New Testament, with many choice speeches of suffering and dying Christians. FLEMING, ROBERT, a learned and pious divine, author of 'The Rise and Fall of the Papacy,' and other religious works, son of the preceding, with whom he is often confounded, was born at Cambuslang, in Lanarkshire, during his father's incumbency of that parish, although the precise year of his birth is not known He received the rudiments of his education in Scotland, and studied for the ministry, first at the university of Leyden, and subsequently at that of Utrecht, in Holland He has himself recorded in his 'Christology,' that, when very young, his overhearing his father declare in conversation with some friends, that he had bound himself by a solemn resolution, while at college, to prosecute the study of divinity for life, divesting himself, as far as possible, of all prejudices, whether of education, party, or interest, determined him to devote himself to the ministry, with a similar preparation After having studied with great diligence and care, the classical writers, the philosophers of the heathen world, and the fathers of the Christian church, and made himself thoroughly master of the controversies of the day, he finally returned exclusively to the study of the Bible In 1688 he was, by several ministers of the Church of Scotland, at that time refugees in Holland, privately ordained to the ministry, but without being set apart, as pastor, over any particular charge Soon after he repaired to England as domestic chaplain to a private family, and remained there for about four years At this period he published several poetical productions, which, like many contemporary pieces of a similar kind, have passed into hopeless obscurity On his return to Holland, he received, in 1692, an invitation from the English presbyterian church at Leyden, to become their minister, with which he complied On the death of his father, two years thereafter, he received a call to his vacant charge at Rotterdam, and was accordingly inducted to the Scots church there in 1695 In little more than three years he received an invitation from the Presbyterian church congregation of Lothbury, London, to which King William the Third, who, when prince of Orange, had known him in Holland, added the weight of his personal request, and having accepted it, he removed to London, and became their minister in the middle of 1698 His majesty had such a high opinion of his learning, wisdom, and abilities, that he frequently consulted him on the affairs of Scotland, but so great was his modesty that his interviews with the king were always conducted in secrecy at his own express desire He was held in high estimation both by churchmen and dissenters, and in particular was on terms of friendship with the archbishop of Canterbury and other church dignitaries. By the dissenting ministers of London, although he belonged to another communion, he was elected one of the preachers of the Merchants' Tuesday Lecture at Salter's Hall Satisfied with his position, he not only refused several parochial charges in Scotland, but even declined the office of principal of the university of Glasgow, which had been placed within his reach by his kinsman Lord Carmichael, secretary of state for Scotland, and chancellor of that university, to whom he dedicated his 'Discourses on Several Subjects' published in 1701 In his dedication he mentions his being related to his lordship, and acknowledges his obligations for the offer of the principalship, which circumstances, he says, had compelled him to decline

After distinguishing himself by his writings as a firm friend to the British constitution and the protestant religion, Mr Fleming died at London, May 24, 1716 Of the various sermons and tracts of which he was the author, the most celebrated is his 'Discourse on the Rise and Fall of the Papacy,' published in London in 1701 This remarkable work contains several passages founded on what he himself modestly calls a "conjectural" interpretation of the pouring out of the fourth vial in the Revelation, which strikingly coincide with the early events of the first French revolution, particularly as relates to the downfall of the monarchy The Discourse, which had been almost forgotten for nearly a century, was by that astounding outbreak suddenly recalled to recollection Fleming's words, written in 1701, are "There is ground to hope that about the beginning of another such century, things may again alter for the better, for I cannot but hope that some new mortification of the chief supporters of Antichrist will then happen, and, perhaps, the French monarchy may begin to be considerably humbled about that time that whereas the present French king takes the sun for his emblem, and this for his motto, 'nec pluribus impar,' (a match for many,) he may at length, or rather his successors, and the monarchy itself, at least before the year 1794, be forced to acknowledge that in respect to neighbouring potentates he is even 'singulis impar' (not a match for one) But as to the expiration of this vial, I do fear it will not be until the year 1794" And again, "We may justly suppose that the French monarchy, after it has scorched others, will itself consume by doing so, its fire, and that which is the fuel that maintains it, wasting insensibly, till it be exhausted towards the end of this century, as the Spanish monarchy did before towards the end of the sixteenth age" It was in the commencement of 1793, when Louis the Sixteenth was about to die by the guillotine, that Fleming's speculations, guesses, or conjectures, written ninety years before, and found to have been correct, were recalled to remembrance, and brought before public attention, not only by extracts published in newspapers, but by reprints of the work itself, both in England and America It was also translated into different languages After these events had passed away the work again fell into neglect, when the revolution of 1848 again brought it into notice Referring to Italy, Fleming says, "The fifth vial, which is to be poured out on the seat of the Beast, or the dominions that more immediately belong to, and depend upon, the Roman see, that, I say, this judgment will probably begin about the year 1794, and expire about the year 1848" The latter year, according to his interpretation of apocalyptical prophecy, he believes to be the date of the commencement of the downfall of the papal power, not rapid and sudden, but by gradual though sure decay "We are not to imagine," he says, "that this vial will totally destroy the Papacy (though it will exceedingly weaken it), for we find this still in being and alive when the next vial is poured out" With regard to the pouring out of the sixth vial, current events (in 1853) give a wonderful significancy to his words "The sixth vial," he says, "will be poured out upon the Mohammedan Antichrist as the former was on the papacy, and seeing the sixth trumpet brought the Turks from beyond the Euphrates, from their crossing which river they date their rise, this sixth vial dries up their waves and exhausts their power, as the means and way to prepare and dispose the Eastern kings and kingdoms to renounce their heathenish and Mohammedan errors, in order to their receiving and embracing Christianity"

"Supposing then that the Turkish monarchy should be totally destroyed between 1848 and 1900, we may justly assign seventy or eighty years longer to the end of the sixth seal, and but twenty or thirty at most to the last." The year 2000 he calculates as the commencement of the millennium A neat and carefully edited edition of 'The Rise and Fall of the Papacy,' reprinted from the edition of 1701, with an interesting memoir of the author, prefixed by the Rev Thomas Thomson, was published at Edinburgh in 1849

FLETCHER, a surname derived from the French word flecke, an arrow, and signifying either an arrow-maker, or more generally, a superintendent of archery The surname is not confined to Scotland, the names of Flecharius and le Flecher being of frequent occurrence in the public records of England of Richard the First and King John.

The most distinguished family of this name in Scotland were the Fletchers of Salton in the county of Haddington, that estate in the parish of that name (which gives the title of lord to the head of the Frasers of Philorth, first conferred on the Abernethys of that ilk, see SALTOUN, lord) having been purchased from Alexander Lord Abernethy in 1643, by Sir Andrew Fletcher of Innerpeffer and Benclee, Forfarshire, an eminent lawyer, and one of the senators of the college of justice. He was the eldest son of Robert Fletcher of Innerpeffer, and was admitted an ordinary judge, 18th December 1623. In 1626 he was continued on the bench when so many of his brethren were displaced. [Balfour's Annals, vol ii p. 130] In 1633 he was appointed a member of a parliamentary commission for examining the laws and collecting the local practices of the country, in order to a general codification of the laws written and unwritten, but which seems not to have made any progress, owing to the subsequent troubles. At the same time he was required to examine Sir Thomas Craig's work, 'De Feudes,' with a view to its publication In 1641 he was reappointed a lord of session. The minutes of parliament bear that the laird of Moncrieff objected to his appointment on the ground that Lord Inner peffer had incapacitated himself by buying lands under litigation, but although the matter was referred to the privy council, nothing came of the accusation, and Sir Andrew retained his seat. He was commissioner to the estates for the county of Angus, and was appointed on 1st February 1645, one of the commissioners of the exchequer, and in 1647 one of the committee of estates and of the committee of the war, for the county of Haddington. According to Guthrie (Memoirs, p. 191) he was in the interest of King Charles the First, and canvassed the members of parliament in his favour, as to whether he should be left to the English army without conditions made in his behalf. He gained a majority, which, however, was lost by the supineness of the duke of Hamilton. He was one of the four commissioners for the shires who alone of all that body voted against it. In 1648 he was again appointed a member of the committee of estates and of war for Haddington and for Forfar. He died in March 1650, at his house in East Lothian. He married a daughter of Peter Hay of Kirkland. His elder son, Andrew Fletcher of Salton, was the celebrated patriot, of whom a memoir is subsequently given. The latter was succeeded in the estate, on his death in 1716, by his brother, Henry Fletcher of Salton, who married in 1688, Mary, daughter of Sir David Carnegie of Pitarrow. His son, Andrew Fletcher, was the celebrated judge, Lord Milton, of whom also a memoir is given in its place. Lord Milton married Elizabeth, daughter of Sir Francis Kinloch of Gilmerton, and had a son, General John Fletcher Campbell of Salton, Haddingtonshire, and Boquhan, Stirlingshire. The latter married in 1795, Ann Threipland, and had two sons, Andrew Fletcher of Salton Hall born 20th August 1796, a magistrate and deputy lieutenant of the county of Haddington. He married Lady Charlotte Charteris, second daughter of the earl of Wemyss and March, and has issue. A second son, Harry Fletcher, succeeded to the estate of Boquhan, when he assumed the additional name of Campbell. He married Ann daughter of Hugh Hawthorn, Esq. of Castlewig, by whom he has four sons.

FLETCHER, ANDREW, a celebrated political writer and patriot, the son of Sir Robert Fletcher of Salton, in East Lothian, by Catherine, daughter of Sir Henry Bruce of Clackmannan, was born in 1653. His father dying while he was yet a child, he was placed, by his father's request on his deathbed, under the tuition of the afterwards celebrated Dr Burnet, bishop of Salisbury, then minister of the parish of Salton, when episcopacy was dominant in Scotland, and from him he is said to have imbibed that attachment to free principles of government for which he became so eminent. He spent some years in foreign travel, and on his return home he first appeared as a public character in the Scots parliament of 1681 as commissioner for East Lothian, when his spirited opposition to the arbitrary measures of the court rendered his retirement to Holland essential for his safety. Not appearing to a summons from the lords of the council, he was outlawed, and his estate confiscated. In 1688 he accompanied Baillie of Jerviswood to England, to assist in the consultations held among the friends of liberty for the concerting of measures for their common security. On his return to the continent, he devoted his time chiefly to the study of public law.

In June 1685 he landed with the duke of Monmouth at Lyme in Dorsetshire, and was appointed to command the cavalry under Lord Grey of Wark, in Monmouth's enterprise against James II of England. They had arrived from Holland, in the Helderenbergh, a ship of 26 guns, and had previously landed one of the refugees named Thomas Dare, a man who, having great influence at Taunton, was directed to hasten thither across the country, and to apprize his friends that Monmouth would soon arrive. What follows may be given in Lord Macaulay's words. "Fletcher was ill mounted, and indeed there were few chargers in the camp which had not been taken from the plough. When he was ordered to Bridport, he thought that the exigency of the case warranted him in borrowing, without asking permission, a fine horse belonging to Dare. Dare resented this liberty, and assailed Fletcher with gross abuse. Fletcher kept his temper better than any who knew him expected. At last Dare, presuming on the patience with which his insolence was endured, ventured to shake a switch at the high-born and high-spirited Scot. Fletcher's blood boiled. He drew a pistol, and shot Dare dead. There was a general cry for vengeance on the foreigner who had murdered an Englishman. Monmouth could not resist the clamour. Fletcher, who, when his first burst of rage had spent itself, was overwhelmed with remorse and sorrow, took refuge on board of the Helderenbergh, and escaped to the continent." He first went to Spain, where he was thrown into prison, but soon made his escape. He afterwards passed into Hungary, where he highly distinguished himself in the war against the Turks. He subsequently rejoined his expatriated countrymen in Holland, and at the Revolution returned to Scotland. He was a member of the convention for settling the new government in his native country, and throughout his political career he zealously maintained the rights and liberties of the people.

In 1703, when a bill was brought in for a supply to the Crown, he opposed it, until the House should consider what was necessary to secure the religion and liberties of the nation on the death of the queen; and he proposed various limitations of the royal prerogative, some of which were introduced into the 'Act of Security,' passed, through his exertions, into a law, but rendered ineffectual by the subsequent Union, which he resolutely opposed He died in London in 1716, on his way from France to Scotland, and was buried in the family vault below the aisle of Salton church His personal appearance is thus described "A low thin man, of a brown complexion, full of fire, with a stern sour look" His life has been written by the late earl of Buchan, who, as well as Laing in his History of Scotland, and Lockhart of Carnwath, speaks in high terms of panegyric of his political and other virtues As a writer, he possessed great powers, his mind being stored with classical knowledge, while his style was at once perspicuous, elegant, and energetic The following are his works

FLETCHER, ANDREW, LORD MILTON, a distinguished judge, was the son of Henry Fletcher of Salton, younger brother of the preceding, by a daughter of Sir David Carnegie of Pitarrow, bart, grand-daughter of David earl of Southesk This lady appears to have been a woman of singular merit and enterprise. During the troubles in which the Fletcher family were involved, on account of their well-known attachment to the principles of civil and religious liberty, she went to Holland, taking with her a millwright and a weaver, both men of great talent in their respective departments, and by their means she secretly obtained a knowledge of the art of weaving and dressing the fine linen known by the name of "Holland," the manufacture of which she introduced into the village of Salton. Andrew, the eldest son, was born in 1692, and after having obtained an education to qualify him for the bar, was admitted advocate on February 26, 1717; was made cashier of the excise in 1718; created one of the lords of session June 4, 1724, and lord justice-clerk July 21, 1735, which office he relinquished on being appointed principal keeper of the signet in 1748. On 5th July 1726, he had been named by patent one of the commissioners for improving the fisheries and manufactures in Scotland

The acuteness of Lord Milton's understanding, his judgment and address, and his minute knowledge of the laws, customs, and temper of Scotland, recommended him early to the notice and favour of Archibald duke of Argyle, who, as minister for Scotland, employed him as his confidential agent and adviser in all matters relating to his native country During the rebellion of 1745 he acted with so much discretion and humanity, that even the defeated party acknowledged themselves indebted to him for his lenient measures. He disregarded many of the secret informations which came to his office through the channels of officious malevolence; and it has been recorded to his honour, that, after his death, many sealed letters, containing denunciations of private individuals, were found unopened in his repositories.

In the abolition of the heritable jurisdictions, Lord Milton took an active part, and he no sooner observed the beginning of public tranquillity, than he zealously devoted himself to the promotion of designs for the improvement of trade, manufactures, agriculture, and learning, in Scotland, which, during the period that he had the administration of affairs, exhibited in all their branches a more rapid advance than any country in Europe Lord Milton died at his house of Brunstain near Musselburgh, December 13, 1766, aged 74.

FLETCHER, ARCHIBALD, styled the father of burgh reform, was born in Glenlyon, Perthshire, in 1745 He was the son of Angus Fletcher, a younger brother of Archibald Fletcher, Esq of Bennice and Dunans, Argyleshire He served his apprenticeship with a writer to the signet in Edinburgh, and was afterwards admitted into partnership with his master, Mr. Wilson of Howden. In 1790, at the age of forty-five, he passed advocate, and in course of time obtained a very extensive practice at the bar. Many years previously he had effectually opposed, in a well written pamphlet, addressed to the society of writers to the signet, the adoption of a resolution by the faculty of advocates, limiting the age of admission of members to twenty-seven years—a resolution which, if acted upon, would have prevented himself from ever becoming an advocate In 1784, when burgh reform was first agitated in Scotland, he was chosen secretary to the society formed in Edinburgh at the time, and in 1787 he was one of the delegates despatched to London by the Scottish burghs to promote its objects He acted, without a fee, as counsel for Joseph Gerrald, and other 'friends of the people,' as they styled themselves, who were tried for sedition in 1793, and in 1796 he was one of the minority of thirty-eight who opposed the deposition of the Hon Henry Erskine, then dean of faculty In 1816, in consequence of declining health, he retired from the bar, to Parkhill, a farm which he had purchased in Stirlingshire, where he resided for some years He died at Auchindinny house, about eight miles from Edinburgh, on 20th December 1828 He married at the age of forty-six, a Miss Dawson from the vicinity of Doncaster, who was only about seventeen, and had several children His eldest son, Miles Fletcher, was educated for the bar He married Augusta, daughter of General Clavering, by whom he had a family After his death, in the prime of life, his widow married John Christison, Esq, advocate Another son, Angus Fletcher, relinquished the profession of a writer to the signet, for which he had been educated, and became a sculptor in London One of Mr Fletcher's daughters married John Taylor, Esq, at one time a member of parliament, and another, Dr Davy, a brother of the celebrated Sir Humphrey Davy "Mr Archibald Fletcher," says Lord Brougham, "was a learned, experienced, and industrious lawyer, one of the most upright men that ever adorned the profession, and a man of such stern and resolute firmness in public principle, as is very rarely found united with the amiable character which endeared him to private society." He was the author of several pamphlets of which only the following may be mentioned

An Essay on Church Patronage, in which he supported the popular side.

An Examination of the Grounds on which the Convention of Royal Burghs claimed the right of altering and amending the Setts or Constitution of the Individual Burghs. Edin. 1825, 8vo.

FORBES, the surname of a clan, though not a Celtic one, having its possessions principally in Aberdeenshire, and the chief of which is Lord Forbes; its badge being the common broom, and the gathering shout or slogan, Loanach, the name of a hill in the district of Strathdon

The traditions regarding the origin of the surname of Forbes are various, and some of them very fanciful. The principal of these, which seems to have been accepted by the family, as it is referred to by Sir Samuel Forbes in his 'View of the Diocese of Aberdeen,' (MS. quoted by the Statistical Account of Scotland, art. Tullynessle and Forbes,) states that this name was first assumed by one Ochonchar, from Ireland, who having slain a ferocious bear in that district, took the name of Forbear, now spelled and pronounced Forbes, in two syllables, although the English, in pronunciation make it only one. In consequence of this feat the Forbeses carry in their arms three bears' heads. A variation of this story says that the actor in this daring exploit was desirous of exhibiting his courage to the young and beautiful heiress of the adjacent castle, whose name being Bess, he, on receiving her hand as his reward, assumed it to commemorate his having killed the bear "for Bess." Another tradition states that the name of the founder of the family was originally Boss, a follower of one of our early Scots kings, and that on granting him certain lands for some extraordinary service, his majesty observed that they were "for Boise." The surname, however, is territorial, and said to be Celtic, from the Gaelic word Ferbash or Ferbasach, a bold man It seems more likely to have been originally Forbois, of a Latin-French derivation, signifying a wild wood country, where bears abounded According to Skene, in his treatise De Verborum Significatione, Duncan Forbois got from King Alexander (but which of the three kings of that name is not mentioned) a charter of the lands and heritage of Forbois in Aberdeenshire, whence the surname. In the reign of King William the Lion, John de Forbes possessed the lands of that name. His son, Fergus de Forbes, had a charter of the same from Alexander earl of Buchan, about 1236 Next of this race are Duncan de Forbes, his son, 1262, and Alexander de Forbes, grandson, governor of Urquhart castle in Moray, which he bravely defended for a long time, in 1304, against Edward the First of England, but on its surrender all within the castle were put to the sword, except the wife of the governor, who escaped to Ireland, and was there delivered of a posthumous son This son, Sir Alex. de Forbes, the only one of his family remaining, came to Scotland in the reign of Robert the Bruce, and his patrimonial inheritance of Forbes having been bestowed upon others, he obtained a grant of other lands instead He was killed at the battle of Duplin, in 1332, fighting valiantly on the side of King David, the son of Bruce. From his son, Sir John de Forbes, 1373, all the numerous families in Scotland who bear the name and their offshoots, trace their descent. (Lives Scot. Heroes, App.)

Sir John's posthumous son, Sir Alexander de Forbes, acquired from Thomas, earl of Mar, several lands in Aberdeenshire, the grant of which King Robert the Second ratified by his charter in the third year of his reign. By King

Robert the Third he was appointed justiciary of Aberdeen, and coroner of that county He is witness to a charter of Isobel, countess of Mar, of the lands of Bonjedworth to Thomas Douglas, her nephew, of date the 10th of November 1404. He died the following year By his wife, a daughter of Kennedy of Dunure, he had four sons, namely, Sir Alexander, his successor, the first Lord Forbes, Sir William, ancestor of the Lords Pitsligo (see PITSLIGO, lord); Sir John, who obtained the thanedom of Formartine (which now gives the title of viscount to the earl of Aberdeen) and the lands of Tolquhoun, by his marriage with Marjory, daughter and heiress of Sir Henry Preston of Formartine, knight, (of the Dingwall family,) and was ancestor of the Forbeses of Tolquhoun, Foveran, Watertoun, Culloden, and others of the name, and Alexander, founder of the family of Brux, and others.

Alexander, the eldest son, and first Lord Forbes, was among the Scottish forces sent to the assistance of Charles, dauphin of France, afterwards King Charles the Seventh, and had a share in the victory obtained over the English at Beaugé, in Anjou, 22d March 1421, but soon after, at the desire of King James the First, then a prisoner in England, he quitted the French service, with several others of the Scots auxiliaries, and subsequently obtained three safe-conducts at different times to visit England, with a hundred persons in his retinue each time, to wait upon his sovereign James the First. He was created a peer of parliament sometime after 1436 The precise date of creation is not known, but in a precept, directed by James the Second to the lords of the exchequer, dated 12th July 1442, he is styled Lord Forbes. He died in 1448. By his wife, Lady Elizabeth (sometimes called Lady Mary) Douglas, only daughter of George earl of Angus, and grand-daughter of King Robert the Second, he had two sons and three daughters.

James, the elder son, second Lord Forbes, was knighted by King James the Third. This nobleman built the strong castle of Druminner, in the parish of Forbes (now united to that of Tullynessle), the ancient seat of the Lords Forbes. The license to build it, obtained from James the Second, is dated 14th May 1456. He died soon after 1460 By his wife, Lady Egidia Keith, second daughter of the first earl Marischal, he had three sons and a daughter, namely, William, third Lord Forbes; Duncan, of Corsindae, ancestor (by his second son) of the Forbeses of Monymusk, and Patrick, the first of the family of Corse, progenitor of the Forbeses, baronets, of Craigievar, and of the Irish earls of Granard. The daughter, Egidia, became the wife of Malcolm Forbes of Tolquhoun

William, third Lord Forbes, married Lady Christian Gordon, third daughter of Alexander, first earl of Huntly, and had, with a daughter, three sons, Alexander, fourth lord; Arthur, fifth lord; and John sixth lord.

Alexander, fourth lord, attached himself to the party of King James the Third, and after that unfortunate monarch's assassination, on his flight from the field of Sauchieburn in June 1488, with a rent and blood-stained shirt, suspended from the end of a spear, as that of their murdered sovereign, he rode through Aberdeen and other places in the north of Scotland, and endeavoured, Mark Antony-like with the mantle of "dead Cæsar," to rouse the people to arms to avenge his death. A formidable insurrection was on the point of breaking out, when it was suddenly extinguished by the defeat of the earl of Lennox at Tillymoss near Stirling. Lord Forbes soon after submitted to the young king, James the Fourth, who gave to him in marriage his eldest cousin, Lady Grisel Boyd, only daughter of Thomas, earl of Arran grand-daughter of King James the Second. She had no issue to him, and he died, while yet young, before 16th May, 1491.

Arthur, fifth Lord Forbes, succeeded his brother, and being under age at the time, he was placed, as one of the king's wards, under the guardianship of John Lord Glammis, whose daughter he had married, but he died soon after his accession to the title, without children

His next brother, John, became sixth Lord Forbes, before 30th October 1496, at which date he is witness to a charter On July 29th, 1533, he and his two sons, John, master of Forbes, and William his brother, with William Forbes of Corsindae, and another, found security to appear at the next court of justiciary at Aberdeen, to take their trial for having treasonably set fire, under cloud of night, to certain sheep-pens, built of wood, belonging to the earl of Huntly, the Gordons and the Forbeses being at deadly feud, and on May 10th, 1536, the same parties found similar caution. In the latter year, however, Lord Forbes was committed to Edinburgh castle, on the far more serious accusation of treason against the king, but after a tedious confinement, he was exculpated from every charge, and restored to liberty His son, the master of Forbes, was not so fortunate, having been convicted and executed. The sixth lord died in 1547 He was thrice married first, to Lady Catherine Stewart, second daughter of John, earl of Athol, uterine brother of King James the Second, and by her he had a son, John, who died young, and a daughter, Elizabeth, married to John Grant of Grant, secondly, to Christian, daughter of Sir John Lundin of that ilk, and by her he had two sons and four daughters, and, thirdly, to Elizabeth Barlow, or Barclay, relict of the first Lord Elphinstone, killed at Flodden in 1513, and by her had a son, Arthur Forbes of Putachie, and a daughter, Janet, who was also thrice married.

The elder son of the second marriage, John, the master of Forbes above mentioned, is stated to have been a young man of great courage and good education, but of a bold and turbulent spirit. On October 10, 1530, with two others, he was indicted at the justiciary court at Dundee for the slaughter of Alexander Seton of Meldrum, but the same date he obtained a remission for the crime, under the great seal. His father, Lord Forbes, appears to have been inculpated in the same charge, as on 27th August 1530, no less than seventeen landed gentlemen were fined for not appearing to enter on his assize. On 26th April 1536, he and four others became cautioners to satisfy the parties for aswythment of the slaughter On the 12th June 1536, the master was accused by the earl of Huntly, before the king and privy council, of treasonable conspiracy against his majesty's life, and plotting the destruction of the king's army at Jedburgh. Protesting his innocence, he offered to maintain it against his accuser by single combat, an ordeal often allowed under the feudal system The council, on this occasion, did not authorise the resort to judicial combat, as it was styled, but Huntly was required to give a bond, under the penalty of thirty thousand marks, to make good his accusation, while the master was ordered to enter himself prisoner in the castle of Edinburgh, or to find security in twenty thousand marks to stand his trial. On the 8th of December, in consequence of a warrant from the king, the council ordered Lord Forbes, as well as his son, to find security that they should remain in Edinburgh castle till they each found bail to the extent of ten thousand marks to answer to the charge when called upon. The former, as already stated, was freed from the accusation, but the master was brought to trial before the high court of justiciary, 14th July 1537, and being found guilty, was condemned to be drawn on a hurdle through the causeyway or High Street of Edinburgh, and hanged on a gallows, and his body quartered as a traitor, his lands and goods being forfeited. To spare his relations the more ignominious part of the sentence, he was beheaded instead of being hanged, on the 17th of the same month. On the scaffold he declared his innocence of the crime of treason of which he had been convicted, but acknowledged that he deserved death for the murder of the laird of Meldrum The principal evidence against him was an unprincipled follower named John Strachan, who, on being refused a gift which he had asked of the master, went to the earl of Huntly, the enemy of the Forbeses, and accused him of having for a long time designed the death of the king, that the Douglases might be restored It is also stated that to procure the conviction of the unfortunate master, Huntly, the main accuser, did not scruple to bribe his judges. Strachan, for being a participator in, and treasonably concealing the alleged conspiracy, was ordered by the king's letter to be banished beyond the water of Dee.

After the execution of the master, the king (James the Fifth) seems to have been anxious to compensate the family for his severity towards them, by admitting his next brother, William, into his favour He restored to him his brother's honours and estates, and in 1539, appointed him one of the gentlemen of his bedchamber This William succeeded his father in 1547, as seventh Lord Forbes, and died in 1593 He had married Elizabeth Keith, daughter and coheiress, with her sister, Margaret, Countess Marischal, of Sir William Keith of Inverugie, and had by her six sons and eight daughters The sons were, John, eighth Lord Forbes, William of Foderhouse, James, of Lethendy, Robert, prior of Monymusk, Arthur, of Logie, called from his complexion, "Black Arthur," after mentioned, and Abraham, of Blacktoun The third daughter, Christian, married George Johnston of Caskieben, and was mother of the celebrated Dr Arthur Johnston, physician in ordinary to Charles the First.

John, eighth Lord Forbes, was one of the five noblemen appointed by commission from the king, dated 25th July 1594, lieutenants of the northern counties, for the suppression of the rebellion of the popish earls of Huntly and Errol, and at the battle of Glenlivet, 3d October of that year, he was second in command of the king's forces, under the earl of Argyle, against these two rebellious noblemen The following year he again joined the king against them We learn from the Burgh Records of Aberdeen that on 16th July 1595, the dean of guild of that city was ordered by the town council to expend the sum of one hundred merks on deals and other materials for a house which Lord Forbes was then building, as a remembrance for his lordship's keeping of the waters of Dee and Don "fra slayeris of blak fische in forbidden tyme, as the said lordis predicessoris did obefor to this burgh" It would appear from these Records that the town of Aberdeen furnished yearly a ton of wine to the Lords Forbes for preserving the salmon fish of the two rivers Dee and Don, within their bounds. Under date 6th September 1580, there is an entry that having discovered that those who should be keepers of their waters were themselves the principal destroyers of the fish in undue time, the council, with one voice ordained that no pension should be given to Lord Forbes, or any other person, for the future, for keeping the waters, protesting that if any such pension be given in time coming, it should be held as "black mail" The above gift to the eighth Lord Forbes seems to have been a renewal of the practice. His lordship was served heir to his mother 13th November 1604, and died soon afterwards. He had married, while still master of Forbes, Lady Margaret Gordon, eldest daughter of George, fourth earl of Huntly, and had, with a daughter named Jean, a son, John, who, being educated in the faith of his mother, entered a religious order on the continent, and died without succession. This lady he repudiated, and in consequence a sanguinary rencontre took place in 1572, in the parish of Clatt, Aberdeenshire, between the two rival clans of Forbes and Gordon. The latter, under the command of two of the earl's brothers, attacked the Forbeses, within a rude intrenchment which they had formed on the white hill of Tillvangus, in the south-western extremity of the parish, and after a severe contest the Gordons prevailed, having carried the intrenchment, and slain the master's brother, 'black Arthur' The pursuit of the Forbeses was continued to the very gates of Druminner the seat of their chief A number of cairns are still pointed out where those slain on this occasion were buried Douglas, in his peerage, seems to be in error when he states that Black Arthur Forbes was killed at Paris in 1574 In the parliament of 1581, a commission was granted for settling all debateable matters betwixt the Gordons and the Forbeses. The eighth Lord Forbes took for his second wife, Janet, daughter of James Seton of Touch, and had, besides Arthur ninth lord, another son, and a daughter

Arthur, ninth lord, married on 1st February 1600, Jean, second daughter of Alexander, fourth Lord Elphinstone, and had Alexander, tenth Lord Forbes, the Hon Colonel John, who was particularly recommended by letter from King Charles the First to the Shah of Persia, 2d December 1635, as having had much experience in the wars of Europe, and being desirous of visiting more remote countries, he requested a military command for him in the Persian service, three other sons, two of whom, Arthur and James, were killed in the German wars, and three daughters.

Alexander, tenth Lord Forbes, fought against the imperialists under the banner of the lion of the north, the renowned Gustavus Adolphus of Sweden, in whose service he attained the rank of lieutenant-general, and won for himself a high military reputation. On his return home, he had a considerable command in the army sent from Scotland to suppress the Irish rebellion in 1643 He afterwards retired to Germany, where he spent the remainder of his days. He was twice married first, to Anne, eldest daughter of Sir John Forbes of Pitsligo, by whom he had, besides several children, who died young, a son, William, eleventh Lord Forbes, and, secondly, to Elizabeth, daughter of Robert Forbes of Rires, in Fife, and by her had a large family

William, eleventh Lord Forbes, in the Scots parliament, 10th September 1641, was named one of the commissioners appointed to consider the grievances of the north country ministers In June 1644 he presented to the estates a petition praying for payment of three thousand merks, the fine imposed on two of the rebels whom he had taken, which the house granted, ordaining him at the same time to deliver the two prisoners to the bailies of Aberdeen, and they to the sheriff of Kincardineshire, and so from sheriff to sheriff, till they reached Edinburgh [Balfour's Annals, vol iii p. 191] In 1648 he was nominated one of the colonels of foot in the forces raised to attempt the rescue of King Charles the First, and the following year one of the commissioners for putting the kingdom in a state of defence, and colonel of horse. He died in 1691 He was thrice married, but had issue only by his first wife, Jean a daughter of Sir John Campbell of Calder

His eldest son William, twelfth Lord Forbes, was a zealous supporter of the revolution In 1689 he was sworn a privy councillor to King William, and on 27th May 1702 he was appointed colonel of the 2d troop of horse grenadier guards. He was also a member of Queen Anne's privy council. He supported the treaty of union, and on the breaking out of the rebellion of 1715, he was nominated lord-lieutenant of the counties of Aberdeen and Kincardine, 19th August of that year He died in July 1716. By his wife, Anne, daughter of James Brodie of Brodie, he had three sons and one daughter

William, the eldest son, thirteenth Lord Forbes, married, in September 1720, Dorothy, daughter of William Dale, Esq. of Covent Garden, Westminster This lady had a fortune of twenty thousand pounds, which was lost by the South Sea scheme, and other bubble speculations of that unfortunate year He died at Edinburgh 26th June 1730 He had a son, Francis, fourteenth lord, who died in August 1734, in the thirteenth year of his age, and four daughters, one of whom, Jean, was married to James Dundas of Dundas, and another, the youngest, Elisabeth, married John Gregory, M D, professor of the practice of medicine in the university of Edinburgh, and was the mother of the celebrated Dr James Gregory

James, second son of the twelfth lord, succeeded his nephew, as fifteenth Lord Forbes, and died at Putachie, 20th February 1761, in the 73d year of his age. He married, first, Mary, daughter of the third Lord Pitsligo, widow of John Forbes of Monymusk, and grandmother of the celebrated Sir William Forbes of Pitsligo, baronet, (see afterwards,) and had a son, James, sixteenth Lord Forbes, and three daughters; secondly, in July 1741, Elisabeth, daughter of Sir James Gordon of Park, baronet. Of this lady, who died without issue at Aberdeen, 12th June 1792, in her 72d year, a high eulogium is recorded in the Gentleman's Magazine for the same year

James, sixteenth lord, was an officer in the army, and in May 1764 was appointed deputy governor of Fort William, Inverness-shire. He died at Edinburgh 29th July 1804, in the 80th year of his age. By his wife, Catherine, only daughter of Sir Robert Innes, baronet, of Orton and Balvenie, he had four sons and two daughters.

James Ochoncar Forbes, seventeenth lord, the eldest son born 7th March 1765, entered the army in 1781, as ensign in the Coldstream regiment of foot guards, in which he was an officer for twenty-six years. In April 1793, when senior lieutenant, he joined the first battalion of the regiment then serving under the duke of York in Flanders, and was engaged in the battle of Famars, the storming of Valenciennes, and every other engagement of importance. After the action of Lincelles, in August of that year, he succeeded to the captain-lieutenancy, with the rank of lieutenant-colonel vacant by the fall of Lieutenant-colonel Bowville, and in the following October he succeeded to a company, by the death of Lieutenant-colonel Eld, who was killed at Dunkirk. He obtained the brevet rank of colonel, 3d May 1796. In 1799 he accompanied the force under Sir Ralph Abercromby destined to attack the Helder He at that time commanded the grenadier company of the Coldstream guards, and was present in every action but one which took place in that country during that short but active campaign. He received the rank of major-general 29th April 1802, and the same year he was placed on the staff in command of the troops stationed at Ashford in Kent, where he remained two years, and was then removed to the more important charge of the garrison at Dover In March 1806 he was appointed second in command, under Sir Charles Stuart, of the troops in the Mediterranean The same year he sailed for Sicily, and soon after his arrival he attained the rank of lieutenant-general, and by the king of Naples he was created a knight of the royal Sicilian order of St. Januarius. At the general election of 1806 he had been elected a representative peer of Scotland, and in 1807 he was reelected. On his return to England in 1812, his lordship was placed on the staff in Ireland in command of the Cork district, in which he remained four years. He was then appointed to Dublin in command of the eastern district, where he remained three years, and on his promotion to the rank of general, 12th August 1819, he was removed from the staff of Ireland. He was appointed colonel of the 3d garrison battalion in 1806. In 1808 he was removed to the colonelcy of the 94th foot; to that of the 54th regiment in September 1809, and to that of the 21st or Royal Scots Fusileers in June 1816. In 1826 he was appointed lord high commissioner to the General Assembly of the Church of Scotland, an appointment which was renewed for several years. He died 4th May 1843. He was a man of a noble presence, tall, and finely formed, and his appearance became his station well. By his wife, Elisabeth, daughter and heiress of Walter Hunter of Polmood, Peebles-shire, and Crailing, Roxburghshire, he had six sons and four daughters. The estate of Polmood had been the subject of litigation for nearly fifty years in the court of session and House of Lords, but it was ultimately decided that an old man named Adam Hunter, who laid claim to it, had not established his pedigree (see HUNTER, surname of). It consequently came into the possession of Lady Forbes. His lordship's eldest son, James, a lieutenant-colonel in the Coldstream guards, predeceased his father in 1835

Walter, the second son, born 29th May 1796, became eighteenth Lord Forbes, on his father's death in 1843. He married on 31st January 1825, Horatia, seventh daughter of Sir John Gregory Shaw, baronet county of Kent, issue, five sons and one daughter Heir presumptive, his eldest son Horace Courtenay, master of Forbes, born at Aberdeen, in 1829, educated at Oriel college, Oxford

Lord Forbes is the premier baron of Scotland, being the first on the union roll. He is also a baronet of Nova Scotia, date of creation 1628.

The Forbeses of Tolquhoun, an ancient cadet of this family one of whom fell at the battle of Pinkie, 10th September 1547, descended from Sir John Forbes, third son of Sir John Forbes, justiciary of Aberdeen in the reign of Robert the Third, (as stated on page 228,) are now represented by James Forbes Leith, Esq of Whitehaugh, in the same county Sir Alexander Forbes of Tolquhoun, the tenth laird of the name of Forbes, was one of the three colonels for Aberdeenshire in the Scots army of Charles the Second, and is said to have rendered signal service to that monarch at the battle of Worcester in 1651 He is also stated to have assisted in a particular manner in the king's subsequent escape from England. For these services he was knighted in 1654 In 1685 he was made a burgess of Glasgow, and also the same year, of St. Andrews. Dying without issue, his estate devolved on his nephew William Forbes, the son of his next brother, Thomas. This William Forbes was served heir to his father and his uncle in 1704 He married two years afterwards, Anne, daughter and heiress of John Leith of Whitehaugh, by his wife, Elisabeth, daughter of William, eleventh Lord Forbes, and with a daughter he had two sons. The elder, the Rev William Forbes, vicar of Thornbury, Gloucestershire, died in September 1761, without issue, when the younger son, John, succeeded, and, as heir of his mother, he assumed the additional surname of Leith. His great-grandson, James John Forbes Leith, a lieutenant-colonel in the service of the Hon East India Company, was succeeded at his death by his eldest son, James Forbes Leith of Whitehaugh, present representative of the house of Tolquhoun.

The Forbeses of Craigievar (also in Aberdeenshire), who possess a baronetcy, descend from the Hon. Patrick Forbes of Corse, armour-bearer to King James the Third, and third son, as already stated, of James, second Lord Forbes. The lands of Corse, which formed part of the barony of Coul and O'Nele, were in 1476 bestowed on this Patrick, for his services, by that monarch, and on 10th October 1482 he had a charter of confirmation under the great seal, of the barony of O'Neill, namely, the lands of Coule, Kincraigy, and le Corse. In 1510 his son and successor, David, called "Trail the Axe," had a charter of the lands of O'Nele, Cors, Kincraigy, le Mureton, with the mill and alehouse thereof, (the lands of Coul being now disjoined therefrom,) and uniting and incorporating them into a haill and free barony, "cum furca, fossa, pitt et gallous," &c., to be called the barony of O'Nele in all time coming. He married Elizabeth, sister of Panter of Newmanswells near Montrose, secretary of state to James the Fourth, and had a son, Patrick of O'Neil Corse, infeft in 1554. Patrick's eldest son, William, infeft in January 1567, by his wife, Elizabeth, daughter of Sir Alexander Strachan of Thornton, had six sons and five daughters.

His eldest son, Patrick Forbes of Corse and O'Neil, was bishop of Aberdeen for seventeen years, and died in 1635 Of this eminent prelate, and of his second son, the learned Dr John Forbes of Corse, professor of divinity in King's college, Aberdeen, memoirs in larger type will be found on pages 235 and 236 The bishop's male line failing with his grandchildren, the family estates devolved on the descendants of his next brother, William Forbes of Craigievar, the first of that branch, of whom next paragraph John, the third son of the fourth baron of O'Neil and laird of Corse, was presbyterian minister of Alford, and a man of great piety and learning, and of considerable eminence in the church He was moderator of the General Assembly which met at Aberdeen on 2d July 1605, and which immediately on its meeting was, by a messenger at arms, charged in the king's name to dismiss on the pain of rebellion The Assembly declared their readiness to comply with this order, and requested the commissioner, Straiton of Lawriston, to name a day and place for their next meeting. Upon his refusal, the moderator appointed the Assembly to meet again in the same place on the last Tuesday of September ensuing, and then dissolved the meeting with prayer The king, having sent orders from London to proceed with the utmost rigour against those ministers who had composed this Assembly, fourteen of them were sent to prison to await their trial, among whom were Mr Forbes and Mr John Welch, son-in-law of Knox, who were apprehended in Edinburgh, and after being a night in the castle, were sent to Blackness and confined in separate dungeons. As they declined the jurisdiction of the privy council, they were indicted to stand trial for high treason before the high court of justiciary at Linlithgow Mr Forbes speech on the occasion is recorded in Calderwood's History of the Church of Scotland, vol. vi. pp 382—385 He and five other ministers convicted with him, after having been imprisoned fourteen months in the castle of Blackness, were banished to France. A long letter from Mr Forbes to his celebrated brother in the ministry, Mr Robert Bruce, dated Edinburgh castle, 16th July 1606, after his condemnation, relative to the chancellor having counselled the holding of the Aberdeen Assembly, which had given so much offence to the king, will be found in the same volume (pp. 551—556). He became afterwards minister of Delft in Holland, and died about 1636. He was the author of several tracts on religious subjects. He married a daughter of Barclay of Mathers, and had two sons, Colonel Arthur Forbes, and Patrick, who was appointed bishop of Caithness, 19th March 1662, and remained in that see till his death in 1680. Arthur, the fourth son, settled in Ireland in 1620, and was created a baronet of Nova Scotia in 1628. He was a lieutenant-colonel in the army, and fell in a duel at Hamburg in 1632. His son, Sir Arthur Forbes, was the first earl of Granard in the peerage of Ireland.

William Forbes, the second son above mentioned, the founder of the house of Craigievar, was first styled of Menie. He was educated at Edinburgh, and became an eminent merchant at Dantzic, where he made a large fortune, and purchased estates in various parts of Scotland. He had charters of the lands of Menie in Aberdeenshire in 1607; of Craigievar in the same county, in 1610, of the barony of Auchtertool in Fifeshire, in 1617, of the barony of Finhaven and Carriston in Forfarshire, in 1619, and of the lands of Fintry in Aberdeenshire the same year On becoming proprietor of Craigievar, which he purchased from a family of the name of Mortimer, he found the castle but half built, as they were unable, from adverse circumstances, to finish it. He straightway set about completing it, which he did in 1626, in the most approved style of the period, with projecting turrets, and took his designation therefrom It is now surrounded by extensive and thriving plantations. The name of Craigievar, in Gaelic, Creg a Mhar, means the rock of Mar In the vicinity are several Druidical temples, and on the top of Corsehill, near it, are vestiges of an encampment. He was commemorated by Arthur Johnstone in one of his epitaphs. [Poemata p. 380]

His eldest son, William, was created a baronet of Nova Scotia, 20th April 1630, with a grant of sixteen thousand acres in New Brunswick, erected into a free barony and regality, to be called New Craigievar On the rash and ill-advised attempt of Charles the First to introduce episcopacy into Scotland, Sir William embraced the cause of the Covenanters, and took an active part in the troubles which followed He commanded a troop of horse, and is frequently mentioned in Spalding's History of the Troubles in Scotland from 1624 to 1645, printed for the Spalding Club in 2 vols. 4to, 1850 In 1641 he was appointed by parliament one of the commissioners for planting kirks and valuation of teinds, in 1643 one of the committee for loan monies and taxations of the county of Aberdeen, in 1644, one of the commissioners for conserving the Ripon treaty, and ordered to secure deserters in Aberdeenshire, &c., in 1645, one of the committee of estates, in 1646, one of the commissioners for selling the estates of the malignants, and in 1647 sheriff of Aberdeen. At the battle of Aberdeen in 1644, charging too impetuously at the head of his troop, Sir William was taken prisoner with Forbes of Boyndlie. In the account of that battle contained in Patrick Gordon of Ruthven's 'Britane's Distemper,' printed for the Spalding Club in one volume 4to in 1844, it is stated that he had been "brad up in the field of Mars while he was abroad" (page 85). Being allowed to be at large on his parole, "he conveyed himself away," says the same writer, "to the no small prejudice of his reputation" (p 93). In 1646 he joined the garrison at Aberdeen with several other gentlemen, to oppose an anticipated attack from the marquis of Huntly, who, with a force of fifteen hundred Highland foot and six hundred horse, stormed that city in three different places, and compelled the army of the Covenanters to surrender at discretion Among the prisoners taken on this occasion were Sir William Forbes, and other country gentlemen of the name of Forbes, but they were all released the next day on their parole of honour not to serve against the king in future.

According to Spalding (Hist. of Troubles in Scotland, vol i. p. 69), Sir William was mainly the cause of breaking up the band of the famous freebooter Gilderoy, or Gil'dy, the hero of the old ballad, said to have been originally composed by his mistress. One of the proscribed clan Gregor, he was as notorious in his day as Rob Roy himself, for his cattle-lifting and other lawless exploits. A portion of his followers having "harried" and oppressed the lands of the Forbeses, particularly Corse and Craigievar, Sir William sent information of the same to the Stewarts of Athole, who, on the return of Gilderoy's followers to their haunts in the Highlands of Perthshire, succeeded in apprehending eight of them Seven of these were hanged at Edinburgh early in 1636, and the eighth only escaped by showing that he had been forced into the service against his will In revenge Gilderoy set fire to several houses belonging to the Stewarts, and a reward of a thousand pounds being offered for his apprehension he was ultimately taken, with five of his accomplices, all of whom were hanged at the Gallowlee, between Leith and Edinburgh, in the month of July following, Gilderoy as a mark of distinction being hanged on a gallows higher than the rest.

Sir William's son, Sir John, second baronet, married Margaret, a daughter of Young of Auldbar, and had six sons and three daughters. This lady mortified (bequeathed) for the use of the poor of the parish of Leochel-Cushnie, in which Craigievar is situated, one thousand merks Scots, which, according to her will, must remain in the hands of the family on condition of their paying the interest regularly to the kirk session in meal, to be divided among the poor of Craigievar and Corse.

His grandson, Sir Arthur, fourth baronet, represented the county of Aberdeen in parliament from 1727 to 1747 In one of Lord Lovat's letters dated from Edinburgh, 11th September 1740, during the time of an election, he mentions that the duke of Argyle, who had then the chief management of Scots affairs, had a particular regard for Sir Arthur Forbes, and was anxious for his return to parliament. Sir Arthur was the bosom friend of Sir Andrew Mitchell, British ambassador to Frederick the Great of Prussia, who left to Sir Arthur the bulk of his property, including his valuable library, and his estate of Thainston

His son, Sir William, fifth baronet, born in 1753, by his wife, the Hon Sarah Sempill, daughter of the twelfth Lord Sempill, had four sons and seven daughters. Margaret, the second daughter, became the wife of Robert Wallace, Esq of Kelly, at one period M P for Greenock Sir William died in 1816.

His son, Sir Arthur, sixth baronet, was for some time an officer in the 7th hussars. He died unmarried in 1823, and was succeeded by his brother, Sir John, seventh baronet, born in 1785 He was a judge in the Hon East India Company's service, and married in September 1825, the Hon Charlotte Elizabeth daughter of 17th Lord Forbes, and had two sons and six daughters. He died 16th Feb. 1846

The elder son, Sir William, born May 20, 1836, succeeded as eighth baronet, and was educated at Eton In 1855 he entered the army as ensign and lieutenant in the Coldstream guards, and retired in 1857 In 1858 he married the only daughter of Sir Charles Forbes, Bart, of Newe and Edinglassie In 1859 he was appointed captain 9th Aberdeenshire rifle volunteers. His brother, James Ochoncar Forbes, of Corse, was born in 1837

The family of Forbes of Pitsligo and Fettercairn, which possesses a baronetcy, are descended from Hon. Duncan Forbes of Corsindae, 2d son of the 2d Lord Forbes. This gentleman's grandson, Duncan Forbes of Monymusk, died in 1567 His grandson, William Forbes, was created a baronet of Nova Scotia, by patent, dated 2d April, 1626, to himself and his heirs male. His eldest son, Sir William, 2d baronet, had, with one daughter, an only son, Sir William, 3d baronet, who was twice married, and had, by his first wife, Margaret, daughter of the 1st Viscount Arbuthnott, two sons and a daughter, and by his second wife, Barbara, daughter of Dalmahoy of Dalmahoy, two sons and three daughters.

His eldest son, Sir William, fourth baronet, married Lady Jane Keith, daughter of John, earl of Kintore, and had two sons and four daughters. John, the elder son, married the Hon Mary Forbes of Pitsligo, daughter of Alexander third Lord Forbes of Pitsligo, and on the death of John, master of Pitsligo, in 1781, her descendants became nearest heirs and representatives of that noble family He died before his father, but left two sons, the elder of whom, Sir William, fifth baronet, succeeded his grandfather This Sir William, an advocate in Edinburgh, married Christian, daughter of John Forbes, Esq, and died in 1729 He had two sons.

The elder son, Sir William, sixth baronet, was the celebrated banker of Edinburgh, of whom a memoir is given on page 242 in larger type. As soon as he had an opportunity he purchased seventy acres of the upper barony of Pitsligo, including the old mansion-house, at that time roofless and deserted, and by the death of Mr Forbes in 1781, he succeeded as heir to the lower barony also The extensive improvements which he introduced on every portion of his property greatly enhanced its value, and exhibited in a high degree his genuine patriotism and public spirit. He married the eldest daughter of Sir James Hay of Hayston, baronet, and died in 1806. His second son John Hay Forbes, was a lord of session, under the judicial title of Lord Medwyn He was born at Edinburgh in 1776, passed advocate in 1799, appointed sheriff-depute of Perthshire in 1807, and raised to the bench in January 1825, appointed a lord of justiciary in December 1830, resigned that office in May 1847; retired from the bench in October 1852, and died in 1854 It was chiefly through his exertions, and to the efforts of the episcopal congregation worshipping in the Cowgate chapel, that the handsome structure called St. Paul's chapel, York Place, Edinburgh, was erected in 1818 His eldest brother, Sir William Forbes, also greatly assisted in the building of St. John's episcopal chapel, at the west end of Princes Street of the same city His lordship married, in 1802, a daughter of Sir Alexander Penrose Cuming Gordon, baronet, of Altyre and Gordonstown His eldest son, William, became an advocate. His second son, the Right Rev Alexander Penrose Forbes, D C L., was consecrated bishop of Brechin in 1847, on the death of Dr Moir Born in Edinburgh in 1817, he was educated in Brasenose College, Oxford, where he was Boden Sanscrit scholar in 1841, and received the honorary degree of doctor of civil laws. George, the youngest son of Sir William, in 1815 was admitted a partner in the bank, and on its junction with the Glasgow Union bank he became a director of the Union bank, the new name of the firm

The eldest son, Sir William, seventh baronet, married 19th June 1797, Williamina, sole child and heiress of Sir John Stuart Belches of Fettercairn, baronet, whose name and arms have been assumed by the family He had four sons and two daughters, the eldest son, William, a captain in the army died unmarried before his father in 1826; the second son, Sir John, succeeded him; the third, Charles, became a partner in the banking firm of Sir William Forbes and Co., afterwards the Union bank; and the fourth, James David Forbes, D C.L., was elected professor of natural philosophy in the university of Edinburgh in 1833

Sir John Stuart Forbes, the second son, became eighth baronet, on his father's death, 24th October, 1828 He was born 25th September 1804, and married 14th June 1834, Lady Harriet Louisa Anne Ker, third daughter of the sixth marquis of Lothian, and has a daughter, Harriet Williamina. Her presumptive (1860), his brother Charles Hay Forbes, of Blackford House, near Edinburgh, married in 1833, the third daughter of Alexander Macdonell of Glengarry

The family of Forbes of Newe and Edinglassie, which also possess a baronetcy, are descended from William Forbes of Dauch and Newe, younger son of Sir John Forbes knight, who obtained a charter of the barony of Pitsligo and Kinnaldie, 10th October 1476, and whose elder son, Sir John Forbes, was the progenitor of Alexander Forbes, created Lord Forbes of Pitsligo, 24th June 1633, a title attainted in the person of Alexander, fourth lord, for his participation in the rebellion of 1745 (see PITSLIGO, lord). John Forbes of Bellabeg, the direct descendant of the said William of Dauch, was born at Bellabeg in September 1743. In early life he went to Bombay, and engaging in mercantile pursuits, became one of the most extensive and distinguished merchants in India. Having realized a large fortune he repurchased Newe, the estate of his ancestors, besides other lands in Strathdon, and the whole of his rental was laid out in improvements. His private beneficence both in India and at home is stated to have been almost unbounded, and amongst his munificent donations to public charities were ten thousand pounds to the Aberdeen asylum, and one thousand pounds to the infirmary of that city [New Stat. Acc v xii p 542] A handsome monument was erected to his memory in the town's churchyard of Aberdeen He died 20th June 1821, and was succeeded by his nephew, Sir Charles Forbes, eldest son of the Rev George Forbes of Lochell, by his wife, Katharine, only daughter of Gordon Stewart of Inverauric. Born in April 1773, he went early in life to India, and was for many years head of that eminent East India mercantile and banking establishment in Bombay, which had been founded by his uncle. He returned to England in 1812 On leaving India the natives, as a testimony of respect and affection, presented him with a service of plate of the value of fifteen hundred pounds, and in gratitude for his exertions in elevating their position in society and obtaining their admission to the offices of justices of the peace and grandjurors, the natives of Bombay subscribed for a statue of him by Sir Francis Chantrey He was created a baronet, 4th November 1823. He sat in parliament for upwards of twenty years. In 1833 he was served nearest male heir in general to Alexander, third Lord Pitsligo, by a jury at Aberdeen, and the same year he obtained the authority of the lord lyon, to use the Pitsligo arms and supporters. He died 20th November 1849, and was succeeded by his grandson, Sir Charles, second baronet, born 15th July 1832, on whose death, unmarried, 23d May 1852, the title devolved on his uncle, Sir Charles Forbes, third baronet, born at Bombay, 21st September 1803, and educated at Harrow school He was formerly a captain in the 17th lancers. He married 21st August 1830, Caroline, 2d daughter of G Battye Esq of Campden hill, issue two sons, 1 Charles John, born at Kensington in 1843, 2 George Stewart, of Aslown, born in 1844, and a daughter, Caroline Louisa, m. in 1858 to Sir William Forbes, of Craigievar, Bart.

The first of the Forbeses of Culloden, Inverness-shire, was Duncan Forbes, great-grandfather of the celebrated Lord President Forbes, descended from the noble family of Forbes, through that of Tolquhoun, and by the mother's side from that of Keith earl Marischal. He was M P and provost of Inverness, and purchased the estate of Culloden from the laird of MacIntosh in 1626. He died in 1654, aged 82 "He enjoyed," says Mr. Burton, in his Life of President Forbes, "the name of Grey Duncan and his title to be so called is fully attested by his portrait, where a large grisly beard conceals the lower part of his bold, broad, honest face. Round the room, where this portrait occupies the highest station, are ranged those of his descendants, and it at once strikes the stranger that seldom, in the ancestral representations of Scottish families, does one see so fine a cluster of open, handsome, ingenuous countenances. Perhaps this may partly arise from a usual characteristic of such portraits—the sinister-looking moustache of the seventeenth century being absent from this group, in which there is no medium between the rich, full, uncultivated beard of Grey Duncan, and the clean shaven faces of the next generation" Grey Duncan had two brothers, namely, John, whose son Malcolm became marquis of Montally in France, and Patrick, commonly called Black Patrick, baillie of Inverury, from whom descended the family of Forbes of Foveran on which a baronetcy of Nova Scotia was conferred in 1699, but the title is now extinct. Duncan Forbes, the first of Culloden, married Janet, eldest daughter of James Forbes of Corsindae, also descended from the noble family at the head of the clan, and had, with two daughters, three sons, namely, John, his heir, Captain James Forbes of Caithness, and Captain Duncan Forbes of Auchyat.

John Forbes of Culloden, the eldest son, was also provost of Inverness. He was the friend and supporter of the marquis of Argyle, and from his strong support of presbyterian principles, he suffered much in the persecuting times in the reign of Charles the Second and his brother James. In the introduction to the Culloden papers, it is stated that "the frowning aspect of government by introducing the habits of economical and private living, instead of hospitality and expense into his family, must have conduced to the accumulation of his fortune, and about the year 1670, his landed estate was doubled by the purchase of the barony of Ferintosh and the estate of Bunchrew" On being chosen member of parliament for the shire of Elgin or Inverness, he refused to take the test, when tendered to him on 10th February 1685, and could not therefore take his seat. He was an active friend and supporter of the Revolution, and his estates were in consequence ravaged by the troops of Colonel Cannan and Major-general Buchan, who had assumed the command of James' army after the fall of Dundee. As a compensation for the loss which the family had sustained, his eldest son and successor, Duncan Forbes third of Culloden, received from the Scots parliament, the privilege of distilling into spirits the grain of the barony of Ferintosh, at a nominal composition of the duty, which remained the same, after the spirits distilled in other parts of the country were subjected to a comparatively heavy excise, (Burke's Hist. of the Commoners, vol iv p 622,) hence Ferintosh became renowned for its whisky The privilege was taken away in 1785 This Duncan Forbes, the father of the president, sat in the Scots parliament for the county of Nairn, and died in 1704 By his wife Mary, daughter of Sir Robert Innes, of Innes, in Morayshire, baronet, he had two sons, John, and Duncan, lord president, of whom a memoir will be found on page 240, and several daughters. He is described as having been "a real good man," imbued with a deep sense of religion, and successful in imparting it to his children. His next brother, David Forbes of Newhall, an eminent lawyer and man of letters, was the friend and one of the patrons of Allan Ramsay, one of whose odes, written in 1728, 'to the memory of Mrs. Forbes of Newhall,' commences,

"Ah, life! thou short uncertain blaze,
Scarce worthy to be wish'd or loved,
When by strict death so many ways,
So soon the sweetest are removed.'

Life and Works of Ramsay, vol. i. p. 270.

In the third volume of the same edition (Fullarton and Co.'s, 1851), page 801, we find John Forbes of Newhall and Duncan his kinsman mentioned as being members of the 'Worthy Club,' which was in existence long before 1714, and which frequently met at Newhall House. On the ceiling of one of its parlours, which bore the name of the Club Room, is a painting of Ramsay reciting, long before it was printed, the embryo passages of the Gentle Shepherd.

John, the fourth laird of Culloden, took an active part on the side of government on the breaking out of the rebellion of 1715, and, with the afterwards celebrated Lord Lovat, narrowly escaped being apprehended at Aberdeen by Lord Saltoun in command of the Jacobite forces there. Both he and his brother Duncan were engaged in putting down the insurrection in Inverness-shire. In those convivial times he so much excelled most of his friends in the quantity of claret that he could drink, that he was distinguished by the name of Bumper John. Dying without issue in 1734, he was succeeded by his only brother, Duncan (see post, p. 240), whose only child, John Forbes, the sixth of Culloden, showed when young, says Mr Burton, "the convivial spirit of his race, without their energy and perseverance." He was the companion and friend of Thomson, Armstrong, and other eminent literary men of their time, and is referred to in two of the stanzas of Thomson's 'Castle of Indolence.' He entered the army, and served with distinction at the battle of Fontenoy, where he had a horse shot under him. He was in other engagements, and also fought at Culloden. Some notices of him, with two of his letters, will be found in Burton's Life of President Forbes, pages 342 and 343. He afterwards lived retired at Stradishall in Suffolk, and by economy and judicious management succeeded in some measure, in retrieving the losses which his father had sustained in the public service, and which, with the utmost ingratitude, the government which his exertions and outlay had mainly helped to establish, refused to acknowledge or compensate. John Forbes died 26th September 1772. He was twice married, first, to Jane, daughter of Sir Arthur Forbes of Craigievar, baronet, by whom he had two sons, Duncan, who died before him, and Arthur, his successor, and secondly, Jane, daughter of Captain Forbes of Newe, without issue.

Arthur, seventh laird, died 26th May 1803, and was succeeded by his only son, Duncan George, who died 3d November 1827, when his eldest son, Arthur, born 25th January 1819, became the ninth laird of Culloden.

The Forbeses of Echt, an Aberdeenshire family, sprung from the Watertoun branch of the family of Tolquhoun.

The Forbeses of Kingerioch, in Argyleshire, are descended from the youngest son of Sir John Forbes, fifth laird of Druminner, brother of the first Lord Forbes. Through the marriage of this youngest son, Alister Cam Forbes, with the daughter and heir of Sir Hugh Cameron of Brux, that estate came into the family. Of this branch was William Forbes of Skellater, baptised 15th October 1615, who joined the marquis of Huntly, on the king's side, with the warriors of Strathdon. These were the only Forbeses who were not Covenanters, and as they were with the Gordons, (several of the Forbeses holding feudally of the marquis of Huntly,) both in the civil war and in the revolutionary campaign of 1689, they were called the Gordon-Forbeses. This William Forbes of Skellater adopted a motto distinct from that of other families of the name, namely, "Solus inter plurimos."

General John Forbes of Skellater, who died in 1809, when a young man distinguished himself by resenting the attacks on Scotland made by the celebrated demagogue, John Wilkes, in his 'North Britain,' and sought in vain for an opportunity to have a personal rencontre with him. He married a princess of the blood royal of Portugal, and rose to be a field-marshal in the Portuguese army. He is stated to have shown great military talent, and to have acted with great success against the Spaniards. When the royal family of Portugal went to the Brazils in November 1807, he accompanied them, and died there.—[New Statistical Account, vol. xii. page 541.]

The first of the Forbeses of Boyndlie, in the parish of Tyrie, an offshoot of the noble family of Pitsligo, was killed at the battle of Craibstone in 1575. One of his descendants, John Forbes of Boyndlie, was by the marquis of Montrose taken prisoner with Sir William Forbes of Craigievar (see ante, p. 231) at the battle of Aberdeen, 12 September 1644. To procure the freedom of young Irvine of Drum, then a captive with the Covenanters, they were allowed to go, on their parole of honour, to their camp, and to recover their entire liberty if their captor should sustain a defeat before the period stipulated for their return. Finding obstacles in the way of the liberation of Irvine, Boyndlie returned and abode with Montrose, in the mountains, when his own adherents were deserting his standard in crowds. He died, when advanced in life, on his estate in Cromar.

Forbes of Winkfield Place, county of Berks, England, is descended from Forbes of Colquhany, Strathdon. Of this family was William Forbes of Callander, Stirlingshire, second son of William Forbes, a citizen of Aberdeen. He was a native of that city, and bred a tinsmith. In early life he went to London, where, in process of time, he was enabled to commence business for himself. Having received a hint from, it is said, Admiral Byron, one of his customers, that it was the intention of the admiralty to sheathe the bottom of the vessels of the navy with copper, to preserve them from the effects of sea-water, instead of coal-tar, an invention of the earl of Dundonald, he immediately purchased up all the copper he could find to an immense extent. Obtaining soon after the exclusive right of coppering the royal navy and the East India Company's ships, for twenty years, he realised a large fortune, and in 1783 purchased the estates of Callander and Almond in Stirlingshire, which had been forfeited by the attainder of the fifth earl of Linlithgow and fourth of Callander in 1715, and subsequently came into possession of the York Buildings Company. The price he paid for them was so low that he frequently afterwards declared that even the wood on the lands would have supplied the purchase money. When asked for his security, he replied, "I have it in my pocket," and instantly produced one of the two largest bank notes ever issued in Scotland. On obtaining possession of this vast landed property he immediately set about improving it in every possible way, and thereby brought almost every part of it into a state of high cultivation. He died at Edinburgh 21st June 1815. In Kay's Edinburgh Portraits, vol. ii. pp. 105—109, will be found a biographical notice of this fortunate speculator, containing some interesting metances of his personal peculiarities. He was twice married first, to Miss Macadam of Orsigengillan, by whom he had no children: and, secondly, to Miss Agnes Chalmers of Aberdeen, by whom he had a family His eldest son, William, his successor in the entailed property, married in 1832, Lady Louisa Wemyss, sixth daughter of the earl of Wemyss and March, with issue. Her ladyship died in 1845 Mr Forbes, the second laird of Callander of the name, vice-lieutenant of Stirlingshire, and member of parliament for that county from 1835 to 1837, was re-elected in 1841 and in 1852

FORBES, PATRICK, an eminent prelate, descended from Sir Patrick Forbes, armour-bearer to King James the Third, was born in Aberdeenshire, 24th August 1564 He was the eldest of the seven sons of William Forbes of Corse, one of the most zealous of the Scottish reformers, whom he succeeded in the estates of Corse and O'Neil After receiving the rudiments of his education at the grammar school of Stirling, under Thomas Buchanan, a nephew of the celebrated historian, he was sent to the university of Glasgow, where he studied philosophy under his cousin, the famous Andrew Melville, and on the latter becoming principal of St Andrews in 1580, he accompanied him to that university, and studied Hebrew and theology there He distinguished himself so much by his piety and learning that he was offered a professorship in the university, but about the same time was sent for by his father to take the management of the family estate Having married Lucretia Spence, daughter of Spence of Wormiston in Fife, he took up his residence in Montrose, till his father's death, when he removed to Corse, and occupied himself in agricultural improvements Much of his time was also devoted to religious studies, and his reputation for learning was such that it was currently believed in the neighbourhood that he had direct communication with the devil A local tradition, preserved in the New Statistical Account of Scotland, (vol ii p 220,) states that having quarrelled with each other on some doctrinal point, the fiend flew off in a passion, carrying the side of the castle of Corse (built by Forbes' father in 1581, and now in ruins) along with him He early displayed a strong inclination for the pursuits and duties of a clerical life, and from his serious character, in the absence or deprivation of their ministers, was frequently called upon to officiate as a clergyman in some of the parishes adjoining his estate By the bishop of the diocese, (Blackburn of Aberdeen,) he was earnestly entreated to enter into holy orders, while the primate of Scotland, Gladstanes, archbishop of St. Andrews, peremptorily prohibited him from publicly preaching until he should do so He, in consequence, desisted from teaching in public, but in his own house continued to expound the Scriptures to his family and servants, and any of the gentry and others in the neighbourhood that might be permitted to attend He did not enter the ministry till 1612, when he was forty-eight years old It happened that the minister of the parish of Keith in Banffshire had, in a fit of religious melancholy, attempted to commit suicide, by stabbing himself, but not dying immediately, he repented of the deed, and sent for the laird of Corse, to pray with him At the urgent request of the dying man, Forbes was induced at length to take holy orders, and become minister of Keith in his stead The following year he published his 'Commentary on the Revelations,' which he dedicated to James the Sixth The object of this erudite and elaborate work was to apply all that is said of Antichrist, of the beast, and of the whore of Babylon, to the church of Rome

In 1618, on a vacancy occurring, by the death of Bishop Alexander Forbes of the house of Ardmurdo, at the desire of the clergy and principal laity of the diocese, and at the express command of the king, he was appointed bishop of Aberdeen Three years earlier, on the death of Bishop Blackburn, he had been urged to accept the appointment, but had then declined it He now however accepted of it, and also became chancellor of King's college and university, Old Aberdeen In his latter capacity he set himself to promote the reformation of abuses in the colleges, and in 1619 he procured the appointment of a royal commission of visitation Of King's college, indeed, he proved himself to be a munificent patron, having repaired the buildings, augmented the library and revived the dormant professorships of divinity, medicine, and civil law, as well as procured the addition of a new chair in theology At the instance of the bishop, the synod of Aberdeen raised the necessary funds for founding a divinity chair in King's college, of which his second son, Dr John Forbes, of whom a memoir follows, was the first incumbent In 1632 Bishop Forbes was seized with an infirmity in his right side which, depriving him of the use of his right arm, caused him ever after to subscribe his name with his left hand On his deathbed, two days before his death, he sent for all the clergy of his diocese, and in their company received the holy communion. He died on the 28th March 1635, aged 71 He was buried in the cathedral of Aberdeen with military honours, and a monument was erected to his memory with a suitable Latin inscription. As the fashion was in those days, various poems were written in Latin, Greek, and English, funeral sermons preached, and orations delivered, on occasion of the death of so eminent and learned a prelate, all of which will be found in a rare and curious volume printed at Aberdeen soon after, entitled 'The Funerals of a Right Reverend Father in God, Patrick Forbes of Corse Aberdene, imprinted by Edward Raban, 1635' Portraits of Bishop Patrick Forbes, by Jameson, are in Marischal college, Aberdeen, and at Fintray House We are told by Bishop Burnet, in his life of Bedell, that it was Forbes' custom to go round his diocese privately, attended by only one servant, and to enter as a private person into the church on Sunday, when the minister had ascended the pulpit, that so he might observe what his ordinary sermons were, and accordingly admonished or encouraged him, and as an instance of his humility he says that Bishop Forbes had synods twice a year of his clergy, and before they went upon their other business he always began with a short discourse, excusing his own infirmities, and charging them that, if they knew or observed anything amiss in him, they would use all freedom with him, and either come and warn him in secret of secret errors, or, if they were public, that they would speak of them there in public, and upon that he withdrew, to leave them to the freedom of speech "This condescension of his," adds Burnet, "was never abused but by one petulant man, to whom all others were very severe for his insolence, only the bishop bore it quietly, and as became him"

FORBES, JOHN, of Corse, one of the first scholars of his time, second son of the preceding, was born May 2, 1593 After studying philosophy and divinity at King's college, Aberdeen, he went to Heidelberg, where he attended the theological lectures of the famous Paræus, and subsequently spent some time at the other universities of Germany So great was his proficiency in divinity and the Hebrew language that, according to Pictet, he maintained, in 1618, a public disputation against the archbishop and the Lutherans at Upsal in Sweden In 1619 he was called to the office of the ministry, at Middleburgh, and having soon after returned home, he was appointed professor of divinity and ecclesiastical history in King's college, on the first institution of that chair, as already stated in the life of his father He was also for a short time one of the ministers of St Nicholas, Aberdeen In 1629 he made an attempt to reconcile the religious parties then zealously opposed to each other in Scotland, by publishing his 'Irenicum pro Ecclesia Scoticana,' which he dedicated to the lovers of peace and truth In 1635, his elder brother being dead, he succeeded his father in the estate of Corse Three years later, being a strong adherent of episcopacy, he and the other 'Aberdeen doctors' opposed the commissioners of the covenant, on their arrival in Aberdeen, both by their preaching and their writings, and, after appearing frequently before synods and committees appointed to deal with him, and resisting the entreaties of some of his near relatives who supported the covenant, to subscribe it, he was finally, by the committee of the General Assembly at Aberdeen, in 1640 ejected from his professorship After residing for some time quietly on his estate, he went in 1644 to Holland, where he remained for two years, preaching fre quently in the churches, and employing himself in the republication of his father's Commentary on Revelation, and his own greatest work, entitled 'Institutiones Historico-Theologicæ,' which is written with great vigour and elegance, and exhibits deep erudition According to Dr Burnet, it forms so excellent a work, that if he had lived to finish it, by a second volume, it would, perhaps have been the most valuable treatise of divinity that has yet appeared in the world

In 1646 he obtained leave to return to Scotland, and he spent the remainder of his life on his estate of Corse His lands were repeatedly plundered by the Highland caterans, and in February 1636 the band of Gilderoy (as referred to on page 232 of this volume) ravaged the fields and houses of some of his tenants, as well as those of many of their neighbours In allusion to this, he says, in his Diary, or record of his 'Spiritual Exercises,' that in doing so they were "by some also encouredged by connivence and correspondence, as is well known in Scotland, and," he continues, "remembering that in the tymes of my ancestors, since memorie of man, the lyke had not been practised upon that land, which God now had given to me by heritable succession, it seemeth that these robbers do take advantage through disesteem of me as being a schoolman, but I serve the same God whom my ancestors served, and hope in his mercy that he will shew me the way whereby these robbers shall repent of this wicked attempt" [Spiritual Exercises, fol 48 MS at Fintray House, quoted in Spalding's Troubles in Scotland, vol i p 69, note] They carried off his cousin, and threatened to put him to death if not ransomed at a heavy sum, and also menaced himself with death if he complained to the council, or adopted any proceedings against them It is stated in the New Statistical Account of Scotland (vol xii p 1118) that on the face of the Hill of Corse, nearly opposite to the castle, there is a small excavation, known as "the laird's hiding hole or chawmer," where he is said to have concealed himself on such occasions of danger He died at Corse, 29th April 1648

In 1703 an elegant edition of his works, in 2 vols. folio, was printed at Amsterdam, with his life, under the superintendence principally of Professor Gurtler of Deventer, and partly of Dr George Garden of Aberdeen His Diary, or Spiritual Exercises, extending from 3d February 1624 to the close of 1647, was included in this edition, but in a Latin dress.

FORBES, WILLIAM, a learned and eloquent prelate, the first bishop of Edinburgh, son of Thomas Forbes, a descendant of the Forbeses of Corsindae, and Janet Cargill, sister of Dr James Cargill, an eminent physician in Aberdeen, was born in that city in 1585 He acquired the rudiments of his education at the Grammar school, and at the age of twelve was sent to Marischal college, where he took his degree of master of arts when only sixteen Soon after, by the influence of the principal (Gilbert Gray) he was appointed regent or professor of logic, in that university, it being the custom in those days to bestow regencies upon young men preparing for the ministry, but at the end of four years, he resigned his professorship, and went to the continent for his improvement After visiting Poland, he pursued his studies at various universities of Germany, and then went to Leyden, where he formed an intimacy with the younger Scaliger, and Vossius, then a professor there, and also with the learned Grotius In the study of divinity and the Hebrew language he made great progress In the latter particularly his attainments were most extensive After spending four years on the continent, he visited England on his way home, and resided for a short time at Oxford, in the university of which place he was offered the professorship of Hebrew, but declined it on account of bad health He returned to Aberdeen in the twenty-fifth year of his age, when the magistrates conferred on him the freedom of the city By Lord Forbes, the patron of the parish, he was appointed minister at Alford, and soon after was translated to Monymusk At the earnest solicitation of the inhabitants of Aberdeen, he was, in the year 1617, appointed by the magistrates of that city, minister of St Nicholas church, and received from the university the degree of D.D, being one of the first who took that degree after its introduction among the reformed clergy of Scotland In the following year he was elected principal of Marischal college, and soon after was elevated to the rectorship In 1621 he resigned the office of principal, but during the short time he held it, he repaired the college buildings and the Greyfriars church The fame of his great eloquence and learning caused the people of Edinburgh to express a desire to have him as one of their ministers, and the General Assembly and the synod of Aberdeen having sanctioned his translation, he accordingly removed to Edinburgh, but did not continue long there.

When Charles the First was in Edinburgh in 1633, Dr Forbes was sent for to preach before his majesty in the Chapel Royal, which he did on the 25th June of that year, taking for his text John xiv 27 The king was so much struck with his eloquence and theological knowledge that he selected him to be the first bishop of Edinburgh, then newly erected into an episcopal see. His nomination took place in January 1634, and he was consecrated in the following month, but his ardent application to study, and his violent exertions in the pulpit,—as he sometimes continued preaching for two or three hours—had much impaired his constitution, and he died on the 1st of April the same year, having enjoyed his bishopric little more than two months "He departed this life," says Spalding, "after the taking of some physic, sitting in his arm-chair, suddenly, a matchless man of learning, languages, utterance, and delivery, a peerless preacher, of a grave and godly conversation" In Keith's Catalogue of Scottish Bishops, the following character is given of this eminent prelate "A person he was endowed most eminently with all Christian virtues, insomuch that a very worthy man, Robert Burnet, Lord Crimond, a judge of the court of session, said of our prelate, that he never saw him but he thought his heart was in heaven, and that he was never alone with him but he felt within himself a commentary on those words of the apostle, 'Did not our hearts burn within us, while he yet talked with us, and opened to us the scriptures.'" The subjoined woodcut of Bishop Forbes is from his portrait in Pinkerton's Iconographia Scotica.

Bishop Forbes published nothing during his life In his doctrines he leaned toward Arminianism, and entertained notions of effecting a reconciliation betwixt the Popish and Protestant churches With a view of setting at rest controversies, he wrote a work of considerable note, published at London in 1658, twenty-four years after his death, entitled 'Considerationes Modestæ et Pacificæ Controversiarum de Justificatione, Purgatorio, Invocatione Sanctorum, et Christo Mediatore et Eucharistia,' 8vo, edited by Thomas Sydserf, bishop of Galloway A new edition appeared at Helmstädt in 1707 He had written numerous notes on the margins of the edition of Bellarmin published at Paris, which Dr Baron, into whose hands the work fell, intended to publish, but did not Some of Forbes' MSS. are said by Sir Thomas Urquhart to have been purchased by Archbishop Laud

FORBES, ALEXANDER, fourth and last Lord Forbes of Pitsligo, only son of the third lord, by Lady Sophia Erskine, third daughter of John, ninth earl of Mar, was born May 22, 1678, and while yet a minor succeeded his father in 1691 To complete his education he went to France, where he became acquainted with Fenelon, by whom he was introduced to the celebrated Guietist, Madame Guion, whose speculative opinions in religion he warmly embraced On his return home he took the oaths and his seat in the Scots parliament, May 24, 1700 Deeply attached to the exiled royal family, he distinguished himself by his opposition to the measures of the government, and adhered to the protest of the duke of Athol against the Union On the oath of abjuration being extended to Scotland, his lordship, with many other conscientious Jacobites, ceased to interfere in public business.

In 1715, when the earl of Mar erected the standard of the Pretender, Lord Pitsligo joined him, and was present at the battle of Sheriffmuir On the failure of that rash enterprise, his lordship retired to the continent, and spent some time at the court of the Pretender at Rome His name did not appear among the number of attainders by government, and on his return to Scotland in 1720, he took up his residence at Pitsligo castle in Aberdeenshire, where he devoted himself to literature and the study of the mystical writers, with whose works he had become acquainted on the continent.

The ruins of the old castle or mansion-house of Pitsligo stand in the parish of the same name, and are surrounded with extensive and still cultivated gardens, which yield some of the finest fruit to be found in Aberdeenshire These ruins are situated on the shore of the Moray Frith, a few miles distant from Fraserburgh The castle has been built at different times, and the walls are from six to seven feet thick Of the date of the square tower or keep there is no record. The rest of the building, forming three sides of a spacious court, is evidently more modern, and was probably erected by Alexander, second Lord Pitsligo, as the arms of that lord, quartered with those of his wife, Lady Mary Erskine, daughter of the earl of Buchan, are still to be seen over the gateway The castle was nearly destroyed after the battle of Culloden The ruins, with part of the estate, were purchased by Sir William Forbes, the representative of the family The parish of Pitsligo was originally composed of the lands of Lord Pitsligo, and the name, derived from the estate, signifies in Gaelic, "hollow shell."

In 1734, Lord Pitsligo published 'Essays Moral and Philosophical,' on several subjects. On the breaking out of the Rebellion of 1745, notwithstanding his age, being then sixty-seven years old, he again took arms for the Stuarts, and being considered a man of excellent judgment, and of a cautious and prudent temper, his example drew many of his neighbours into the insurrection At the head of a regiment of well-appointed cavalry, about one hundred strong, chiefly composed of Aberdeenshire gentlemen and their tenantry, and which was known by his name, he joined the Pretender in Edinburgh after the battle of Preston He shared in all the subsequent movements of the prince's army, and after the battle of Culloden he concealed himself for some time in the mountainous district of the country Although the people who gave him shelter and protection were extremely poor, they freely shared their humble and scanty fare with him He afterwards lurked about the coast of Buchan, and amongst his own tenants in the moors of Pitsligo, and many interesting anecdotes are told of his various adventures and escapes from the pursuit of the military sent in search of him. The place of his concealment was for some time a cave, constructed under the arch of a bridge, at a remote part of the moors of Pitsligo His favourite disguise was that of an old mendicant, which was much favoured by his age and infirmities On one occasion he was seized with an asthmatic fit just as a patrol of soldiers were coming up behind him Having no other expedient, he sat down by the roadside, and begged alms of the party One of the soldiers threw him a small coin, at the same time condoling with him on the severity of his asthma.

Having been attainted of high treason, under the name of Lord Pitsligo, and his estate confiscated, he endeavoured to obtain a reversal of his attainder, on account of a misnomer, his true title being Lord Forbes of Pitsligo The court of session gave judgment in his favour, November 16, 1749, but on appeal this decision was reversed by the House of Lords, February 1, 1750 His only son, the master of Pitsligo, married the daughter of James Ogilvy of Auchiries, Aberdeenshire, and the latter years of Lord Pitsligo's life were spent in the house of Auchiries, when he took the name of Mr. Brown On the last occasion that a search was made for him, his escape was most remarkable. In March 1756, long after all apprehension of a search had ceased, information was given to the then commanding officer at Fraserburgh, that Lord Pitsligo was at that moment in the house of Auchiries On that night Mrs. Sophia Donaldson, a lady who lived much with the family, repeatedly dreamed that the house was surrounded by soldiers Getting out of bed as day began to dawn, she accidentally looked out at the window, and was astonished at actually observing a party of soldiers among some trees near the house At first she supposed they had come to steal poultry, but her sister having awoke, and, being told of soldiers near the house, exclaimed, in great alarm, that she feared they wanted something more than hens! The family being instantly roused, Lord Pitsligo was hurried from his bed into a small recess behind the wainscot of an adjoining room, which was concealed by a bed, in which a lady, Miss Gordon of Towie, who was there on a visit, slept On the soldiers obtaining admission, a most minute search took place Miss Gordon's bed was carefully examined, and one of the party actually felt her chin, to ascertain that it was not a man in a lady's night-dress When the soldiers were in this room, the confinement and anxiety increased Lord Pitsligo's asthma so much, that Miss Gordon, lying in bed, had to counterfeit much and violent coughing to prevent his lordship's high breathings behind the wainscot from being heard On the search being given over, Lord Pitsligo was hastily taken from his confined situation, and replaced in bed, and as soon as he was able to speak, his accustomed kindness of heart made him say to his servant, "James, go and see that these poor fellows get some breakfast, and a drink of warm ale, for this is a cold morning, they are only doing their duty, and cannot bear me any ill will" When the family were felicitating each other on his escape, he pleasantly observed, "A poor prize had they obtained it—an old dying man!"

Lord Pitsligo died December 21, 1762, aged 85 years. He was twice married first, to Rebecca, daughter of John Norton, merchant, London, by whom he had one son, John, master of Pitsligo (died in 1781), and, secondly, to Elizabeth Allen, an English lady, who had no issue In his seclusion at Auchiries house, he occupied himself in composing several religious essays, which, left in manuscript, were published shortly after his death. One of them, entitled 'Thoughts concerning Man's Condition and Duties in this Life, and his Hopes in the World to Come,' with an interesting biographical sketch prefixed, by his kinsman Lord Medwyn (see page 282 of this volume), was published at Edinburgh in 1835

FORBES, DUNCAN, of Culloden, lord president of the court of session, an eminent lawyer, and one of the purest patriots that ever lived, was born either at Culloden house or at the house of Bunchrew, another estate belonging to his father, near Inverness, it is supposed the latter, November 10, 1685 With his elder brother, John, he obtained the rudiments of education at Inverness, where he made great proficiency in the Latin language He was afterwards sent to Edinburgh to complete his education After his father's death in 1704, he is said to have embarked in some commercial speculations, but these not proving successful, he soon abandoned all idea of mercantile pursuits His disposition inclined him to the army, but by the advice of his friends he applied himself to the law, the study of which he pursued with great assiduity, first at Edinburgh, and afterwards at Leyden In 1707 he returned to Scotland, and on 26th July 1709 was admitted advocate Shortly after, through the interest of the duke of Argyle, then at the head of Scottish affairs, he was appointed sheriff of Mid Lothian [Brunton and Haig's Senators of the College of Justice, page 509] By the Argyle family he was much employed, and was intrusted by the duke with the management of his estates during his absence, for which he declined any remuneration, being induced by friendship or gratitude to render this service to his patron His great abilities and manly eloquence soon procured him an extensive practice both before the court of session, and in appeal cases before the House of Lords On the breaking out of the rebellion of 1715 both he and his brother rendered very important service to the government in the north, on which occasion he garrisoned Culloden castle, and appeared in arms at the head of two hundred men, the rebels being masters of Inverness, which, however, soon surrendered. On the suppression of the rebellion he was appointed advocate-depute This office, from the belief that he was to be employed in the prosecution of persons then confined at Carlisle on account of the rebellion, he was most reluctant to accept, as he deemed the sending of the accused out of Scotland for trial highly illegal, but, by the entreaties of his friends, particularly of the earl of Islay, the brother of the duke of Argyle, and afterwards duke himself, he ultimately consented to do so, and entered upon its duties 12th March 1716 [Ibid p 109] To assist such of his countrymen as were among the unfortunate prisoners, with the means of defending themselves, he exerted himself in collecting money from his friends In 1717 he was appointed solicitor-general of Scotland

In 1722 he contested the Inverness district of burghs with Mr Alexander Gordon of Ardoch, when the latter was returned, but, on petition to the House of Commons, Mr Forbes was declared duly elected, and he continued their representative till 1737 In 1725 he was promoted to the highly responsible and important situation of lord-advocate, and during the long period he held this office, comparatively few prosecutions took place, it being a maxim with him that "better twenty guilty persons should escape, than one innocent man should suffer" On the temporary discontinuance of the Scottish secretaryship of state that year, the duties of the office were thrown upon Duncan Forbes, who thus set the precedent by which the lord-advocate, in addition to his other multifarious functions, is burdened with a large proportion of every department of ministerial duty in Scotland In 1734, on the death of his brother, he succeeded to the estate of Culloden On the occurrence of the Porteous riots three years afterwards, he opposed, though the principal law-officer of the Crown for Scotland, the bill brought in by ministers for depriving the city of Edinburgh of some of its privileges and taking away the Netherbow Port of that city Soon after (June 1737) he was nominated lord-president of the court of session, in which elevated station he conducted himself with so much integrity and public spirit as to acquire the lasting esteem and veneration of his countrymen.

During the rebellion of 1745 he used all his power and influence to oppose the progress of the Pretender, and for some time concentrated in his own person the whole elements of government, civil and military, deliberative, judicial, and executive, in the north By his interference and exertions, some of the most powerful of the Highland chiefs were prevented from joining in the insurrection He even impaired and almost ruined his own private fortune in advancing money to assist in paying the king's troops, and to defray other expenses occasioned by the rebellion But the glory he acquired in advancing the prosperity of his country, and in contributing to establish peace and order, was all the reward he ever received for his truly patriotic services. When he applied to government for the repayment of these sums which his loyalty had led him to expend in the cause of the public, the ministry refused to indemnify him for his losses He had spent several years' rents of his estates in the service of government. His brother had expended large sums in the same cause in 1715 Of this, amounting to thirty thousand pounds sterling, not one sixpence was ever repaid to him "The mere money," says Lord Cockburn, in an article on the Culloden Papers, in the Edinburgh Review for February 1816, "he probably never thought of, but the sentiment conveyed in the refusal was somewhat hard to bear On this subject he was silent. But he had induced others on his credit to advance funds for the exigency of the day, and he openly remonstrated against not being enabled to do justice to them He was thanked by his majesty, but this is sometimes the coldest form in which an old servant can be discarded No cause was ever found sufficiently plausible to be openly stated in defence of this conduct, but when we recollect the characters of the duke of Cumberland and of Forbes, we cannot doubt that one of the popular accounts is the true one, which ascribes it all to his having plainly, and even in the king's presence, expressed his decided disapprobation of the violence of the royal army after the battle of Culloden" This ungrateful return is said to have been so mortifying to his generous mind as to have greatly accelerated his death, which took place December 10, 1747, in the 62d year of his age. His remains were buried in Greyfriars churchyard, Edinburgh, and a marble statue to his memory by Roubiliac, considered the chef-d'œuvre of that celebrated sculptor, erected at the expense of the faculty of advocates, adorns the Parliament house, Edinburgh It was, as Mr Burton aptly remarks in the conclusion of his Life of Duncan Forbes, "worthily placed in that noble old hall, where the memory of his services and his character still lives, as of one, who altered and elevated the tone of professional and judicial morality in his day, and left even to the present generation a greater legacy of sound and honest principles, than they might have been able to achieve without his aid There is something in this statue of the florid drapery and excited manner of its French artist, Roubiliac, but the accuracy with which the features are portrayed is sufficient to impart a solemn dignity to the marble face, whence a slightly profuse tone in the adjuncts of the statue, makes a scarcely perceptible deduction In this and in the other representations of President Forbes, we can see that nature, by a harmony of mental and corporeal qualities, not often exemplified, represented the excellences of his mind with singular precision, in a countenance which has scarcely been excelled for the united expression of open honesty, firmness, intellect, and gentleness"

He had married, soon after being called to the bar, Mary, daughter of Hugh Rose, Esq of Kilravock, the adjoining estate to Culloden, and had an only son, John Forbes, who, in 1749, two years after the president's death, received from government a pension of four hundred pounds a-year, a tardy but most inadequate acknowledgment of their obligations to his father Mrs Forbes died early, and the president did not marry again He was a man of great learning, benevolence, and piety, and well versed in the oriental languages He was the friend of Allan Ramsay, Thomson, Pope, Swift, Arbuthnot, Gay, and other poets of his time. The author of the Seasons, who owed much to his patronage and friendship, thus speaks of him, in the language both of gratitude and truth

"Thee Forbes too, whom every worth attends,
As truth sincere, as weeping friendship kind;
Thee truly generous and in silence great,
Thy country feels through her reviving arts,
Plann'd by thy wisdom, by thy soul inform'd,
And seldom has she known a friend like thee."

President Forbes displayed, indeed, says the article in the Edinburgh Review, already quoted, "one of those characters which are sometimes to be found in what Hume calls 'the corners of history,' but which deserve to be blazoned at large on its broadest page He is in every situation so full of honour, of gentleness, of true wisdom, of kindness and intrepidity, that we doubt if there be any one public man of this part of the empire or of the age that is gone, whose qualities ought to be so strongly recommended to the contemplation of all those who wish truly to serve their country" In Johnson's Scots Musical Museum he is stated to have been the author of the tender and pathetic song, beginning "Ah! Chloris, could I now but sit," to the tune of Gilderoy, said to have been written about 1710, and addressed to the lady who became his wife, but the verses are to be found in Sir Charles Sedley's play of the Mulberry Garden, printed in 1675, several years before President Forbes was born Mr Kirkpatrick Sharpe has also shown that one or two other songs which have been attributed to him have been so erroneously, particularly 'Lucky Nancy,' and 'Love is the cause of my Mourning' His writings, chiefly on religious subjects, are as follows

Letter to a Bishop concerning some Important Discoveries in Philosophy and Theology, in favour of Hutchinson's system. London, 1732, 4to, which passed through at least three editions, also translated into French by Father Houbigant.

FORBES, Sir William, baronet, of Pitsligo, an eminent banker, was born at Edinburgh, April

5, 1739 His father, whom he succeeded in the baronetcy, was a member of the faculty of advocates, and died when Sir William was only four years of age. After that event his mother, who was left with but a slender provision, removed with him and his brother to Aberdeen, where he received his education In October 1753 he returned with his mother to Edinburgh, and soon afterwards was introduced as an apprentice into the bank of Messrs Coutts On the expiration of his apprenticeship, which lasted seven years, he acted for two years as clerk in the same establishment In 1761 his diligence and excellent business abilities induced his employers to admit him into the copartnery; and two years afterwards, on the death of one of the Messrs. Coutts, and retirement of another on account of ill health, while the two others were settled in London, a new company was formed, comprising Sir William Forbes, Sir James Hunter Blair, and Sir Robert Herries, who at first carried on business in the name of the old firm In 1773, however, Sir Robert Herries formed a separate establishment in London, when the name was changed to that of Forbes, Hunter, and Co , of which firm Sir William continued to be the head till his death

In 1768 Sir William resided for some months in London, and he subsequently frequently visited the metropolis, being very partial to its society He was one of the earliest members of the celebrated Literary Club, which boasted among its illustrious associates the names of Johnson, Burke, Reynolds, Garrick, and others

In his mercantile transactions, especially in affording assistance to persons in business who applied for it, he was even profuse in his liberality, where he was satisfied that they were worthy of his confidence Among many to whom he extended his beneficent aid was William Smellie, the printer and naturalist, as we learn from Kerr's life of that eminent individual In the management of the numerous charitable institutions of Edinburgh Sir William took a prominent part He was also an active promoter of the Society of Scottish antiquaries, the Institution of Trustees for the Encouragement of Manufactures and Fisheries, and the establishment of a Lunatic Asylum at Morningside He likewise gave his zealous aid in promoting some of the most useful and successful improvements of the northern metropolis, and being a warm adherent of the Scottish Episcopal church, he was unwearied in his exertions to promote its prosperity In acts of public and private charity he expended large sums, and that in so unostentatious a manner that, in most instances, none but those charged with the distribution of the money knew who was the donor

In 1781 he was enabled to purchase the forfeited estate of Pitsligo, in Aberdeenshire, and having thus restored to his family their paternal inheritance, he immediately introduced the most extensive improvements on it He laid out the village of New Pitsligo, and established a number of poor cottars on the most uncultivated parts of the estate, most of whom he allowed to occupy their land rent free, while to others he gave pensions in return for their labour A woodcut of Sir William is subjoined, from a portrait of him by Sir Joshua Reynolds

Sir William dedicated the leisure of his latter years to writing the life of his friend, Dr Beattie, which, with his works, was published in 2 vols 4to, in 1805 He died at his seat near Edinburgh, November 12, 1806, aged 68. He had married, in 1770, Elizabeth, eldest daughter of Dr. afterwards Sir James Hay of Hayston, by whom he had three sons and five daughters.

FORDUN, JOHN DE, author of the 'Scotichronicon,' styled the father of Scottish history, flourished in the latter half of the fourteenth century, and is supposed to have been born at Fordoun in Kincardineshire, whence his surname. Of his life there is nothing of certainty known, farther than that he was a secular priest of the diocese of St Andrews and a chaplain of the cathedral of Aberdeen The time of his death is uncertain A copy of his 'Scotichronicon' was to be found in almost every monastery in Scotland and some in England, and generally took its name from the place to which it belonged The first five books and twenty-three chapters of the sixth book, are the composition of Fordoun, whose object was to supply the want of those historical records which had been carried off by Edward the First The remainder of the history, which extends to sixteen books, and is brought down to the year 1436, is the work of Walter Bower, abbot of Inchcolm in 1418, whose life has been already recorded in this publication In 1722 an edition of the 'Scotichronicon' was published at Oxford by Hearne, and in 1759, another was printed at Edinburgh by Walter Goodall, assistant keeper of the Advocates' Library An excellent manuscript in vellum of the work is preserved in the library of the university of Edinburgh There are also manuscript copies of it in Latin in the Bodleian Library, in the British Museum, and in the Advocates' Library, Edinburgh

FORDYCE, a surname supposed to be derived from lands in the parish of that name in Banffshire, said to be a corruption of two Gaelic words, fuar chess, signifying 'a cold place to the southward,' or from fuar cold, and deas, south. It is more likely to have been a corruption of Forbes,—there being a tradition to that effect,—the Fordyces having also three bears' heads in their coat of arms.

The family of Dingwall Fordyce of Culsh and Brucklay, Aberdeenshire, owes its origin to an intermarriage between the Dingwalls of Brucklay and the Fordyces of Culsh in 1744.

On the side of the Dingwalls it derives its descent from the Dingwalls of Ross-shire, a clan of some note in ancient times, amongst whom were several free barons who had considerable possessions in the counties of Ross and Inverness. Of these the Dingwalls of Kildun, the Dingwalls of Pet (or Petfure), the Dingwalls of Strabroke, and the Dingwalls of Cambuscarry appear to have been the chief. It is believed that those families of the name of Dingwall now resident in Aberdeenshire, are descended from the Dingwalls of Cambuscarry, and that they came to Buchan about the end of the fifteenth century, in order to escape from the violence of the Mackenzies, their hereditary foes.

The first of the name in Buchan of whom there are any authentic accounts, is William Dingwall of Seals-crook, parish of Monquitter, who was born about 1590, and married Barbara Barclay, from which union are descended in direct line, the families of Brucklay, Culsh, and Rannieston.

Arthur, their eldest son, born about 1620, married in 1642 Lucres, second daughter of John Irvine of Brucklay, a cadet of the ancient family of Drum He died in 1707 William, his eldest son, succeeded to Brucklay, while Arthur, his second son, inherited Brownhill, and afterwards acquired Lescraigie. The descendants of the latter succeeded to Brucklay in 1840, when the elder branch became extinct.

William Dingwall of Brucklay, just mentioned, died in 1733 He had a large family, one of whom, John, having gone early to London, became an eminent jeweller there, acquired a large fortune, and having no family, he in September 1807 executed a strict entail of his lands of Brucklay and Artamford, in favour of his grand-nephew, John Dingwall and a series of heirs, whilst his personal property, constituting the bulk of his fortune, was vested in trustees for the purpose of purchasing other lands in England or Scotland, to be entailed on the same series of heirs. He resided for a long time at a villa of his own at Croydon in Surrey, and died there in 1812 at the advanced age of 88. He was succeeded by his grand-nephew, of the same name, who in 1813 married Mary, eldest daughter of William Gordon of Aberdour, and died in 1825, leaving an only son, John Duff Dingwall, on whose death in 1840, without issue, the elder branch of the family became extinct, and the property thereupon devolved upon Arthur Dingwall Fordyce, advocate in Aberdeen, representative of the younger branch of the family He died without issue on 30th December 1843, and was succeeded by his next surviving brother, Alexander, more particularly mentioned below

Upon the side of the Fordyces, this family derives its descent from George Fordyce, who in the middle of the seventeenth century was settled near Turriff, Aberdeenshire, at a place called Haughs of Ashogle. He died in 1681, leaving two sons, John and George, and a daughter

From John are descended the family of Dingwall Fordyce of Culsh and Brucklay, while George, afterwards of Broadford, and provost of Aberdeen in the beginning of last century, was the father of that remarkable family which numbered amongst its members Sir William Fordyce, F.R.S., Professor David Fordyce, Dr James Fordyce, the famous preacher and author, George, M.D., F.R.S., the distinguished physician and lecturer on medicine in London, Baillie Robert Fordyce, manufacturer, Aberdeen; and Alexander Fordyce (Roehampton), the celebrated banker in London, of most of whom memoirs are given hereafter in their proper place.

John, eldest son of George Fordyce and Barbara Thomson, was a merchant in Turriff, and acquired the properties of Gask and Culsh in Buchan,—the latter through his wife, Lilias Lindsay, one of the Dowhill branch of the noble house of Balcarres. He left Gask to his eldest son John, and Culsh to his second son, William, who died unmarried in 1743. The latter entailed Culsh upon his sister, Jean Fordyce, who in April 1744 married William Dingwall, eldest son of Arthur Dingwall of Brownhill, and it is to this intermarriage that the present family of Dingwall Fordyce of Culsh and Brucklay owes its origin.

Their eldest son, William, having died under age, without issue, Arthur, the second son, became the representative of the family. He went to Aberdeen, where he pursued a long and successful career as a lawyer He received the degree of LL.D., and became judge of the commissary or consistorial court there, being the last judge of that court in Aberdeen On succeeding to Culsh at his mother's death in 1788, he assumed the name of Fordyce in addition to that of Dingwall. In 1770 he married Janet, daughter of James Morison of Elgick, sometime provost of Aberdeen, and by her had a numerous family, one of whom, Arthur, captain in the Bengal engineers, distinguished himself as a soldier, under Lord Lake, in subduing the provinces of Oude, Delhi, and Agra, and afterwards at the taking of Java in 1810, when after the capture of the island he became chief engineer The Doctor's grandson, Lieutenant-colonel John Dingwall Fordyce distinguished himself in the Sikh campaign, particularly at the battles of Sabraon and Gujerat, in command of detachments of Bengal horse artillery

Dr Arthur Dingwall Fordyce, commissary of Aberdeen, died there in April 1834, at the advanced age of 89, and his eldest son having predeceased him, he was succeeded in the estate of Culsh by his grandson Arthur, who, as already stated, also succeeded to the Brucklay estates in October 1840

Captain Alexander Dingwall Fordyce, R.N, the present representative of the family (1854), succeeded to the estates of Culsh and Brucklay, on the death of his elder brother Arthur, in December 1843. He is third son of William Dingwall Fordyce of Techmuiry (eldest son of the commissary) and Margaret Ritchie, his wife. He entered the navy at an early age, served actively afloat in most parts of the world for twenty-one years, was present at the capture of Gluckstadt on the Elbe in 1814, and the battle of Algiers in 1816 He attained the rank of commander in 1841, was appointed deputy-lieutenant of Aberdeenshire in 1845, and in 1847 was elected M P for his native city of Aberdeen, and continued so till the dissolution in July 1852 He married in 1835, Barbara Thom, daughter of James Thom, Esq of Aberdeen, and by her has a family of four sons and four daughters. His younger brother, George Dingwall Fordyce, entered the bar in 1832, and was appointed an advocate depute in May 1851. He married another daughter of the said James Thom

The family of Fordyce of Ayton in Berwickshire are believed to be sprung from a branch of the Fordyces of Aberdeenshire. Of this family was Lieutenant-colonel John Fordyce, of the 74th Highlanders, who was killed at Waterkloof, Cape of Good Hope, in 1851 He was the eldest son of Thomas John Fordyce, Esq of Ayton, by Anne, daughter of George Buchan, Esq of Kelloe, and grandson of the Right Hon John Fordyce of Ayton, commissioner of the woods and forests, and M P for Berwickshire He entered the army as an ensign in the 84th regiment in 1828, and in 1846 became lieutenant-colonel of the 74th Highlanders. In March 1851 he embarked with his regiment for the Cape of Good Hope, where, after months of severe and harassing warfare against the Kaffirs and rebel Hottentots, he fell at the head of his gallant Highlanders in the prime of his manhood.

FORDYCE, DAVID, an elegant and learned writer, was the second son of George Fordyce, of Broadford, above mentioned, and his wife, a sister of Dr Thomas and Dr Alexander Blackwell (see vol i pages 314 and 315), by whom he had a family of twenty-one children He was born in 1711, and received the early part of his education at the grammar school of his native town At the age of thirteen he entered the Greek class in Marischal college, and in 1728 he took the degree of M A He was originally designed for the church, but though duly licensed to preach the gospel, he never became an ordained minister He is said to have been, for a short time, domestic chaplain to John Hopkins, Esq of Bretons, in Essex. In September 1742 he was admitted professor of philosophy in Marischal college In 1745 he published the first volume of his 'Dialogues on Education,' the second volume of which appeared in 1748 He also wrote for Dodsley's 'Preceptor,' a treatise on Moral Philosophy, which attracted so much attention that it was published in a separate form in 1754, under the title of 'The Elements of Moral Philosophy,' and was often reprinted In 1750 he visited Rome, and on his return home in September 1751, he was drowned off the coast of Holland, in the 41st year of his age

FORDYCE, JAMES, D D, an eminent clergyman, brother of the preceding, was born in Aberdeen in 1720 He received his education at the Marischal college, and early devoted himself to the ministry In 1752 he was ordained minister of Brechin, and soon after accepted of a call from Alloa, during his residence in which place he printed three occasional sermons, which attracted much notice In 1760 he published a discourse, preached before the General Assembly 'On the Folly, Infamy, and Misery of Unlawful Pleasures,' which still farther increased his reputation

Soon after, he received the degree of D D from the university of Glasgow, and having removed to London, he was invited by the congregation of protestant dissenters in Monkwell Street to be the colleague of Dr Samuel Lawrence, then aged and infirm This invitation he accepted, and on Dr Lawrence's death he succeeded as sole pastor During his ministry at this place he acquired a high degree of popularity from the strong force of his eloquence and striking figure

After he had been some years at Monkwell Street, he obtained the assistance of a coadjutor, Mr Toller, son-in-law of Dr Lawrence In 1775, however, he had an unhappy dispute with Mr Toller, which led to the ejection of the latter from the chapel, and very much thinned the congregation. In 1782 declining health, and the dispersion of his hearers, induced Dr Fordyce to resign the ministry.

The latter years of his life were chiefly spent in retirement in Hampshire, in the neighbourhood of Lord Bute, with whom he lived in great intimacy, and to whose valuable library he had free access. Soon after the death of his brother, Sir William Fordyce, M D, the subject of the following notice, he removed to Bath, where he died somewhat suddenly, October 1, 1796, in his 76th year In 1771 he had married Miss Henrietta Cummyngs, who survived him It was Dr James Fordyce, and not his brother, Mr David, as erroneously stated by Stenhouse and Allan Cunningham, who was the author of the beautiful song, "Hark! yonder eagle lonely wails," inserted in Johnson's Musical Museum (vol iii p 237) His works are

FORDYCE, Sir William, F R.S, a distinguished physician, brother of the preceding, was born at Aberdeen in 1724 Like his brothers, he was educated at the Marischal college, and at the age of eighteen he had completed the usual academical course After having studied physic and surgery under an able practitioner in his native town, he joined the army as a volunteer, and served as surgeon to the brigade of guards on the coast of France, and in the wars of Germany. He afterwards commenced practice as a physician in London The warm support of his military friends, and of several persons of rank, to whom he had been serviceable, concurred with his own merit and address in recommending him to extensive practice His publications on medical subjects greatly added to his reputation; and he was sent for to greater distances, and received larger sums, than almost any physician of his time By the bankruptcy of his brother Alexander, (of whom a notice is given in next article,) he was involved to a very serious extent; but notwithstanding his own losses, he repaid to his brother James those incurred by him, amounting to several thousand pounds. His fortune was also much impaired by his great benevolence and his unbounded liberality to his family and friends, and he was a kind and generous patron to many of his young countrymen, who were, from time to time, recommended to his good offices

About 1787 he received the honour of knighthood from his majesty He was also elected a fellow of the Royal Society For his successful attempts to cultivate that valuable medicine, rhubarb, on the proper method of cultivating and curing which in Great Britain he published a treatise just before his death, the Society for the Encouragement of the Arts unanimously voted him a gold medal Although originally of a delicate constitution, by temperance and exercise he preserved his health for many years, but after a long and severe illness he died, December 4, 1792 He had been elected lord rector of Marischal college, to which he bequeathed his library, and one thousand pounds to found a lectureship on agriculture His works are

FORDYCE, ALEXANDER, an eminent banker, who obtained an unhappy celebrity by his ruinous commercial speculations, was the brother of the subjects of the three preceding articles, and like them was a native of Aberdeen After receiving his education in that city, he went to London, and became one of the most enterprising bankers in the metropolis By the enormous extent of his transactions, and it is said a strong combination in London against him, he finally not only involved himself but many others in irretrievable ruin The following notice of Mr Alexander Fordyce occurs in a sermon addressed to tradesmen, preached and published in 1775, by the Rev Thomas Toller of London, already mentioned, (p 245) as for some time the coadjutor of his brother, Dr James Fordyce "He had a mind not ill-formed for commerce, and from his early success in it was enabled, though of an obscure original, to live respectably If his views had extended no farther, it would have been well, but his ambition was unbounded The revenue of a kingdom would hardly have sufficed to have executed his schemes He seemed bent on engrossing the trade of the whole world Large sums were borrowed of one and of another His friends advanced liberally, and so high was his reputation, that they had no doubt of their effects being secure But the event proved that they were wretchedly deceived His affairs were embarrassed, his difficulties increased, and at length grew inextricable, a total stoppage ensued, the issue of a commission of bankruptcy, by some chicanery, was prevented, and but a small part of his enormous debts hath been paid to this very hour I shall not pretend to enumerate the many families which by his means sunk into distress His fall was like the fall of a towering structure which overwhelms numbers with its ruins It deserves, however, particular mention, that the news of his failure despatched one brother to the regions of the dead, and, which is yet more lamentable, drove another into a state of insanity" He married in 1770 Lady Margaret Lindsay, second daughter of the earl of Balcarres and sister of the celebrated Lady Anne Lindsay or Barnard (see vol i p 251) A most touching letter from Lady Margaret Fordyce to her husband on his failure is inserted in Lord Lindsay's 'Lives of the Lindsays,' vol ii page 336 After Mr Fordyce's death Lady Margaret became the wife of Sir James Burgess, baronet See a notice of her in vol i p 207 of this work

FORDYCE, GEORGE, an eminent physician and lecturer on medicine, nephew of the preceding, was the only and posthumous child of Mr. George Fordyce, the proprietor of a small landed estate called Broadford, in the neighbourhood of Aberdeen, where the subject of this memoir was born, November 18, 1736 He studied at Marischal college, where he took the degree of M A at the early age of fourteen About a year afterwards he became apprentice to his uncle, Dr John Fordyce, who practised as a surgeon at Uppingham, in Rutlandshire He subsequently went to the university of Edinburgh, where he studied chemistry under Dr Cullen, who was much pleased with his diligence and ingenuity In October 1758 he obtained his diploma of M D Shortly afterwards he went to Leyden, for the purpose chiefly of studying anatomy under Albinus

In 1759 he returned to London, where, contrary to the wishes of his relations, he determined to establish himself as a teacher and practitioner of medicine Accordingly, before the close of that year, with a class of only nine pupils, he commenced a course of lectures upon chemistry In 1764 he began to lecture also upon materia medica and the practice of physic These three subjects he continued to teach for nearly thirty years, giving, for the most part, three courses of lectures on each of them every year

In 1762 Dr Fordyce married a daughter of Charles Stuart, Esq, conservator of Scots privileges in the United Netherlands, by whom he had two sons and two daughters

In 1765 he was admitted a licentiate of the college of physicians In 1768 he published his 'Elements of the Practice of Physic,' a valuable epitome of medicine, which he used as the text-book of his medical course He obtained a respectable share of private practice, and in 1770 was chosen physician to St. Thomas' Hospital, after a severe contest, when 109 voted for him and 106 for Dr. Watson In 1774 he became a member of the famous Literary Club to which Dr Johnson belonged In 1776 his merit as a man of science caused him to be elected a fellow of the Royal Society, in whose Transactions he published some curious observations and experiments, tending to show the power of the human body to resist the effects of a very high temperature, as well as many other valuable papers

In 1787 he was admitted, speciali gratia, a fellow of the college of physicians; and his chemical knowledge was of much value to that body in preparing a new edition of their Pharmacopœia. In 1793 he formed one of a small body of physicians and surgeons which published several volumes under the title of 'Medical and Chirurgical Transactions.' Dr. Fordyce died May 25, 1802 His works are

FORFAR, earl of, a title in the Scottish peerage, bestowed on Archibald Douglas, second earl of Ormond, son of Archibald earl of Angus, eldest son and heir apparent of William first marquis of Douglas, and by patent dated 3d April 1651, earl of Ormond, Lord Bothwell and Hartsde. The first earl of Forfar, his son, born in 1653, obtained a new patent, dated 20th October 1661, creating him earl of Forfar, Lord Wandale, and Hartside, with remainder to his heirs male. He early supported the Revolution, and besides being sworn a privy councillor to King William, was appointed one of the commissioners for executing the office of keeper of the privy seal for Scotland. He was also a member of the privy council to Queen Anne, who appointed him one of the commissioners of the treasury, an office abolished by the Union, to the treaty of which he gave his constant support in the last Scots parliament. He died 12th December 1712, in his 60th year

His only son, Archibald, second earl of Forfar, was appointed colonel of the 3d regiment of foot or Buffs, 14th April 1713, and in the following year was nominated by King George the First envoy extraordinary to Prussia. He acted as a brigadier-general in the army of the duke of Argyle, at the battle of Sheriffmuir, 13th November, 1715, when he received a shot in the knee, and sixteen other wounds, of which he died at Stirling, 8th December following, unmarried when his titles merged in the dukedom of Douglas, and became extinct in 1761

FORFAR, a surname, derived from the town of that name. The name has been conjectured to be formed of the Gaelic fuar, cold, and bhar, or var, a point, signifying the cold point, a derivation not unsuitable Possibly its last syllable may have been taken from the Welsh fawr, an eminence Locally it is pronounced Farfar

FORMAN, ANDREW, archbishop of St Andrews, commendator of Pittenweem, and of Cottingham in England, said to have been one of the best statesmen of his age, was the son of the laird of Hutton in the parish of that name, in Berwickshire The only trace of the possessions of his family that is left is a small field which still retains the name of "Forman's land" In 1499 he was proto-notary apostolic in Scotland, and in 1501 he was employed, along with Robert Blackader, archbishop of Glasgow, and Patrick, earl of Bothwell, to negociate a marriage between James the Fourth of Scotland and Margaret, eldest daughter of Henry the Seventh of England, which the following year was ratified by the Scottish ambassadors. In 1502 he was appointed bishop of Moray, and, together with that see, held, in commendam, the priories of Pittenweem in Scotland, and of Cottingham in England He was afterwards employed as mediator between Pope Julius the Second and Louis the Twelfth of France, and had the satisfaction of composing the difference which had existed between them

On his return from Rome he passed through France, where he was graciously received by the king and queen, who bestowed upon him the bishopric of Bourges, from which he annually derived four hundred tuns of wine, ten thousand francs of gold, and other smaller matters He was also most liberally rewarded by Pope Julius, who, in 1514, promoted him to the archbishopric of St. Andrews, conferred on him the two rich abbeys of Dunfermline and Aberbrothock, and made him his legate a latere The archbishopric, however, being claimed by the learned Gavin Douglas, bishop of Dunkeld, (who had been nominated by the queen,) and by John Hepburn, who was preferred by the monks, Forman only obtained possession of it by surrendering the bishopric of Moray, as well as giving up some years' revenue of the archbishopric itself, and paying Hepburn three thousand French crowns annually out of his ecclesiastical revenues

In 1517, Archbishop Forman was appointed by the States one of the lords of the regency during the minority of James the Fifth, on the occasion of the duke of Albany's going to France The archbishop, who was frequently employed as ambassador to England, France, and Rome, had the good fortune to reconcile a difference between the duke of Albany and the nobility, which at one time threatened to lead to bloodshed Mackenzie, in his Lives, informs us that in the Collection of Letters of the Scottish Kings from 1505 to 1626, preserved in the Advocates' library, there is an epistle from the Pope to James the Fourth, dated May 6, 1511, commending Forman highly, and promising that, at the first creation of cardinals, he should be made one His death, however, prevented him from fulfilling his intention In the same Collection there is a letter from the duke of Albany to Leo the Tenth, the successor of Julius, in which he urges the Pope to advance Forman to the dignity of a cardinal, promised him by his predecessor, and to continue him as legate a latere Archbishop Forman died in 1521, and was buried at Dunfermline. Dempster records that he wrote a book against Luther, a Treatise concerning the Stoic Philosophy, and a Collection out of the Decretals. Historians differ in their estimate of Archbishop Forman's character, and at this distance of time it would be somewhat difficult to pronounce a correct opinion as to its real features

FORREST, a surname obviously derived from an extensive wood, as indicated in the arms of those bearing it, namely, three oak trees. The family of Forrest of Comiston in Mid Lothian, possess a baronetcy, conferred in 1838, on James Forrest, then lord provost of Edinburgh, who had distinguished himself as a supporter of the liberal interest. Sir James, the son of John Forrest, Esq, writer to the signet, by the only daughter of James Forrest, Esq of Comiston, was born in 1780, and passed advocate in 1803. He died 5th April 1860, and was succeeded by his son, Sir Thomas, 2d baronet. The new approach to George the Fourth's Bridge, Edinburgh, from the Meadows and Lauriston, is named Forrest Road, after the first baronet, who was lord provost of the city at the time of its being opened

One of the early martyrs of the Reformation in Scotland was a Benedictine friar of Linlithgow, named Henry Forrest, of whose parentage, descent, and previous history nothing is known. Having been heard to declare that Mr Patrick Hamilton, the protomartyr, was a good man, and that the doctrines for which he suffered might be vindicated, he was, at the instance of the then archbishop, James Bethune, chancellor of the kingdom, apprehended for heresy, and committed to the prison of St. Andrews. Not having evidence sufficient to condemn him, his persecutors, with the view of extorting some declaration which they might employ against him, caused a friar, named Walter Laing, to hear his confession He received Laing as a spiritual comforter, and not suspecting any treachery, he, without hesitation, confidentially avowed, upon his conscience, that, in his opinion, Hamilton was a good man, and that the doctrines which he died to maintain were not heretical. The friar revealed what he had heard in confession to his superiors, and his evidence was held quite sufficient to establish the crime of heresy A New Testament in English being also found in Forrest's possession, he was straightway condemned to be burnt alive as a heretic. When the fatal day arrived, and he was brought before the clergy, in a place between the castle of St. Andrews and Monimail, he complained, with the utmost bitterness, of the villany by which he had been entrapped. "Fie on falsehood!" he cried. "Fie on false friars, revealers of confessions. After this day let no man ever trust false friars, contemners of God's word, and deceivers of men!" The clergy heard his reproaches with the greatest indifference, and proceeded to degrade him of his friar's orders. Upon this he again exclaimed, "Take from me not only your own orders, but also your own baptism," referring to the absurd additions which Popery had made to that simple rite. He was thereafter burned as a "heretic equal with Patrick Hamilton," near the Abbey church of St. Andrews. Forrest is said to have been a man young in years. His martyrdom took place in 1538

FORREST, ROBERT, a self-taught sculptor See SUPPLEMENT

FORRESTER, a surname of great antiquity, originally derived from the office of keeper of the king's forests, as appears from their armorial bearings, hunting horns. There was an ancient family of this name, designed of Renton, in Berwickshire, which several centuries since terminated in an heiress, who married Elim of Elimfoord. From the latter family the estate again passed with another heiress to the Homes [Nisbet's Heraldry, vol i p. 482] From another old family of the name, Forrester of Carden in Stirlingshire, the Forresters of Denovan were descended. A son of one of the Forresters of Carden married about 1496 the heiress of Strathhenries of that ilk, and the estate continued in the name of Forrester till the reign of King Charles the Second, when a younger son of Douglas of Kirkness married the heiress, and got the lands. In the reigns of Charles the Second and James the Seventh, a Sir Andrew Forrester was under secretary of state

FORRESTER, Lord, a title in the Scottish peerage, now merged by marriage in the English family of Grimston, earl of Verulam and Viscount Grimston The immediate ancestor of the Lords Forrester was Sir Adam Forrester, a wealthy burgess of Edinburgh, who, in the reign of King David Bruce, in 1365, obtained a charter, under the great seal, of lands at Whitburn, in the constabulary of Linlithgow, with remainder to his heirs male, &c., and in 1370, during the reign of the same monarch, on the resignation of William de Seton, received another charter of lands at Nudriff or Niddery, in the same constabulary, with like remainder He was possessed of an immense estate, having got from King Robert the Second no less than six charters, under the great seal, of different lands and baronies, and is supposed to have acquired the greater part of his fortune by trading with England. In the Rotuli Scotiæ we find a license granted to him to bring grain into Scotland, without payment of duty In 1378 he was provost of Edinburgh and in 1382 sheriff of Lothian. The barony of Corstorphine near Edinburgh which became the chief designation of his family, he acquired in 1376 from Gilchrist More, brother of Sir William More of Abercorn On the accession of Robert the Third, in 1390, Sir Adam was appointed lord privy seal, and between the years 1391 and 1404 he was employed no less than seven times in negociating treaties between England and Scotland In 1402 he was present at the battle of Homildon Hill, where he was taken prisoner, and, with several others, was presented to King Henry the Fourth, in full parliament, when he made a speech showing the advantages of a solid and durable peace between the two kingdoms. He was soon exchanged, and in 1405 became depute chamberlain of the southern division of the kingdom, under the earl of Buchan eldest son of the regent Robert duke of Albany He died the same year, and was buried in the chapel of St. John the Baptist at Corstorphine He was twice married first, to Agnes, daughter of John Dundas of Fingask, and, secondly, to a lady whose Christian name was Margaret, but whose surname is not known, and had two sons.

Sir John Forrester, the elder son, in 1407 got a charter from the regent Robert duke of Albany, of the barony of Uchtertyre in Stirlingshire. He succeeded his father in the office of depute chamberlain of the southern division of the kingdom After 1408 he acted as depute chamberlain of the whole kingdom, under the earl of Buchan, during whose absence in France he appears to have performed all the functions of lord high chamberlain In 1416 he was appointed one of the commissioners for treating with the English about the release of King James the First, and in 1421 he was constituted lord privy seal by the regent Murdoch duke of Albany In 1423 he became one of the hostages for the king's liberation, which was effected the following year By that monarch he was so highly esteemed that on his return to Scotland he appointed him master of his household, an office then first instituted. The earl of Buchan being killed at the battle of Verneuil in Normandy, Sir John was made lord high chamberlain in 1425, and by King James he was continually employed in negociations with the English. He was one of the jury on the trial of Murdoch duke of Albany in May 1425 In 1429 he founded and endowed the collegiate church of Corstorphine, and dedicated it to St. John the Baptist, for a provost, five prebendaries, and two singing boys. He died in 1440, and was buried in the chancel of the collegiate church which he had founded, and which is now the parish church of Corstorphine. The coat of arms of the family of Forrester is everywhere dispersed over the building, and within the church, in niches, are several monumental remains of this family, with effigies cut in stone, as large as life. The male figures are covered with complete armour, and the female appear richly ornamented according to the fashion and dress of the times. He had two sons, Sir John, his successor, and Henry, styled of Liberton

The elder son, Sir John Forrester of Corstorphine, took part with the earls of Douglas in their struggles with the chancellor Crichton and Livingston, and in 1466 led the troops which besieged and demolished Brankston castle. The stone figure above his grave represents a man of Herculean mould. [New Stat. Acc. of Scotland, vol i p. 211] He was succeeded by Sir Alexander Forrester, supposed to be his son, whose name occurs in the records of parliament, 18th October, 1466, when the lords auditors charged Sir Alexander Forbes of Pitsligo to cease all intromitting with the lands of Fingask, and the office of bailliary of the same, belonging to Sir Alexander Forrester of Corstorphine, till he appear before the lords of council Deeply imbued with the superstitious feelings of his age, he headed in 1464 a pilgrimage to the shrine of Thomas à Becket at Canterbury, and another, in 1466, to that of John de Amvase in Picardy; being accompanied on both occasions by several of the neighbouring proprietors, with thirty followers in their train [Ibid.]

His son, Sir Archibald Forrester, of Corstorphine, was present in parliament on 27th February 1469, and again on 6th July 1476 His name also occurs in the parliamentary records on 7th January 1504-5 His son and successor, Sir Alexander, married a daughter of Sir Duncan Forrester of Gardyne, king's comptroller, and keeper of the forest of Torwood, &c., and by her he had a son, Sir James, designed of Meadowhead in the lifetime of his father, who had bestowed that estate upon him in 1538. Afterwards he succeeded to the whole barony of Corstorphine He had two sons, Sir James, served heir to his father in February 1557, and Henry, who, on the death of his brother in June 1589, without issue, inherited the estate.

The son of Henry, Sir George Forrester of Corstorphine, a man of singular capacity, was by Charles the First, in 1625, created a baronet of Nova Scotia. He was also appointed high sheriff of the shire of Edinburgh, and raised to the peerage of Scotland July 22, 1633, by the title of Lord Forrester of Corstorphine. He married Christian, daughter of Sir William Livingston of Kilsyth, (father of the first viscount of Kilsyth,) and had five daughters, but having no son, he obtained a new patent, extending the title to James Baillie, younger of Torwoodhead and Letham, (eldest son of the celebrated Lieutenant-general Baillie,) who married his lordship's fourth daughter, Joanna, and to their heirs male, whom failing, to his brother William Baillie who married his youngest daughter, Lilias, and their heirs, and in failure of heirs male the title to descend to the heirs female. The surname and arms of Forrester were imposed on the two sons of General Baillie and their heirs by his lordship's daughters.

In virtue of this new patent, on the death of the first lord, 23d April 1654, his son-in-law, James Baillie of Torwoodhead and Letham, born 29th October 1629, became second Lord Forrester. He signalised himself by his ardent loyalty, and on one occasion, as related by Nicol in his Diary, while Cromwell's soldiers were in Edinburgh, his lordship caused a proclamation to be affixed on the close heads and other public places of that city, calling on all persons residing in Mid Lothian to put forth horse according to their rents for the king's army. In 1654 he was fined by Cromwell's act of grace and indemnity £2,500 sterling, and his estate was overrun and pillaged by the English troops. His affairs, in consequence, became much involved, and his rents being attached by his numerous creditors, he gave himself up to dissipation, frequently spending whole days drinking in an alehouse in the village of Corstorphine. [New Stat. Acc. vol. i. p. 212.] On the 26th August he was murdered in his own garden by Christian Hamilton, the wife of James Nimmo, a merchant in Edinburgh, the daughter of Andrew Hamilton of Grange, by his wife the elder sister of Lady Forrester. She was, therefore, the grand-daughter of the first Lord Forrester, and niece, by marriage, of her victim the second lord. With this woman he had carried on an intrigue, and on the day mentioned she arrived at Corstorphine castle, and learning that he was at the alehouse, she was on her way to it, when they met near the Pigeon-house, to the east of the castle, and a quarrel ensuing, she, being of a violent temper, stabbed him with his own sword. She was tried for the crime on 28th August, and being found guilty, was sentenced to be executed. She made her escape out of Edinburgh prison, 29th September, in male attire but was retaken next day, and beheaded at the cross of Edinburgh 12th November 1679. She is said to have usually carried a sword beneath her gown. [Fountainhall's Decisions of the Court of Session, vol. i. p. 56.] A full account of this tragical event is given in a foot note to page 182 of Kirkton's History of the Church of Scotland, edited by Mr Kirkpatrick Sharpe. It is there incorrectly stated, however that Lord Forrester was a presbyterian zealot, and had erected a meeting house near Edinburgh, after the Indulgence granted in 1672. On the contrary, his lordship was an episcopalian, and both set at defiance the orders of the presbytery, and urged the minister of Corstorphine to obtain lists of the nonconformists, with the view of enforcing the laws against them. By his wife, Joanna, his lordship had one son, William, who died in infancy. He married, a second time, Lady Jean Ruthven, 2d daughter of Patrick earl of Forth and Brentford, by whom he had five children, who all took the name of Ruthven. The succession to the title of Lord Forrester, according to the destinations of the new patent, being limited to his issue and heirs by his first wife, his brother, William, became third lord, but did not assume the title, and died in May 1681, in his 49th year.

William's only son by his wife Lilias Forrester, also named William, succeeded as fourth lord, and on the 31st August 1698, he presented to the parliament of Scotland the patent in favour of the deceased James, Lord Forrester, and his heirs, requesting that it might be recorded, which was accordingly done. It is stated in the New Statistical of Scotland, that William Lord Forrester having quarrelled with Mr George Henry, the minister of Corstorphine, who had been presented to that parish by the second Lord Forrester during the prevalency of episcopacy, prevented his tenants from attending the church, advising them, rather, to go to the meeting-houses of the presbyterians, and this because Mr Henry had demanded payment of some money which he had lent his lordship. This Mr Henry was expelled at the Revolution for refusing to proclaim William and Mary. His lordship died in 1705. He had, with four daughters, six sons, namely, Andrew, who died in infancy; George, who became fifth lord, William, who died young; another Andrew, a major of the horse-guards; James, an officer in the navy, and John, captain R.N., whose only son, William, succeeded as sixth lord. The family estate had by this time become deeply involved in debt, and the whole incumbrances having been by Hugh Wallace of Inglistown, writer to the signet, accumulated in his person, on 19th December 1679 this gentleman obtained a charter under the great seal, of the barony of Corstorphine, and his title was ratified by Lord Forrester in November 1698. The family of Forrester appear to have resided at Corstorphine castle up to this time. In 1701, the estate was sold to Sir Robert Dickson of Sornebeg, whose son in 1708 again sold it to Sir James Dick of Prestonfield, in whose family it still remains. [New Stat Acc., vol. i. p. 213.]

George, the fifth lord, born 23d March, 1688, voted at the general election of Scottish peers, 17th June 1708, but his vote was set aside by the House of Lords on account of his being then under age. He was an officer in the army, and served with reputation under the duke of Marlborough on the continent. In the attack on the rebels at Preston in Lancashire on 13th November 1715, he commanded the 26th regiment of foot, or Cameronians, as lieutenant-colonel, when he showed extraordinary intrepidity. Ordering his men to halt till he should personally survey the position of the insurgents, he deliberately rode into the street with his drawn sword in his hand, and, amidst a shower of bullets, coolly examined one of the four barriers which had been raised by them. He then sallied into the street at the head of his men, and whilst with one party he attacked the barrier, another, under his directions took possession of two houses which overlooked the whole town. He was, however, unsuccessful in every attempt to force the barrier, and in the struggle received several wounds. Appointed colonel of the 30th foot in January 1716, he was promoted to the command of the 2d troop of horse grenadier guards 17th July 1717, and in April 1719 was appointed colonel of the fourth or Scots troop of horse guards. He died in March 1727. He had a son, George, and two daughters, Caroline, who succeeded as Baroness Forrester, in her own right, and Harriet, married to Edward Walter, Esq. of Stallbridge, Dorsetshire, and had a daughter, Harriet, who, in 1774, became the wife of James Bucknall, third Viscount Grimston, in the peerage of Ireland, and had a son, James Walter, who succeeded as eighth Lord Forrester, and two daughters.

George, sixth lord, was a captain in the navy. In 1741 he commanded the Newcastle in the fleet under Sir John Norris, sent to the coast of Spain, and the following year, while in command of the Leopard of 50 guns, he took a Spanish ship of 24 guns, laden with stores and provisions. In August of the same year he captured another Spanish vessel laden with piastres, logwood, cochineal, cocoa, and wine, and having on board a bishop and priest, a Spanish general and other officers. He was in the Mediterranean fleet early in 1744, when Admiral Matthews hoisted his flag, and the same year he commanded the Defiance of 60 guns in the Channel fleet. He died unmarried, 26th June 1748, and was succeeded as seventh lord by his cousin William, above mentioned, a lieutenant in the royal navy, only son of the Hon. Captain John

Forrester The seventh lord also died unmarried, in November 1763, when the title devolved on his cousin, Caroline, elder daughter of the fifth lord. She married George Cockburn of Ormiston, Captain R.N., one of the commissioners and comptroller of the navy, and had two daughters; the elder of whom, Anna Maria, succeeded her mother, on her death, 25th February 1784, as Baroness Forrester, and dying unmarried, December 3, 1806, the title devolved on the Hon. James Walter Grimston, the son of her cousin Harriet, Viscountess Grimston, grand-daughter of George, fifth lord. On the death of his father, on the 31st of the same month, he became fourth Viscount Grimston, and in 1815 he was created earl of Verulam, in the peerage of the United Kingdom. The paternal name of this family, into which the Scottish peerage of Lord Forrester has now merged, is Luckyn. In the seventeenth century Sir Capel Luckyn married the daughter and heiress of the celebrated Sir Harbottle Grimston. His grandson assumed the name of Grimston, was created in 1719 Viscount Grimston and Baron Dunboyne in Ireland, and was grandfather of the first earl of Verulam, eighth Lord Forrester Although they possess one of the titles (Verulam) and the princely seat, Gorhambury, near St. Albans, of Lord Chancellor Bacon, neither the Grimstons nor the Luckyns are in any way descended from him Lady Luckyn's stepmother was, however, the daughter of Sir Nathaniel Bacon, K.B

FORRESTER, Thomas, the Rev, a minister of the seventeenth century, remarkable in his day as a satirical poet, was the third minister of Melrose after the Reformation, the first being a Mr Pont, and the second Mr John Knox, a nephew of the Reformer Forrester succeeded the latter as minister of the parish in 1623, and made himself conspicuous by his high church notions, his pointed satires, and his eccentricity of conduct He scrupled not to declare publicly that some kinds of servile work might be done on the Lord's day, and as an example to his people, he brought home his corn on Sunday from the fields to his barnyard He also maintained that the public and ordinary preaching of the word was no necessary part of divine worship, that the reading of the liturgy was to be preferred to it, and that pastors and private Christians should use no other prayers than those prescribed by the church He was likewise charged with Arminianism and Popery, and with having declared that the Reformers had done more harm to the Christian church than the Popes at Rome had done for ages He was accordingly deposed by the General Assembly of 1638 After his ejection he composed a burlesque litany of his own in verse, in which he strongly ridiculed the chief characters and the covenanting principles of the times This strange production, which is slightly mentioned by Bishop Guthrie in his Memoirs, will be found preserved in Maidment's 'Book of Scottish Pasquils,' printed in 1828 Forrester is also said to have written a severe epitaph on Sir Thomas Hamilton, who was created by James the Sixth, in 1619, earl of Melrose, a title which he afterwards exchanged for that of earl of Haddington, and also the epitaph on the earl of Strafford, which is in Cleveland's Poems. His subsequent history, with the date of his death, has not been recorded.

FORRET, Thomas, one of the early martyrs for the reformed doctrines in Scotland, was vicar of Dollar, and belonged to the house of Forret of Forret in Fife The name in our histories is commonly but erroneously assumed to have been Forrest. The estate of Forret is in the parish of Logie in the north of Fife, and belonged to a family of the same name since the reign of William the Lion till the seventeenth century, when it came into the possession of Sir David Balfour, (fourth son of Sir Michael Balfour of Denmyine,) who, on being appointed a lord of session in 1674, took the judicial title of Lord Forret The estate now belongs to a family of the name of Mackenzie In 1466 John Forret of Forret was one of the assize for clearing the marches of the abbot of Dunfermline, and in the General Assembly which met at Edinburgh on 6th March 1573, the bishop of St Andrews was complained upon for permitting one Sir John Forret, a popish priest, to administer the sacrament of baptism at Swinton in the Merse The father of the subject of this notice had been master stabler to James the Fourth After acquiring the rudiments of grammar in his native country, he was sent to the Continent by the kindness of a rich lady, and completed his education at Cologne On his return to Scotland he was admitted a canon regular in the monastery of St Colm's Inch A dispute having arisen between the abbot and the canons, respecting the allowance due to them, the latter got the book of foundation to examine into their rights The abbot, with the view of obtaining possession of this book, gave them in exchange for it a volume of the works of Augustine, which happened to be in the monastery. This volume passing into the hands of Forret, was the fortunate means of enlightening his mind "Oh! happy and blessed was that book to me," did he often say afterwards, "by which I came to the knowledge of the truth" He now applied himself to the reading of the Scriptures, and succeeded in converting a number of the young canons "But the old bottles," he used to say, meaning the older members of the order, "would not receive the new wine." The abbot frequently advised him to keep his mind to himself, otherwise he would incur punishment "I thank you, my lord," was his reply, "you are a friend to my body, but not to my soul"

Forret was subsequently admitted to the vicarage of Dollar, in the shire of Clackmannan, in which situation his diligence in instructing his parishioners, and his benevolence in freeing them from oppressive exactions, rendered him extremely obnoxious to the clergy When the agents of the pope came into his bounds, to sell indulgences, he thus addressed his people "Parishioners, I am bound to speak the truth to you, this is but to deceive you There is no pardon for our sins that can come to us either from the pope or any other, but only by the blood of Christ." It was Forret's custom to rise at six o'clock in the morning, and study till noon He daily committed three chapters of the Bible to memory, and repeated them to his servant at night He also composed a short catechism, probably intended for the use of his own people. These facts were communicated by his servant, Andrew Kirkie, in a letter to Mr John Davidson, minister of Prestonpans, and inserted by him in his Account of the Scottish Martyrs, from which, as the book itself is now lost, they have been transmitted to us in Calderwood's History

Having attracted the notice and hostility of his clerical superiors, he was successively summoned before the bishops of Dunkeld and St Andrews The former of these, George Crichton, a brother of Crichton of Naunchton, was, according to Keith, "a man nobly disposed, very hospitable, and a magnificent housekeeper, but in matters of religion not much skilled." To him Forret was accused as "an heretic, and one that showed the mysteries of the Scriptures to the vulgar people in their own language, so as to make the clergy detestable in their sight." On being called before him, the bishop, addressing him in a tone of kindness, said—"My dear Dean Thomas, I am informed that you preach the epistle or gospel every Sunday, and that you take not the cow, nor the uppermost cloth from your parishioners, which is very prejudicial to the churchmen; and, therefore, I would you took your cow, and your uppermost cloth, as other churchmen do, or else it is too much to preach every Sunday, for, in so doing, you may make the people think that we should preach likewise But it is enough for you, when you find any good epistle, or any good gospel, that setteth forth the liberty of the holy church, to preach that, and let the rest be" To this Forret replied, "Truly, my lord, I have read the New Testament and the Old, and all the epistles and gospels, and among them all I could never find an evil epistle, or an evil gospel, but if your lordship will show me the good epistle, and the good gospel, and the evil epistle, and the evil gospel, then I shall preach the good, and omit the evil." The bishop answered, "I thank God that I never knew what the Old and New Testament was, therefore, Dean Thomas, I will know nothing but my portuise and pontifical. Go your way, and let be all these fantasies, for if you persevere in these erroneous opinions, you will repent when you may not amend it" Forret said, "I trust my cause is just in the presence of God, and therefore I heed not much what may follow therenpon," after which he returned to his parish We need not be surprised at Bishop Crichton's ignorance of the Bible, nor at his open avowal of it, when it is remembered that the Romish clergy in Scotland of that period firmly believed that the Greek language was an invention of the Reformers, for the purpose of upholding their heresies, and perplexing the orthodox!

Forret was soon after summoned to appear before Archbishop James Bethune and a convocation of bishops held at Edinburgh, and, after a short examination, was sentenced to be burnt as a heretic Four other persons, named Keilor, Beveredge, Simson, and Forrester, the first two friars, the third a secular priest, and the fourth a gentleman of respectability, were condemned to suffer along with him The whole five were accordingly consumed in one fire on the Castlehill at Edinburgh, February 28, 1538.

FORSYTH, a surname, the etymology of which is uncertain. As in Kilsyth the last syllable is supposed to be derived from Sythie, which in Gaelic signifies peace. It seems probable that the brook of Sith in Stirlingshire was in remote superstitious times believed to be haunted by the Daoine Sith, or Scottish fairies, called "men of peace," for fear of their malign influence. [Nimmo's Stirlingshire, ed. 1817 App. p. 754.] If the name is Celtic in its origin, the first syllable would arise from fuar, cold, and the word might therefore mean cold river of peace. For the antiquity of the name, says Nisbet (System of Heraldry, vol. i. p. 352), there is a charter in the earl of Haddington's collections, p. 67, granted by King Robert the Bruce Osberto filio Roberti de Forsyth servienti nostro, of an hundred solidates terræ in tenemento de Salekill, in the shirrifdom of Stirling. As there was the family of Forsyth of Forsyth, the name must originally have been territorial.

FORSYTH, WILLIAM, an able arboriculturist, was born in 1737, at Old Meldrum, Aberdeenshire, where he was early initiated into the science of horticulture. In 1763 he went to London, and became a pupil of the celebrated Philip Miller, gardener to the company of apothecaries at their botanical gardens at Chelsea. In 1771 he succeeded him in that situation. In 1784 he was appointed by King George the Third chief superintendent of the royal gardens at Kensington and at St James'. Having discovered a composition to remedy the diseases and injuries incident to fruit and forest trees, he received a grant from parliament on disclosing the secret of his discovery to the public. Accordingly, in 1791 he published his 'Observation on the Diseases, Defects, and Injuries of Fruit and Forest Trees,' to which he appended the whole of the correspondence that had taken place between the commissioners of the land revenue, the committee of parliament, and himself, on the subject. A Mr A. T. Knight, of Elton, near Ludlow in Shropshire, president of the Horticultural Society, published a small quarto pamphlet, entitled 'Some doubts relative to the Efficacy of Mr Forsyth's Plaister in renovating Trees,' which does not seem to have attracted much attention. In 1802 appeared his 'Treatise on the Culture and Management of Fruit Trees,' with plates, three editions of which valuable and useful work were sold in a very short time. Mr Forsyth, who was a fellow of the Society of Antiquaries, and a member of the Linnæan and other learned bodies, died at his official residence in Kensington Gardens, July 25, 1804. In honour of his name, a particular genus of plants has been termed Forsythia.—His son, also named William, his successor at Chelsea Gardens, was the author of the following botanical work. 'A Botanical Nomenclator; containing a systematical arrangement of the classes, orders, genera and species of plants, as described in the new edition of Linnæus' System, by Dr Gmelin, with the Alphabetical Indexes of the Latin and English names, &c.' Lond. 1794, 8vo.

FORTH, Earl of, a title in the Scottish peerage (now extinct) conferred in 1642, on Patrick Ruthven, son of William Ruthven of Ballindean, who was a son of William Ruthven, third son of William first Lord Ruthven, of the Gowrie family (see GOWRIE, earl of). This Patrick Ruthven was an officer in the Swedish service, in which he attained the rank of lieutenant-general, having distinguished himself in the German wars under Gustavus Adolphus. In 1632, on the surrender of Ulm, formerly a free imperial city, on the left bank of the Danube, he was appointed governor of that important place, being then near sixty years of age, and by his vigilance he suppressed two conspiracies in their infancy. He stood high in the favour of Gustavus, not only on account of his courage in the field, but, as related in Harte's Life of that monarch, (vol. ii. p. 116.) for a very different quality, from his ability to swallow 'strong potations' without his understanding being clouded, he rendered himself useful in extracting secrets from ministers and others of the adverse party when entertaining them at table. He gallantly defended Ulm, which had been selected for the royal magazine, as well as for a place of retreat in case of accidents, and in consideration of his merit and long services Gustavus gave him a grant of the earldom of Kirchberg, with about eighteen hundred pounds a-year. [Monro's Expedition, vol. ii. p. 120.] On the breaking out of the civil wars at home, many of the veterans of Gustavus' wars returned to Scotland to take part on the one side or the other. Ruthven gave his support to the king, who in 1639 created him a peer, by the title of Lord Ruthven of Ettrick. The same year he appointed him governor of the castle of Edinburgh, which he held out for his majesty, refusing to deliver it up to the parliament without the king's special order. He was, however, compelled to surrender it, 19th September 1640, obtaining honourable conditions. He had been forfeited by parliament in June of that year, but by the interest of General Leslie, his forfeiture was rescinded in November 1641. He was created earl of Forth by letters patent, dated at York, 27th March 1642, with limitation to the heirs male of his body. Having repaired to the king at Shrewsbury, he was appointed field-marshal of his majesty's forces, and was at the battle of Edgehill, 23d October that year. At that battle, the earl of Lindsey, general of the king's army, being killed, the chief command devolved on the earl of Forth. According to Lord Clarendon, whose character of him appears somewhat coloured by prejudice, he was, at this time, "much decayed in his parts, and with the long-continued custom of immoderate drinking, dosed in his understanding, which had never been quick and vigorous, he having always been illiterate to the greatest degree. He was now become very deaf, yet often pretended to have heard what he did not then contradict, and thought fit afterwards to disclaim. He was a man of few words and of great compliance, and usually delivered that as his opinion which he foresaw would be grateful to the king. He could better judge by his eye than his ear, and in the field well knew what was to be done." [Clarendon's History, vol. ii. page 481.] He was at this time nearly seventy years of age. In the Ashmole Collection is a spirited letter from the earl, written before he was raised to the peerage, to the earl of Northumberland, who had traduced the reputation of a young gentlewoman whom Ruthven esteemed, and libelled the whole Scottish nation in some poetical invective. It concludes with this remark, "Remember, that though nobility maketh difference of persons, yet injury acknowledgeth none." (See Harte's Life of Gustavus, where a portion of it is quoted, vol. ii. p. 116 note.) It is certain that under the command of the earl of Forth the military efficiency of the royal army was never more conspicuous. He defeated the parliamentary forces at Brentford, 15th November 1642, and in honour of that victory was created earl of Brentford, 27th May 1644. On the 26th July of the latter year, the Scots parliament passed a decreet of forfeiture against him. At the second battle of Newbury, 27th November following, his lordship was wounded in the head and carried to Donnington castle. Col Hurry was sent by the parliament to persuade him to surrender the castle, which the earl indignantly refused to do. Notwithstanding his age, he continued active in the king's service till the end of the war in England, and was one of those excepted from pardon by the articles of Westminster 11th July, 1646, which the king refused to ratify. The Scots parliament, on 20th March 1647, passed an act restoring him against his forfeiture; and it was again rescinded after his death by the parliament of 1661. His lordship died at an advanced age, at Dundee, in January 1651. He had married a lady of the name of Barnard, and had three daughters, but having no male issue, his titles became extinct at his death.

FOTHRINGHAM, the surname of an old family in Forfarshire. The first of the name is supposed to have come from Hungary with the Anglo-Saxon princess Margaret queen of Malcolm Canmore. In the Ragman Roll occurs the name of Henry de Foderinghay, who, Nisbet conjectures, belonged to the family afterwards styled of Powrie. In the reign of Robert III., John Foderinghame acquired the lands of Wester Powrie in the shire of Forfar which belonged to Malcolm de Powrie, to be held of John Ogilvie of Ogilvie, baron of Easter Powrie. In Mackenzie's MS. Genealogies, it is stated that the Fotheringhames got the lands of Wester Powrie by marriage with a daughter of the family of Ogilvie of Auchterhouse about 1399. The Fotheringhames of Lawhill and Bandon were sprung from younger sons of the same family.

Lord Lindsay, in his 'Lives of the Lindsays" (vol. i. p. 145) says that the principal friend of the youth of David fifth earl of Crawford, seems to have been Thomas Fotheringham of Powrie, afterwards his "familiar squire," and whom he ever regarded with peculiar affection and kindness. On renewing his charters between twenty and thirty years after his succession, he grants him additional lands "for his faithful service and constant attentions." "I cannot," says his lordship, "but attribute much of what was noble, loyal, and self-devoted in Earl David's after career to the influence of this gallant gentleman, who stood by his side, immoveable as a rock, in the darkest moment of his fortunes." The Fotheringhams, he adds, "were closely allied in blood and friendship with the House of Crawford, and the hereditary regard has manifested itself most kindly in our behoof to the present generation." To the protest, dated Oct. 29, 1488, against the final resignation of the hereditary sheriffdom of Angus, the faithful Fotheringham was a witness.

FOULIS, a surname derived from the Norman word Feuilles, leaves, those bearing it carrying three bay leaves in their arms. The first of the name in Britain came into England either at or before the Conquest, and accompanying Edgar Atheling into Scotland, received a grant of lands from Malcolm Canmore. His earliest descendants appear to have been numerous, and to have held lands in various parts of Scotland, for there are several baronies and seats in the counties of Perth, Angus, Ross, &c., which bear the name of Foulis, and anciently belonged to persons of this name.

Reginaldus de Foulis is witness in the first charter to the lord high steward of Scotland in the reign of Alexander II.

The immediate ancestor of the Foulises of Colinton was William de Foulis, who lived in the reigns of Kings Robert II. and III., and had two sons. William, the 2d son, archdean of St. Andrews, was secretary to King James I. of Scotland in 1424, and in 1427 was appointed keeper of the privy seal. Frequently employed in state negotiations with the court of England, he acquired a considerable fortune, which he left to his nephew, William, the son of his elder brother. This brother, James de Foulis, succeeded his father, and lived in the reigns of James I. and II.

His son William, above mentioned, married Elizabeth, daughter of Sir Walter Ogilvie, and had two sons. William, who died without issue, and James de Foulis, who engaged in trade in Edinburgh, and married Margaret, daughter of Sir Thomas Henderson of Fordell. His son James, in 1519 purchased from the master of Glencairn, the estate of Colinton, Mid-Lothian and it afterwards became the chief designation of the family. He was bred to the bar, and on 21st June 1526 he appeared in parliament as counsel for the burgomasters of Middleburg in the Netherlands, in an attempt then made by them to get the staple of Scotland fixed at that place. On 12th November of the same year he was chosen one of the lords pro sessione. In 1527 (or the previous year, according to Nisbet's System of Heraldry, App. p. 17), a commission was issued appointing him conjunct lord advocate with Sir Adam Otterburn of Auldhame. In 1529 he was appointed private secretary to King James V., and in 1531 clerk register, which latter office he held till 8th February 1548. On the 27th of the following May he was admitted a lord of session, when he assumed the title of Lord Colinton. He was concerned in all the public transactions of his time, and was knighted in or previously to 1539, in which year he was clerk to the king's council, as well as clerk register. After the death of King James V. he was one of the commissioners employed by the estates to negotiate a marriage between the young Queen Mary and Prince Edward of England, 25th August, 1543, which marriage never took effect. He died before 4th February 1549. He had five sons. To Robert, the youngest, a pardon was granted in 1583 for being art and part guilty of seizing, detaining, and holding out the castle of Stirling against the king and his two regents.

Henry Foulis, his eldest son, adhered to the cause of Queen Mary, from whom he obtained a letter to be one of the senators of the college of justice on the first vacancy, an appointment which, owing to the troubles of her reign, never took place. He died beginning of reign of James VI.

His son and successor, James, seems, unlike his father, to have been opposed to the interests of Queen Mary, if credit is to be given to a statement in the 'Historie and Life of King James the Sext,' that in 1571 the garrison of Niddry castle, which belonged to Lord Seton, one of the queen's most loyal subjects, on returning from conveying some provisions to Edinburgh, were attacked by the lairds of Collingtoun and Currie-hill, who, taking the carriers prisoners, brought them to

Corstorphine. James, the eldest son, succeeded his father, George, the second son, married Janet Bannatyne, only child of the compiler of the national poetry of the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries, and was progenitor of the Foulises of Ravelston, Mid Lothian, a family which was raised to the baronetage in 1661, in the person of George's grandson, Sir John Foulis. He was also the progenitor of the Foulises of Ratho, Woodhall, &c., and of the Primroses earls of Rosebery by a female, as afterwards shown David, the third son, was in great favour with King James the Sixth, whom in 1603 he attended into England, and on 6th February 1619 he was created a baronet of that kingdom, and obtained a grant of the lands of Ingleby in Yorkshire In 1610 he was collarer or treasurer to Henry, prince of Wales, and after his death, to his brother Charles. He seems to have early opposed the arbitrary measures of the latter after he became king, for in 1632, for resisting the commission issued to compel gentlemen to compound for neglecting to receive the honour of knighthood, he was brought before the star-chamber, when he was deprived of his official employments, committed to the Fleet prison, and fined eight thousand pounds. His son and heir was also sent to the same prison, and fined five hundred pounds. The baronetcy still continues in the family of his descendants. John, the fifth son, purchased the lands of Leadhills, in Lanarkshire, and his grand-daughter, Anne, heiress thereof, married Sir James Hope of Hopetoun, and from them are descended the earls of Hopetoun

The eldest son, Sir James Foulis of Colinton, was knighted by King James the Sixth, while still a young man His son, Sir Alexander Foulis, was by King Charles the First created a baronet of Nova Scotia, 7th June 1634, to him and his heirs male whatever He was a zealous royalist, on which account he suffered many hardships. He married Elizabeth, daughter of Robert Hepburn of Fuird, relict of the great sheriff of Bute (by whom she had a son, ancestor of the marquis of Bute), and great-grand-daughter of the third earl of Bothwell

His son, Sir James, second baronet, was also a steady royalist, and was knighted by Charles the First, on 14th November 1641 during the lifetime of his father He was elected one of the commissioners for Mid Lothian in the parliament of 1645, and continued to represent that county for upwards of forty years. In 1646, and subsequent years, he was appointed a member of the committee of estates. In 1650, when Cromwell's army lay for a short time at Colinton, previous to the battle of Dunbar, his estates were ravaged and his house plundered, and for the loss he sustained on this occasion he afterwards received compensation from parliament. With the committee of estates he was surprised at Elliot in Angus, on the morning of the 28th August 1651, by a party of five hundred horse, sent by Monk, then besieging Dundee, under the command of Colonels Alured and Morton After being stripped of everything, they were carried to Broughty, and thence Sir James was conveyed by sea to London, where he suffered a long imprisonment. In February 1661, King Charles the Second appointed him one of the senators of the college of justice, when he assumed the title of Lord Colinton In parliament he was chosen a lord of the articles, and in February 1671 he was nominated one of the lords commissioners of justiciary In 1674 he was sworn a privy councillor He also obtained a pension of two hundred pounds yearly from the Crown On the trial of the earl of Argyle in 1681, he voted against the relevancy of his indictment. On the 22d February 1684 he was admitted lord justice clerk, and he died at Edinburgh 19th January 1688

His son, Sir James Foulis, third baronet, was admitted advocate 8th June 1669, and on 10th November 1674, in his father's lifetime, he was raised to the bench, when he took the title of Lord Redford He was elected commissioner for the county of Edinburgh in his father's place, 20th January 1685, and the same year he was appointed a commissioner for the plantation of kirks. He supported the arbitrary measures of the government, and continued on the bench till the Revolution After the accession of Queen Anne he was appointed colonel of the Mid Lothian militia, and sworn one of her majesty's privy council. In the last Scots parliament he joined the dukes of Hamilton and Athol, and many others of the nobility and gentry in their famous protest made by Lord Errol, the earl Marischal, respecting the most constitutional military defence of the house of legislature. He also joined in that protest which declared that an incorporating union of the two nations was contrary to the honour of Scotland. After the union he was a member of the first British parliament. On his death in 1711, he was succeeded by his eldest son, Sir James, fourth baronet, who died, unmarried, in July 1712, but the line of descent was carried on by his third son, Henry, who married Jean, daughter of Mr Adam Foulis, merchant in Edinburgh, and niece of Sir John Foulis, baronet of Ravelston, and had two sons and a daughter He died before his brother the fourth baronet.

His elder son, Sir James Foulis, succeeded his uncle as fifth baronet, and in his youth was an officer in the army He afterwards dedicated much of his time to literary research, and in 1781 contributed to the Transactions of the Antiquarian Society of Scotland a paper on the origin of the Scots, in which his proofs and conjectures are founded upon his intimate acquaintance with the ancient Celtic language. It is understood that he left among his papers some ingenious investigations into the origin of the ancient names of places in Scotland. He died on 3d January 1791

His son, Sir James, sixth baronet, was twice married first to a Spanish lady, and secondly, to Miss Margaret Dallas, but had no issue On his death the title devolved upon his kinsman James Foulis, a teacher of drawing in the city of Edinburgh, who became seventh baronet He was the great-grandson of William Foulis of Woodhall, second son of Sir John Foulis, first baronet of Ravelston (and cousin of the first baronet of Colinton) by his wife, Margaret, daughter of Sir Archibald Primrose of Carrington The eldest son of the first baronet of Ravelston, George Primrose Foulis, Esq., married Margaret, dowager of Sir Archibald Primrose, and mother of the first earl of Rosebery, and had a son, Sir Archibald, who, on inheriting the estate of Dunipace in Stirlingshire in right of his mother, assumed the name of Primrose only He became the second baronet of Ravelston, which estate he sold in 1726 to Alexander Keith, writer in Edinburgh, descended from Alexander Keith of Pittendrum, fourth son of William third earl Marischal. Sir Archibald married his cousin, Lady Mary Primrose, a daughter of the first earl of Rosebery, and had an only son, Archibald, who died young unmarried Engaging in the rebellion of 1745, he was beheaded at Carlisle for high treason when his baronetcy was forfeited.

Sir James Foulis, 7th baronet, born Sept. 9, 1770 before succeeding to the title, taught drawing professionally in Edinburgh, and was both a painter and a sculptor In the council-room of Gillespie's Hospital, Edinburgh, is a striking portrait of the founder by Sir James. He m. in 1810, Agnes, eldest daughter of the late John Grier, Esq., of Edinburgh, and had 2 sons William, and John, M D, New South Wales, and 2 daughters, Mrs. Low of Carnsey Lodge, Fife, and Mrs. Logan White of Killerstain, Mid Lothian. Sir James died in April 1842.

His elder son, Sir William Liston Foulis, born in 1812, became eighth baronet, and the representative of the three houses of Collinton, Woodhall, and Ravelston. He married, first, in 1843, Henrietta Ramage Liston of Millburn Tower, Mid Lothian, elder surviving daughter of Captain Ramage Liston, R.N., and grand-niece and heiress of Right Hon Sir Robert Liston, G.C.B., ambassador to Turkey, and in consequence assumed the additional name of Liston before his own. By this lady, who died in 1850, he had two sons and one daughter. He married, secondly, in 1852, Mary Anne, eldest daughter of Robert Cadell, Esq., and died in 1858, when his elder son, Sir James, born in 1847, became 9th baronet.

FOULIS, ROBERT, a printer of great ingenuity and perseverance, and the first who endeavoured to establish a school of the fine arts in Britain, was a native of Glasgow, where he was born April 20, 1707. At an early age he was bound apprentice to a barber, and this humble employment it appears he afterwards followed for some time on his own account. His abilities and desire for instruction brought him under the notice of the celebrated Dr Francis Hutcheson, then professor of moral philosophy in Glasgow university, who advised him to become a bookseller and printer. He attended Dr Hutcheson's lectures for several years, and this seems to have been all the university education he ever received. During the winter he and his brother Andrew (the subject of the following notice) employed themselves in teaching the languages, and in summer they made short excursions to England and the Continent. About the end of 1739 Robert Foulis began business in Glasgow as a bookseller, and the first publications which issued from his press were principally of a religious nature. In 1742 he published an elegant edition of 'Demetrius Phalereus de Elocutione,' which is supposed to be the first Greek work printed in Glasgow. In March 1743 he was appointed printer to the university. In 1744 he brought out his celebrated immaculate edition of Horace, 12mo, the sheets of which as they were printed were hung up in the college of Glasgow, and a reward was offered to those who should discover an inaccuracy. He soon after took his brother into partnership with him, and for thirty years they continued to produce a series of correct and well-printed books, particularly in the Latin and Greek classics, which for beauty and fidelity were not equalled by any publication of the time. Among these may be mentioned Cicero's Works, in 20 vols.; Cæsar's Commentaries, folio; Homer's Works, 4 vols.; Herodotus, 9 vols., &c.; also an edition of the Greek Testament, small 4to; Gray's Poems; Pope's Works, a folio edition of Milton, and other publications in English.

Encouraged by their success as printers, and desirous to promote the cultivation of the fine arts in Scotland, Robert Foulis was induced to engage in an attempt to establish an academy in Glasgow for the instruction of youth in painting and sculpture. In 1751 he visited the Continent, chiefly with the intention of obtaining teachers, and providing paintings, &c. for his proposed institution, and after sending home several artists, he returned to Scotland in 1753. In the course of the same year he commenced his academy under the most unpromising circumstances. The great expense attending it, in engaging teachers, sending pupils to Italy to study and copy the works of the ancient masters, and other necessary disbursements, gradually led to the decline of their printing business, which, however, continued to be carried on till the death of Andrew in 1775. In 1776 Robert Foulis exhibited the works belonging to the academy at London, and sold the remainder of his paintings, when, after all expenses were defrayed, the balance in his favour amounted only to fifteen shillings. From an analysis of the catalogue by Robert Foulis, issued at London on the occasion, the principal collection in the academy appears to have consisted of 459 pictures, stated to have been "composed and painted chiefly by the most admired masters of the Roman, Florentine, Parman, Bolognese, Venetian, Flemish, and French schools." As a specimen of some of these "masters," there may be enumerated 39 pictures by Raphael, 6 by Julio Romano, 6 by Leonardo da Vinci, 9 by M. Angelo Buonarotti, 16 by Correggio, 15 by Annibale Caracci, 31 by Guido, 7 by Andrea del Sarto, 10 by Carlo Maratti, 2 by Spagnoletti, 8 by Salvator Rosa, 22 by Titian, 8 by Paul Veronese, 9 by Bassano, 36 by Reubens, 30 by Vandyck, 8 by Rembrandt, 10 by N. Poussin, 6 by Mignard, 5 by Coypel, besides of the Italian, Flemish, and French schools, consisting of landscapes, flower pieces, still life, and portraits, in all, numbering 94 pictures. Besides a collection of drawings, "done by distinguished masters of all the schools, and a series of prints, beginning near the commencement of engraving, and continued to the present times," there were also 45 "engraved in the academy of Glasgow," some of them different views of that city There had also been in the Messrs Foulis' academy a great variety of casts from ancient sculptures, such as the Venus de Medici, the Apollo Belvidere, busts of Niobe and most of her children, the Laocoon, the principal parts of the Trajan column, &c These being left in the college of Glasgow, were destroyed in the following manner, as stated by a correspondent of the Glasgow Herald in October 1852 "At the time of clearing out the things that were in the ground flat of part of the college, preparatory to re-building, these figures had to be removed, and the joiner's men had begun to do so, but the casts being very dirty, and some of them heavy, a big Highland fellow, one of the joiners, said, 'We'll mak them lighter to carry,' and, with a blow of his adze, he smashed the Fighting Gladiator to pieces The other young fellows thought this excellent sport, and it was now who could smash the most! My informant, the late Mr James Watt, architect, told me of one of the men employed at the job, regretting to him that he was not in time to save these beautiful works of art' Mr Foulis died the same year (1776) at Edinburgh, on the morning on which he had intended setting out for Glasgow on his return home from London He was twice married first, to a sister of the celebrated Greek scholar, Dr James Moor by whom he had five daughters, and secondly, to a daughter of Mr Boutcher, a seedsman in Edinburgh, and his descendant by this marriage, Mr Andrew Foulis, died in great poverty at Edinburgh in 1829

FOULIS ANDREW, an eminent printer, younger brother of the preceding, was born in Glasgow November 23, 1712 He seems to have been designed for the church, and, in 1727, entered as a student at the university of Glasgow, where it is supposed he went through a regular course of education He afterwards joined his brother Robert in business, and with him brought out some of the finest specimens of correct and elegant printing which the eighteenth century produced His name is usually classed with that of his brother, the subject of the preceding article Andrew died suddenly, September 18, 1775

A list of the works printed by the Foulis brothers is given in Watt's Bibliotheca Britannica.

FRASER, sometimes written Fraser, a surname derived from the French word fraises or fraises, strawberries, sever strawberry flowers forming part of the armorial bearings of families of this name. The first of this surname in Scotland was of Norman origin, and came over with William the Conqueror The Chronicles of the Fraser family pretend that their ancestor was one Pierre Fraser, seigneur de Troile, who in the reign of Charlemagne, came to Scotland with the ambassadors from France to form a league with King Achaius, and that his son in the year 814, became thane of the Isle of Man, but all this is mere fable Their account of the creation of their arms is equally an invention According to their statement, in the reign of Charles the Simple of France Julius de Berry, a nobleman of Bourbon, entertaining that monarch with a dish of fine strawberries, was, for the same knighted the strawberry flowers, fraises, given him for his arms, and his name changed from de Berry to Fraseur or Frizelli They claim affinity with the family of the duke de la Frezaliere, in France The first of the name in Scotland is understood to have settled there in the reign of Malcolm Canmore, when surnames first began to be used, and although the Frasers afterwards became a powerful and numerous clan in Inverness-shire, their earliest settlements were in East Lothian and Tweeddale

In the reign of David the First, Sir Simon Fraser possessed half of the territory of Keith in East Lothian (from him called Keith Simon), and to the monks of Kelso he granted the church of Keith He had a daughter, Eda, married to Hugh Lorens, and their daughter also named Ida, became the wife of Hervey, the king's marechal, proprietor of the other half of the territory of Keith, called after him Keith Hervey He was the ancestor of the north country Keiths, earls Marischal A member of the same family, Gilbert de Fraser, obtained the lands of North Hailes, also in East Lothian, as a vassal of the earl of March and Dunbar, and is said to be a witness to a charter of Cospatrick to the monks of Coldstream, during the reign of Alexander the First He also possessed large estates in Tweeddale His eldest son, Oliver de Fraser, who flourished between 1175 and 1199, built Oliver castle, in the shire of Peebles, celebrated in history as the stronghold of the heroic companion of Wallace Sir Simon Fraser, of whom a memoir is given afterwards in larger type Dying without issue, Oliver was succeeded by his nephew, Adam de Fraser He was the son of Udard Fraser, Gilbert's second son who had settled in Peebles-shire His son, Laurence Fraser, is witness to a charter of the ward of East Nisbet, by Patrick earl of Dunbar to the monks of Coldingham, in 1261 Laurentius Fraser dominus de Drumelzier, possessed the lands of Muckerston in Roxburghshire. His son, also named Laurence lived during the wars of succession, and with his eldest daughter the estate of Drumelzier went by marriage into the family of Tweedie The second daughter, marrying Dougal Macdougall, carried to him the estate of Mackerston, in the reign of David the Second, and it now belongs to a descendant of his on the female side

In the reign of Alexander the Second the chief of the family was Bernard de Fraser, supposed to have been the grandson of the above-named Gilbert, by a third son, whose name is conjectured to have been Simon [Anderson's Hist. Acc of the Frasers, p. 8.] Bernard was a frequent witness to the charters of Alexander the Second, and in 1234 was made sheriff of Stirling, an honour long hereditary in his family By his talents he raised himself from being the vassal of a subject to be a tenant in chief to the king He acquired the ancient territory of Oliver castle, which he transmitted to his posterity He was one of the magnates of Scotland who swore to the performance of the treaty of peace agreed upon between Alexander the Second and Henry the Third of England at York in 1237, and is said to have married Mary Ogilvie, daughter of Gilchrist, thane of Angus, whose mother, Marjory, was the sister of kings Malcolm the Fourth and William the Lion, and the daughter of Prince Henry He was succeeded by his son Sir Gilbert Fraser who was sheriff or vicecomes of Traquair during the reigns of Alexander the Second and his successor He had three sons Simon, his heir, Andrew, sheriff of Stirling in 1291 and 1293 and William, chancellor of Scotland from 1274 to 1280, and bishop of St Andrews from 1279 to his death in 1297 He was first dean of Glasgow, and was consecrated bishop at Rome by Pope Nicholas the Third in 1280 In 1283, according to Wintoun, (Chronicles, p. 528,) he obtained for the bishops of St. Andrews, from Alexander the Third, the privilege of coining money After the death of that monarch, he was one of the lords of the regency chosen by the states of Scotland, during the minority of the infant queen Margaret, styled "the maiden of Norway," and as such was appointed to treat with the Norwegian plenipotentiaries on her affairs. On the death of that princess in 1291, he rendered a compelled homage to Edward the First of England, by whom he was created one of the guardians of Scotland He was one of the early asserters of the independence of his country, and within a month after the accession of John Baliol to the throne, bishop Fraser joined with several others in a complaint against the English monarch for withdrawing causes out of Scotland con trary to his engagement and promises, and in prejudice of Baliol's sovereign rights and authority It was at the command of this patriotic bishop that Sir William Wallace, when guardian of the kingdom, put all the English who held them, out of their church benefices in Scotland In 1295 he was one of the commissioners who concluded the fatal treaty with King Philip of France, by which the latter agreed to give Baliol his niece, the eldest daughter of Charles count of Anjou, in marriage to his son and heir, a treaty, styled by Lord Hailes, "the groundwork of many more equally honourable and ruinous to Scotland." [Annals, vol i p 284.] Bishop Fraser died at Arteville in France, 13th September 1297 His body was buried in the church of the friars predicants in Paris, but his heart, enclosed in a rich box, was brought to Scotland by his successor, Bishop Lamberton, and entombed in the wall of the cathedral of St. Andrews. The above representation of his seal is from Anderson's Diplomata Scotiæ, plate 100, the smallest one there

Sir Simon Fraser, the eldest son, was a man of great influence and power He possessed the lands of Oliver castle, Niedpath castle, and other lands in Tweeddale, and accompanied King Alexander the Second in a pilgrimage to Iona, a short time previous to the death of that monarch He was knighted by Alexander the Third, who in the beginning of his reign, conferred on him the office of high sheriff of Tweeddale, which he held from 1263 to 1266 He was one of the magnates Scotiæ who, in 1285, engaged to support Margaret of Norway as the successor of Alexander the Third. He sat in the famous parliament of Brigham in 1290, when the marriage of Margaret with Prince Edward of England was proposed He supported the title of Baliol to the throne till basely surrendered by himself, and in conjunction with his brothers, William and Sir Andrew and his cousin Sir Richard Fraser, was appointed an arbiter by Baliol for determining the right of the several competitors to the crown, 5th June 1291 He swore fealty to Edward the First at Norham on the 12th of the same month, and again on 28d July at the monastery of Tindoris He died the same year He had an only son, Sir Simon Fraser, the renowned patriot, of whom a memoir is given in larger type, on page 264 of this volume. With him may be said (in 1306) to have expired the direct male line of the south country Frasers, after having been the most considerable family in Peebles shire during the Scoto Saxon period of our history, from 1097 to 1306. The ruins of Oliver castle and the castles of Fruid, Drummelzier, and Niedpath, (views of the last two may be seen in Grose's Antiquities) attest their ancient greatness. Sir Simon had two daughters, who divided his extensive possessions between them The elder, Mary, married Sir Gilbert Hay of Locherworth, ancestor of the noble family of Tweeddale, on whom devolved, in her right, the office of sheriff of Peebles. The younger became the wife of Sir Patrick Fleming, progenitor of the earls of Wigton Each of these families quartered the arms of Fraser with their paternal arms.

The male representation of the principal family of Fraser devolved, on the death of the great Sir Simon, on the next collateral heir, his uncle, Sir Andrew, second son of Sir Gilbert Fraser, above mentioned In June 1291 he swore a forced allegiance to King Edward the First at Dunfermline, and he was present when Baliol did homage to Edward, 26th December 1292 He possessed the lands of Touch in Stirlingshire, which it is probable were conferred on him when he became sheriff of that county He had also received from King Edward the First the manor of Struthers and other lands in Fife. He and his son are frequently mentioned in the annals of the period for their valorous exploits in defence of their country against the English usurper He is supposed to have died about 1308, surviving his renowned nephew, Sir Simon, only two years. He was, says the historian of the family, "the first of the name of Fraser who established an interest for himself and his descendants in the northern parts of Scotland, and more especially in Inverness-shire, where they have ever since figured with such renown and distinction" [Anderson's Hist Acc. p 10.] He married a wealthy heiress in the county of Caithness, then and for many centuries thereafter comprehended within the sheriffdom of Inverness, and in right of his wife he acquired a very large estate in the north of Scotland He had four sons, namely, Simon, the immediate male ancestor of the lords Lovat (see LOVAT, Lord), and whose descendants and dependents (the clan Fraser), after the manner of the Celts, took the name of Mac-Shim, or sons of Simon, Sir Alexander, who obtained the estate of Touch, as the appanage of a younger son of whom afterwards, and Andrew, and James, slain with their brother, Simon, at the disastrous battle of Halidonhill, 22d July 1338

The second son, Sir Alexander, swore fealty to Edward the First at Berwick, 28th August, 1296 Among sixteen persons of the name of Fraser, Frizel, or Fresle, whose names occur in the Ragman Roll as having sworn fealty to King Edward, was Sir Richard Fresel, styled del Conte de Dumfries, who was probably a cousin of the great Sir Simon Fraser Sir Alexander joined King Robert at his coronation in March 1306, and was taken prisoner by the English at the battle of Methven, 19th June following He soon, however recovered his liberty and was with Bruce in most of his battles, and particularly at Bannockburn From that monarch he received charters of various lands in the shires of Kincardine, Stirling, and Aberdeen, and was sheriff of Kincardine His signature appears at the famous letter sent to the Pope in 1320, asserting the independence of Scotland Alexander Fresel was one of the guarantees of a truce with the English 1st June 1323 He married, about 1316, Lady Mary Bruce, a sister of King Robert, and widow of Sir Niel Campbell of Lochow, and held the appointment of great chamberlain of Scotland from 1325 to the death of his royal brother-in-law in 1329 He fell at the battle of Duplin, 12th August 1332 His line terminated, before 1355, in a female descendant Margaret, who inherited all his estates, and carried them into other families. She married Sir William Keith, great marischal of Scotland, and their son, John Keith left by his wife, a daughter of King Robert the Second, one son, Robert, whose daughter and heiress, Jean, married Alexander, first earl of Huntly, on which account (as the dukes of Gordon, before that title was extinct, did) the marquises of Huntly, quarter the Fraser arms with their own

The ancient family of the Frasers of Philorth, in Aberdeenshire, who have enjoyed since 1669 the title of Lord Saltoun, is immediately descended from William, son of an Alexander Fraser, who flourished during the early part of the fourteenth century, and inherited from his father the estates of Cowie and Durris in Kincardineshire This William is stated erroneously in Douglas' Peerage (Wood's edition, vol ii p 473,) to have been a son of Sir Alexander, the chamberlain, above mentioned On the 7th July 1296 among other barons of that part of the country, he swore fealty to Edward the First, at Fernel, now Farnel, in Forfarshire, being described as "the son of the late Alexander Fraser" His father, therefore, must have been dead long before Sir Alexander, the chamberlain, commenced his career [Anderson's Hist. Acc of the Frasers, p. 38, note] From the loss of documents, the precise relationship between him and the original Frasers of Tweeddale cannot now be ascertained William Fraser was one of the party who, under the knight of Liddesdale, took by stratagem the castle of Edinburgh, 17th April 1341 He was killed at the battle of Durham, 17th October 1346

His son, Sir Alexander Fraser of Cowie, had a safe-conduct, 18th October 1366, to go to England, with eight in his company, to study at the university of Oxford From David the Second he had a grant of the office of sheriff of Aberdeen. He signalized himself at the battle of Otterbourne in 1388, and died not long after 1408. His wife was Lady Janet Ross, second daughter and coheiress of William, earl of Ross, and from her sister, Euphemia, countess of Ross, and her husband, Sir Walter de Lesley, he had charters of various lands in the earldom of Ross, the whole being called the barony of Philorth, which thenceforth became the chief designation of the family By Lady Janet he had a son, Sir William, who succeeded him By a second wife, Elizabeth, daughter of Sir David de Hamilton of Cadzow, he had another son, Alexander, ancestor of Sir Peter Fraser of Durris, whose daughter and heiress, Carey was the first wife of Charles Mordaunt the celebrated earl of Peterborough and Monmouth

Sir William Fraser of Philorth, the elder son, succeeded his father before 1413, when he sold the barony of Cowie to William Hay of Errol, constable of Scotland He died before 1441 By his wife, Lady Mary or Eleanor Douglas, second daughter of the third earl of Douglas, he had a son, Sir Alexander, and a daughter, Agnes, married, in 1428, to Sir William Forbes of Kinnaldie, who obtained with her the barony of Pitsligo

His son, Sir Alexander Fraser of Philorth, was knighted by King James the Second, and accompanied his kinsman, the eighth earl of Douglas, to the jubilee at Rome in 1450. He died 7th April 1482 He had two sons, Alexander, and James. The latter obtaining from his father the lands of Memsey, was ancestor of the Frasers of Memsey, an estate which, after being in their possession for upwards of three centuries, was sold by the late Col Fraser to Lord Saltoun

Alexander, the elder son, was succeeded by his son, Sir William Fraser of Philorth, who died at Paris 5th September 1513 His son, Alexander Fraser of Philorth, (died 12th April 1569) had four sons. Alexander, the eldest, died in 1564, before his father leaving (by his wife, Lady Beatrix Keith, fifth daughter of the third earl Marischal) a son, named after him William the second son, was ancestor of the Frasers of Techmurty Thomas, the third son, had a charter of the lands of Strathechin or Strichen, in Aberdeenshire, 11th May 1558 He had two daughters, coheiresses. John, the fourth son, a bachelor of divinity, was abbot of Noyon or Compiegne in France, and in 1596, was elected rector of the university of Paris, where he died 19th April 1609 He was the author of several treatises in philosophy, and of the following two works, namely, 'An Offer to Subscribers to the Ministers of Scotland's Religion, if they can prove themselves to have the True Kirk,' Paris, 1604, 8vo, 'Epistles to the Ministers of Great Britain, against Subscription to their Confession of Faith,' Paris, 1605, 8vo

Sir Alexander Fraser of Philorth, the son of the rector's eldest brother, succeeded his grandfather in 1569, and in the following year he laid the foundation of the castle of Fraserburgh, which became the chief residence of the family He was a man of great public spirit, and to him the town of Fraserburgh owes its municipal existence as in October 1613 he got it erected into a burgh of regality, after an unavailing attempt on the part of the magistrates and council of Aberdeen to prevent it. The parish in which it is situated was originally called Philorth, but the name was changed to Fraserburgh, in honour of Sir Alexander the superior The cross, the jail—now a ruinous edifice—and the court-house, were erected by him In 1592 he obtained a charter from the Crown, containing powers to erect and endow a college and university at Fraserburgh, and in 1597, the General Assembly recommended Mr Charles Ferme (see page 207 of this volume), then minister of Fraserburgh, to be principal, but nothing further was ever done in the matter An old quadrangular tower of three stories, which formed part of a large building intended for the proposed college, still stands at the west end of the town. Sir Alexander was in great favour with King James the Sixth, to whom he advanced several large sums of money, about the time of his marriage with the princess Anne of Denmark He was knighted in 1594, at the baptism of Prince Henry, and died at Fraserburgh, 12th April 1623 A portrait of him by Jameson is at Philorth house, near Fraserburgh, the seat of his descendant Lord Saltoun From another painting in the possession of Mr Urquhart of Craigston, an engraving was taken for Pinkerton's Scottish Gallery of Portraits, (vol ii.) of which the subjoined is a woodcut

Sir Alexander married Magdalen, only daughter of Sir Walter Ogilvy, of Dunlugas, and had four sons and three daughters. Thomas, the youngest son, was an antiquary and wrote a history of the family

The eldest son, also Sir Alexander, married Margaret, eldest daughter of George, seventh Lord Abernethy of Saltoun, and, with two daughters, had a son, Sir Alexander Fraser of Philorth, who, on the death of his cousin, Alexander, ninth Lord Abernethy of Saltoun, in 1669, succeeded to that peerage as heir of line, and became tenth Lord Saltoun See SALTOUN, Lord

FRASER, Baron, a title (now dormant) in the peerage of Scotland, conferred by patent, dated at Holyroodhouse, 29th June 1633, on Andrew Fraser, son of Andrew Fraser of Kilmundy, Stanywood, and Muchells, Aberdeenshire, descended from a branch of the house of Philorth, to him and his heirs male for ever, bearing the name and arms of Fraser He died 10th December 1636

His son, also named Andrew, second Lord Fraser, supported the cause of the Covenant, and when Montrose proceeded to Aberdeen on the 30th March 1639, with a commission from the Tables, (as the boards of representatives, chosen respectively by the nobility, gentry, burghs, and clergy, were called,) he was joined among others by Lord Fraser On the departure of Montrose's army to the south, the Covenanters of the north appointed a committee meeting to be held at Turriff on Wednesday, 24th April, consisting of the earls Marischal and Seaforth, Lord Fraser, the master of Forbes, and some of their kindred and friends. The meeting was afterwards adjourned till the 20th May, which led to the historical incident styled the 'Trot of Turray," the old name of Turriff, which is distinguished as the place where blood was first shed in the civil wars On the 11th of June following, the royalist army under the Viscount Aboyne proceeded to the house of Muchells, belonging to Lord Fraser, but hearing of a rising in the south, Aboyne abandoned his intention of besieging it, and returned to Aberdeen Lord Fraser was one of the parliamentary commissioners appointed 19th July 1644, for suppressing the insurrection in the north, and for proceeding against rebels and malignants In the following year he was also one of the committee of Estates, and in 1649 he was a member of the committee for putting the kingdom in a posture of defence He died 24th May 1674 By his wife, a daughter of Haldane of Glencagles, he had a son, Andrew, third Lord Fraser, who married Catharine third daughter of Hugh eighth Lord Lovat, relict of Sir John Sinclair of Dunbeath and of Robert first viscount of Arbuthnot He died about the end of 1682

His son, Charles, fourth Lord Fraser was tried before the high court of justiciary at Edinburgh 29th March 1693, on a charge of high treason, for proclaiming King James at the cross at Fraserburgh in June or July 1692 drinking his health and that of his son the pretended prince of Wales forcing others to do the same and cursing King William and his adherents, amid the firing of guns and pistols, and the brandishing of swords. He was found guilty only of drinking the healths of King James and his son On the 16th May the court fined him for the offence two hundred pounds On his trial the lord advocate Sir James Stewart protested for an assize of wilful error if the jury should acquit the prisoner, which, if acceded to, would have subjected them to an indictment for giving an impartial and unbiassed verdict in his favour but Lord Fraser on his part, protested in the contrary because the committee of Estates, which had declared King James to have 'forfaulted' the crown and bestowed the same on William and Mary solemnly enacted and declared 'that assizes of error are a grievance' [Arnot's Criminal Trials, pp 77 and 78] Four of the jury, evidently apprehensive of being brought to an assize for the verdict delivered in, desired it to be marked in the record that they found the proclamation proved in terms of the indictment. These four were the master of Forbes, Sir Alexander Gilmore of Craigmillar Patrick Murray of Livingstone and James Ellis of Southside Lord Bargeny was chancellor of the jury, and it deserves to be noticed as an indication of the feeling of the times that seven peers and eight gentlemen of distinction who were summoned as jurors were fined a hundred merks each for not obeying the citation The middle verdict of 'not proven,' which is only known in the criminal courts of Scotland appears to have originated in the power then possessed by the lord advocate and too frequently exercised before the Revolution of suspecting an acquitting jury to an assize of wilful error to save them from the consequences of one of not guilty, and prevent them from giving in one of guilty, contrary to the evidence and their own consciences.

Lord Fraser took the oaths and his seat in parliament, 2d July 1695, and in the parliament of 1706, he supported the union with England, but engaged in the rebellion of 1715, and after its suppression, kept himself concealed till his death, which happened 12th October 1720, owing to a fall from a precipice near Banff, by which his skull was fractured, and he died immediately He married Lady Marjory Erskine, second daughter of the seventh earl of Buchan, relict of Sir Simon Fraser of Inverallochy, but had no issue The estate of Castle Fraser was left by his lordship to her children by her first husband (see next article). No heir male general has yet become a claimant for the title of Lord Fraser

The family of Fraser of Castle Fraser, in Ross shire, are descended, on the female side, from the Hon Sir Simon Fraser of Inverallochy, second son of Simon, eighth Lord Lovat, but on the male side their name is Mackenzie. Sir Simon's grandson, Charles Fraser, Esq of Inverallochy, heir of line to his grandmother, Lady Marjory Erskine, Lady Fraser, had no sons, and his eldest daughter, Martha, married Colin Mackenzie of Kilcoy, by whom she had, with other issue, Charles, whose only son was Sir Colin Mackenzie of Kilcoy, baronet, and Alexander Mackenzie, who succeeded his mother in the estate of Inverallochy, and her youngest sister, Elizabeth, in that of Castle Fraser, when he assumed the additional surname of Fraser by royal license He early entered the army and distinguished himself at the siege of Gibraltar On the first battalion of the 78th Highlanders, or Ross-shire Buffs, being embodied in February 1793 he was appointed lieutenant-colonel of it, and in September 1794 joined an expedition under Major-general Lord Mulgrave, the object of which was to occupy Zealand On reaching Flushing the 78th, with other regiments, was ordered to reinforce the duke of York's army on the Waal It afterwards became part of the garrison of Nimeguen, to which place the enemy had laid siege. After the evacuation of that place, the 78th entered the third brigade of reserve, which was under the command of Lieutenant-colonel Mackenzie Fraser With his regiment he was engaged in all the subsequent movements of the army, and in the retreat to Bremen He afterwards served in La Vendee, and in India, which he left in 1800 When the second battalion of the regiment was raised in 1804, he was made colonel of it Early in 1807, when major general he commanded the armament which was fitted out in Sicily for the purpose of occupying Alexandria, Rosetta, and the adjoining coast of Egypt The force under his command on this occasion consisted of a detachment of artillery, the 20th light dragoons, the 31st, 35th, 78th, and two other regiments On the 16th of March he arrived with a portion of his force off the Arab's Tower to the west of Alexandria, and having disembarked his troops, the town, on being summoned, surrendered to him on the 20th of that month He was subsequently promoted to be lieutenant-general, and sat in several parliaments as member for Ross-shire, his native county He died in 1809, having married Helen, sister of Francis Lord Seaforth, and, with 2 drs, had two sons, Charles, his heir, and Frederic Alexander Mackenzie, lieut.-col in the army, and assist. quarter-master general to the forces in Canada m. 1st, 2d dr of Hume MacLeod of Harris, issue 2dly dr of Sir Charles Bagot, Governor of Canada.

June 9 1792 entered the army young, and served in the Peninsula in 1808-9, in the 52d foot, and in 1812 in the Coldstream guards, in which regiment he was a captain He was also colonel of the Ross-shire militia. He was M P for Ross-shire from 1815 to 1818 He m. June 4th dr of Sir John Hay, Bart. of Hayston, issue, 4 sons and 5 daughters.

The proper Highland clan Fraser,—in Gaelic Na Friseallaich,—whose badge is the yew, and battle-cry was "Castle Downie," (the residence of their chief, from Dun, a camp or fortified dwelling,) was that headed by the Lovat branch in Inverness-shire, as above mentioned Simon being the name of the first of them who settled in the Highlands, and a common name for their chiefs, they adopted the Gaelic designation of MacShimi, that is, the sons of Simon They are also sometimes called MacImmies. Unlike the Aberdeenshire or Salton Frasers, the Lovat branch, the only branch of the Frasers that became Celtic, founded a tribe or clan, and all the natives of the purely Gaelic districts of the Aird and Strathherrick came to be called by their name The Simpsons, sons of Simon, are also considered to be descended from them, and the Tweedies of Tweeddale are supposed, on very plausible grounds, to have been originally Frasers. Logan's conjecture that the name of Fraser is a corruption of the Gaelic Frioasal, from frith, a forest and suil, a race, the th being silent, (that is, the race of the forest,) however pleasing to the clan as proving them an indigenous Gaelic tribe, may only be mentioned here as a mere fancy of his own

The Frasers had their own share of clan feuds and battles, but the most remarkable as well as the most sanguinary conflict in which they were ever engaged was in 1544, with the MacDonalds of Clanranald, who had put their chief Dougal MacRanald to death, and excluded his children from the succession Lord Lovat being the uncle of the young Ranald, Dougal's eldest son, called Ranald Galda, or the stranger, his cause was espoused by the Frasers, four hundred of whom, the flower of the clan with Lord Lovat at their head, joined the earl of Huntly, the king's lieutenant in the north, when, with a numerous force, he marched to crush a threatened insurrection of the Clanranald After penetrating as far as Inverlochy in Lochaber, and putting Ranald Galda in possession of Moydert, Huntly retraced his steps, and on arriving at the mouth of Glenspean, Lovat left him with his own vassals, accompanied by Ranald Galda and a few followers of the latter Near the head of the loch they were attacked by a body of the Clanranald, amounting to nearly five hundred men The battle that ensued was one of the most bloody and destructive in clan annals. It began with the discharge of arrows at a distance but when these were spent both parties rushed to close combat, and attacked each other furiously with their two-handed swords and Lochaber axes. So great was the heat of the weather it being the month of July, that the combatants threw off their coats, and fought in their shirts, whence the battle received the name of Blar-nan-leine, 'The field of shirts.' All the Frasers were killed, except one gentleman, James Fraser of Fovers (who was severely wounded and left for dead), and four common men, while it is said, though this is considered incorrect, that only eight of the Macdonalds survived the battle. The bodies of Lord Lovat, his son the Master, who had joined his father soon after the commencement of the action, and Ranald Galda, were a few days after, removed by a train of mourning relatives, and interred at the priory of Beauly in the Aird. [Gregory's Highlands, p 161]

The clan Fraser formed part of the army of the earl of Seaforth when in the beginning of 1645 that nobleman advanced to oppose the great Montrose, who designed to seize Inverness, previous to the battle of Inverlochy, in which the latter defeated the Campbells under the marquis of Argyle in February of that year After the arrival of King Charles the Second in Scotland in 1650, the Frasers, to the amount of eight hundred men joined the troops raised to oppose Cromwell, their chief's son, the master of Lovat being appointed one of the colonels of foot for Inverness and Ross. In the summer of 1652 they submitted to Monk, and as Balfour says, "condescendit to pay cesse," while other Highland clans stood out, and laughed the English to scorn [Balfour's Annals, vol iv p. 349] In the rebellion of 1715 under their last famous chief, Simon Lord Lovat (beheaded at Towerhill in 1747, of whom a memoir is given on page 266 of this volume), they did good service to the government by taking possession of Inverness, which was then in the hands of the Jacobites. In 1719 also, at the affair of Glenshiel, in which the Spaniards were defeated on the west coast of Inverness-shire, the Frasers fought resolutely on the side of government, and took possession of the castle of Brahan, the seat of the earl of Seaforth On the breaking out of the rebellion of 1745, they did not at first take any part in the struggle, but after the battle of Prestonpans, on the 21st September, Lord Lovat "mustered his clan," and their first demonstration in favour of the Pretender was to make a midnight attack on the castle of Culloden, but found it garrisoned and prepared for their reception On the morning of the battle of Culloden six hundred of the Frasers, under the command of the master of Lovat, a fine young man of nineteen effected a junction with the rebel army, and behaved during the action with characteristic valour When the Highlanders were forced to retreat, the Frasers marched off with banners flying and pipes playing in the face of the enemy After the battle Charles Fraser, younger of Inverallochy, the lieutenant-colonel of the Fraser regiment, was savagely slain by order of the duke of Cumberland. When riding over the field, the duke observed this brave youth lying wounded Raising himself upon his elbow, he looked at the duke, when the latter thus addressed one of his officers, who afterwards became a more distinguished commander than himself "Wolfe, shoot me that Highland scoundrel who thus dares to look on us with so insolent a stare" Wolfe replied, that his commission was at his royal highness' disposal, but that he would never consent to become an executioner Other officers refusing to commit this act of butchery, a private soldier, at the inhuman command of the duke, shot the hapless youth before his eyes.

Lord Lovat's eldest son, Simon Fraser, master of Lovat, afterwards entered the service of government, and rose to the rank of lieut. general in the army He was at the university of St. Andrews, pursuing his studies, when the rebellion broke out, and was sent for by his father to head the clan in support of the Pretender, which he most reluctantly did It was stated by a witness on Lord Lovat's trial, that while he was preparing one of his lordship's deceptive letters to the lord president Forbes, complaining of the obstinacy of his son in rushing into the rebellion, the master of Lovat came in and on reading what he had written at the dictation of his father, said, "If this letter goes, I will go and put the saddle on the right horse." After the battle of Culloden he surrendered himself, and was confined in the castle of Edinburgh till August 1747, when he proceeded to Glasgow, there to remain during the king's pleasure. Being proved to have been forced into the rebellion, he in 1750 received a full and free pardon from government Soon after he refused an offer which was made to him of a regiment in the French service, but he requested permission to be employed in the British army, and in 1756, though not possessed of an inch of land, his father's estates being under forfeiture, in a few weeks he raised among his own kinsmen and clan, a regiment of fourteen hundred men, called the 78th or Fraser's Highlanders, of which he was appointed lieutenant-colonel, 5th January 1757

On the regiment's arrival at Halifax the following June, as the Highland garb was judged unfit for the climate of North America, it was proposed to change it for some warmer uniform but the officers and soldiers having set themselves against the plan, and being strongly supported in their opposition by Colonel Fraser, it was abandoned "Thanks to our gracious chief," said a veteran of the regiment, "we were allowed to wear the garb of our fathers, and, in the course of six winters, showed the doctors that they did not understand our constitution, for, in the coldest winters, our men were more healthy than those regiments who wore breeches and warm clothing" He distinguished himself at Louisburg, and in the attack on Quebec, where the regiment suffered much, and where he himself was wounded In the second battle on the Heights of Abraham under General Murray, Wolfe's successor, Colonel Fraser commanded the left wing of the British army, and was again wounded In 1761, during his absence in America, he was chosen M P for the county of Inverness, and was constantly rechosen till his death In the force sent to Portugal, in 1762, to defend that kingdom against the Spaniards, he was a brigadier-general His regiment having been disbanded, Fraser's Highlanders were, in 1775, after the breaking out of the American revolutionary war, again embodied, under the auspices of their former chief, the Hon General Fraser, who, in reward of his services, had, the previous year, received from George the Third a grant of the forfeited Lovat estates his own patrimony The title, however, of Lord Lovat, was not restored The new regiment, of which he was appointed colonel, consisted of two battalions of two thousand three hundred and forty Highlanders, and were numbered the 71st. When mustered at Glasgow in April 1762, for embarkation to America a body of one hundred and twenty men, who had been raised on the forfeited estate of Lochiel, with the view of securing the latter a company, finding that their own chief had not, from illness, been able to join the regiment, hesitated to embark without him, but General Fraser addressing them in Gaelic, succeeded in removing their scruples General Stewart relates that when he had finished speaking an old Highlander present, who had accompanied his son to Glasgow, walked up to him, and with that easy familiar intercourse which in those days subsisted between the Highlanders and their superiors, shook him by the hand, exclaiming, "Simon, you are a good soldier, and speak like a man, as long as you live Simon of Lovat will never die," alluding to the general's address and manner, which, as was said, resembled much that of his father, Lord Lovat He was eventually promoted to the rank of lieutenant general and died, without issue, 8th Feb 1782 Mrs. Grant of Laggan states that in him a pleasing exterior covered a large share of his father's character, and that "no heart was ever harder,—no hands more rapacious than his."

General Fraser was succeeded by his half-brother, Colonel Archibald Campbell Fraser of Lovat, appointed consul-general at Algiers in 1766, and chosen M P for Inverness shire on the general's death in 1782 By his wife, Jane, sister of William Fraser, Esq of Leadclune, F R S, created a baronet, 27th November 1806, he had five sons all of whom he survived On his death, in December 1815, the male descendants of Hugh ninth Lord Lovat, became extinct, and the male representation of the family as well as the right to its extensive entailed estates, devolved on the junior descendant of Alexander sixth lord, Thomas Alexander Fraser, of Lovat and Strichen, who claimed the title of Lord Lovat in the peerage of Scotland and in 1837 was created a peer of the United Kingdom by that of Baron Lovat of Lovat. [See LOVAT of Lovat, Lord]

His lordship's great-grandfather, Alexander Fraser of Strichen, the son of Thomas Fraser of Strichen and Emilia Stewart, second daughter of James Lord Doune, was an eminent judge of the court of session He passed advocate 23d June 1722, and was afterwards one of the commissaries of Edinburgh. Admitted a lord of session 5th June 1730, he took his seat by the title of Lord Strichen, and was appointed a lord of justiciary, 11th June 1735 Being one of the judges at the autumn circuit court at Inverness that year, he was met a few miles from the town, by his kinsman Simon Lord Lovat, attended by a great retinue, eager to honour and congratulate him on his new judicial dignity Having been appointed general of the Scottish Mint in 1764, he resigned his seat as a justiciary judge, but retained his office in the court of session till his death He is remarkable for having sat the unusually long period of forty-five years on the bench At the time of the great Douglas cause in 1768, he was the oldest Scottish judge, being of no less than twenty-four years longer standing than any of his brethren He is supposed to have been one of the judges at the famous trial of Effie Deans in 1736, on which Scott's novel of 'The Heart of Mid Lothian' is founded He married in 1731, the countess of Bute, and died at Strichen house, Aberdeenshire, 15th February 1776, at the age of 76 [Scots Mag vol xxxvii p 111]

Sir Wm Fraser, of Leadclune, F R S, and Elder Brother of the Trinity House, created a baronet in 1806, descended from Alexander, 2d son of Hugh 2d Lord Lovat, was in the service of the E I C, and commanded two of their ships, 'the Lord Mansfield,' in 1772, which was lost in coming out of the Bengal river in 1778, and 'the earl of Mansfield,' from 1777 to 1785 He had 8 sons and 11 drs, and died Feb 10, 1818.

His eldest son, Sir Wm Fraser, 2d bart. died unmarried, Dec. 23, 1827, in India, where he had an official appointment. Sir William's surviving brother, Sir James John Fraser, 3d bart., a lieut. colonel in the army, served with the 7th hussars in Spain, and was on the staff at Waterloo He married Charlotte Anne, only child of Daniel Craufurd, Esq, and niece of the gallant Major-general Robert Craufurd, killed at Ciudad Rodrigo. He died June 5, 1834 leaving three sons.

The eldest son, Sir William Augustus Fraser, 4th baronet, born in 1826, graduated B A and M A at Christ church, Oxford, and in 1847 was appointed an officer in the 1st life guards, and subsequently captain In 1852 and 1857 he was M P for Barnstaple His brother, Charles Craufurd, lieut.-colonel 11th hussars, V C 1861, was at one time aide-de-camp to the lord-lieutenant of Ireland, and highly distinguished himself in India The 3d brother, James Keith, is a captain first life guards.(1860)

FRASER, Sir Simon, a renowned warrior and patriot, the son of Sir Simon Fraser, last lord of Tweeddale and Oliver castle, Peebles-shire, who died in 1299, and Mary, eldest daughter of Sir John Bisset of Lovat, the chief of the Bissets, was born in 1257 With his father and family he adhered faithfully to the interest of John Baliol, till the latter himself betrayed his own cause In 1296, when Edward the First invaded Scotland, Sir Simon was one of those true-hearted patriots whom the English monarch carried with him to England, where he continued close prisoner for eight months. In June 1297 he and his cousin, Sir Richard Fraser, submitted to Edward, and engaged to accompany that monarch in his designed expedition to France, but requested permission to go for a short time to Scotland, pledging themselves to deliver up their wives and children for their faithful fulfilment of the engagement.

On his return to his native country, Sir Simon, not considering his forced obligation with King Edward binding in conscience, joined Sir William Wallace, guardian of the kingdom, and gave so many distinguished proofs of his valour and patriotism, that when that illustrious hero, in a full assembly of the nobles at Perth, resigned his double commission of general of the army and guardian of the kingdom, Sir Simon Fraser was chosen his successor in the post of commander of the Scots army, while Sir John Comyn of Badenoch, Wallace's greatest enemy, was appointed guardian, on account of his near relation to the crown

In summer 1302, two separate English armies were sent into Scotland, the one commanded by King Edward in person, and the other by the prince of Wales, his son (afterwards the unfortunate Edward the Second), but the Scots, prudently avoiding a regular engagement, contented themselves with intercepting the English convoys, and cutting off detached parties of the enemy In the meantime a truce was agreed upon till November 30, which was prolonged till Easter 1303 But the English general broke the truce, and passed the borders in February, at the head of thirty thousand well-appointed soldiers Meeting with no opposition on their march, for the convenience of forage, and to enable them to harass the country the more effectually, they divided into three bodies, and on the 24th of that month, advanced to Roslin near Edinburgh, where they encamped at a considerable distance from each other The Scots leaders, Sir John Comyn and Sir Simon Fraser, hastily collecting about ten thousand men together, marched from Biggar during the night, and next day defeated in succession the three divisions of the English army, or rather the three separate armies of English This happened February 25, 1302-3 This victory raised the character of the Scots for courage all over Europe. and

Sir Simon Fraser's conduct on the occasion is spoken of in high terms by our ancient historians. Fordun, in his Scotichronicon, says, that he was not only the main instrument in gaining this remarkable battle, but in keeping Sir John Comyn to his duty as guardian during the four years of his administration

Highly incensed at this threefold defeat at Roslin, Edward entered Scotland in May following, at the head of a vast heterogeneous host, consisting of English, Irish, Welsh, Gascons, and some recreant Scots Not being able to cope with such a force in the open field, most of the nation betook themselves to strong castles and mountains inaccessible to all but themselves, while the English monarch penetrated as far as Caithness Being thus in a manner in possession of the country, the guardian, Sir John Comyn, and many of the nobility, submitted to him in February 1303-4, but Sir Simon Fraser refusing to do so, was among those who were expressly excepted from the general conditions of the capitulation made at Strathorde on the 9th of that month It was also provided that he should be banished for three years not only from Scotland but from the dominions of Edward, including France, and he was ordered, besides, to pay a fine of three years' rent of his lands

Sir Simon, in the meantime, concealed himself in the north till 1306, when he joined Robert the Bruce, who in that year asserted his right to the throne It is probable that he was present at King Robert's coronation at Scone, as we find him at the fatal battle of Methven soon after, on which occasion the king owed his life to his valour and presence of mind, having been by him three times rescued and remounted, after having had three horses killed under him He escaped with the king, whom he attended into Argyleshire, and was with him at the battle of Dalry On the separation of the small party which accompanied King Robert, Sir Simon, it is thought, also left him for a short period But after the king had lurked for some time among the hills, Sir Simon, with Sir Alexander his brother, and some of his friends, rejoined him, when they attacked the castle of Inverness, and then marched through the Aird, afterwards the country of the clan Fraser, to Dingwall, taking the castle there, and thereafter through Moray, all the fortresses surrendering to Bruce on their way.

In 1307 Sir Simon was, with Sir Walter Logan of the house of Restalrig, treacherously seized by some of the adherents of the earl of Buchan, one of the chiefs of the Comyns, who sent them in irons to London When such men as the earl of Athol, Niel, Thomas, and Alexander Bruce, the king's brothers, Sir Christopher Seaton, and his brother John, Herbert Norham, Thomas Bois, Adam Wallace, brother of Sir William, and that great hero himself, were put to death, Sir Simon Fraser and Sir Walter Logan had nothing to expect from Edward's mercy Accordingly they were both beheaded, but Sir Simon's fate was more severe than was that of any of the rest He was kept in fetters while in the Tower, and on the day of execution he was dragged through the streets as a traitor, hanged on a high gibbet as a thief, and his head cut off as a murderer His body, after being exposed for twenty days to the derision of the mob, was thrown across a wooden horse, and consumed by fire, while his head was fixed on the point of a lance, and placed near that of Sir William Wallace on London Bridge Against these merciless executions, which were more dishonouring to Edward's memory than to the illustrious patriots, his victims, the lord chief justice of England remonstrated with dignity, declaring to the savage monarch, "That he had no authority to put prisoners of war to death" But Edward turned a deaf ear to all such remonstrances For Simon's issue see previously, page 259 of this volume

FRASER, Sir Alexander, physician to Charles the Second, belonged to the ancient family of Fraser of Durris He was educated in Aberdeen, and by his professional gains and fortunate marriage was enabled to re-purchase the inheritance of his forefathers We are told that "he was wont to compare the air of Durris to that of Windsor, reckoned the finest in England" He accompanied Charles the Second in his expedition to Scotland in 1650, and seems to have been particularly obnoxious to the Covenanters On the 27th September of that year he and several others, described as "profane, scandalous, malignant and disaffected persons," were ordered by the committee of Estates to remove from the court within twenty-four hours, under pain of imprisonment His name is conspicuous in the Rolls of the Scottish parliament during the reign of Charles the Second, and occurs occasionally in the pages of Pepys. Spottiswoode, in his History of the Church of Scotland, speaks highly of his learning and medical skill He died in 1681

FRASER, SIMON, twelfth Lord Lovat, one of the most remarkable of the actors in the rebellion of 1745, was the second son of Thomas Fraser, styled of Beanfort, by Sybilla, daughter of Macleod of Macleod, and was born in 1667 Beaufort was another name of Castle Dounie, the chief seat of the family, and did not belong to Simon's father at the time of his birth He had a small house in Tanich, in the parish of Urray, Rossshire, where it is supposed that the future Lord Lovat was born At the proper age he became a student at King's college, Old Aberdeen, the favourite university of the Celts, and in 1694, while prosecuting his studies, he accepted of a commission in the regiment of Lord Murray, afterwards earl of Tullibardine, procured for him by his cousin, Hugh Lord Lovat Having, in 1626, accompanied the latter to London, he found means to ingratiate himself so much with his lordship, that he was prevailed upon to make a universal bequest to him of all his estates in case he should die without male issue On the death of Lord Lovat soon after, Simon Fraser began to style himself master of Lovat, while his father, "Thomas of Beaufort," took possession of the honours and estates of the family To render his claims indisputable, however, Simon paid his addresses to the daughter of the late lord, who had assumed the title of baroness of Lovat, and having prevailed on her to consent to elope with him, would have carried his design of marrying her into execution, had not their mutual confident, Fraser of Tenechiel, after conducting the young lady forth one winter night in such precipitate haste, that she is said to have walked barefooted, failed in his trust, and restored her again to her mother The heiress was then removed out of the reach of his artifices by her uncle, the marquis of Athol, to his stronghold at Dunkeld

Determined not to be baulked in his object, the master of Lovat resolved upon marrying the lady Amelia Murray, dowager baroness of Lovat, but as she would not consent to the match, he had recourse to compulsory measures, and, entering the house of Beaufort, or Castle Dounie, where the lady resided, he had the nuptial ceremony performed by a clergyman whom he brought along with him, and immediately afterwards, it is said, forcibly consummated the marriage before witnesses He afterwards conveyed her, her brother Lord Mungo Murray and Lord Saltoun, whom he had forcibly seized at the wood of Bunchrew, on his return from a visit to her at Castle Dounie, to the island of Aigas, where he kept them for some time prisoners Having by these proceedings incurred the enmity of the marquis of Athol, who was the brother of the dowager Lady Lovat, he was, in consequence of a representation made to the privy council, intercommuned, letters of "fire and sword" were issued against him and all his clan, and on Sept 5, 1698, he and ten other persons of the name were tried, in absence, before the high court of justiciary for high treason, rape, and other crimes, when being found guilty of treason, to which the lord advocate restricted the charges in the indictment, they were condemned to be executed, and their lands declared forfeited His father having died in 1699, he assumed the title of Lord Lovat, but in consequence of the proceedings against him he was compelled to quit the kingdom After a short stay in London, he went to France, for the purpose of lodging a complaint against the marquis of Athol with the exiled king at St Germains, after which he had the address to obtain an interview with King William, who was then at Loo in the United Provinces, and having obtained, through the influence of the duke of Argyle, a remission of his sentence, and a pardon of all crimes that could be alleged against him,—which, however, was restricted, on passing the Scottish seals, to the crime of which he had been found guilty,—he ventured to return to Scotland He was immediately cited before the high court of justiciary, on 17th February 1701, for the outrage done to the dowager Lady Lovat, and, not appearing, he was outlawed On the 19th February 1702 her ladyship presented a petition against him for letters of intercommuning, for levying the rents of the Lovat estates, which a second time were granted against him and his abettors. He now deemed it advisable to return to France, which he reached in July of that year, after the accession of Queen Anne to the throne Previous to his departure from Scotland, he had visited several of the chiefs of clans and principal Jacobites in the lowlands, and engaged them to grant him a general commission engaging to take up arms in support of the Stuart cause, possessed of which he immediately joined in all the intrigues of the exiled court of St Germains, and even managed to obtain some private interviews with Louis the Fourteenth. By that monarch a valuable sword and some other tokens of reminiscence were bestowed on him as a mark of his confidence He had also some meetings with two of the French ministers of state, on a project which he had proposed to the ex-queen, Mary of Modena, acting in her son's name, a boy at that time of only fourteen years of age, for the invasion of Scotland and the raising of the Highland clans

He returned to Scotland in 1703, with a colonel's commission in the Pretender's service, and accompanied by John Murray, brother of Murray of Abercairney, who was authorised to ascertain if Lovat's representations, as to the intentions of the Jacobite chiefs, had been warranted by them Immediately after his return he had interviews with his cousin Stuart of Appin, Cameron of Lochiel, the laird of MacGregor, Lord Drummond, and others, on the subject of a rising, but meeting with little encouragement, he resolved to betray the whole plot to government, which he did in a secret audience with the duke of Queensberry, who was then at the head of Scottish affairs On his re-appearance in Scotland, letters of "fire and sword" had again been issued against him and his followers, and he prevailed on Queensberry to grant him a pass to London, that he might be out of the reach of danger With his grace he had some more secret interviews in London, and soon after he returned to France, by way of Holland, with the object of obtaining for government further secret information about the projects of the exiled court In passing through Holland he assumed the disguise of an officer in the Dutch service, but soon after his arrival in Paris, he was, by the French government, at the instance of the exiled queen, arrested, sent to the Bastille, and afterwards imprisoned for three years in the castle of Angouleme, and seven years in the city of Saumur, where he is said to have taken priest's orders, and become a renowned popular preacher.

After making many fruitless efforts to regain his liberty,—the exiled court having refused to sanction his release,—he at last resolved, on the death of Queen Anne, to endeavour to make his escape, which he effected with the aid of Major Fraser, one of his kinsmen, who had been sent over by his clan to discover where he was, and to learn his intentions, in the event of an insurrection in favour of the Stuarts Reaching Boulogne in safety, and there hiring a boat, they sailed on 14th November 1714, and after a storm, landed at Dover next afternoon On his arrival in London, he kept himself concealed for some time, but at the instigation of his enemy the marquis of Athol, a warrant was issued against him, and on the 11th of the following June, he was arrested in his lodgings in Soho Square, and, with the major, kept for some time in a sponging house, but at last obtained his liberty, on the earl of Sutherland, John Forbes of Culloden, and some other gentlemen, becoming bail for him to the extent of £5,000

He remained in London till October 1715, when the rebellion having broken out, he returned to Scotland as one of his brother John's attendants, being still under the sentence of outlawry In a vindication of his conduct addressed to Lord Islay he says, that on this occasion he was taken prisoner at Newcastle, Longtown, near Carlisle, Dumfries, and Lanark, but succeeded in reaching Stirling He proceeded thence to Edinburgh, to embark at Leith for the north, but had not been there two hours when he was apprehended by order of the lord justice clerk, and would have been sent to the castle had he not been delivered, he does not say how, by Provost John Campbell A few days after he sailed from Leith with John Forbes of Culloden, but their vessel was pursued and fired upon by several large Fife boats in possession of the rebels On arriving in his own country, he was just in time to be of considerable service to the royal cause and to his own interests. Joining two hundred of his clan who were waiting for him under arms in Stratherrick, he concerted a plan with the Grants, and Duncan Forbes of Culloden, afterwards president of the court of session, for recovering Inverness from the rebels, in which they were successful For his zeal and activity on this occasion he had his reward The young baroness of Lovat had married, in 1702, Alexander Mackenzie, younger of Prestonhall, who thereupon assumed the name of Fraser of Fraserdale, but engaging in the rebellion of 1715, he was obliged to leave the country, and being outlawed and attainted, his liferent of the estate of Lovat was bestowed, by a grant from the Crown, dated 23d August 1716, on Simon, Lord Lovat, "for his many brave and loyal services done and performed to his majesty," particularly in the late rebellion A memorial in his lordship's favour, signed by about seventy individuals, including the earl of Sutherland, the members of parliament and the sheriffs of the northern counties, having been presented to the king, George the First, his pardon had been granted on the 10th of the preceding March, and on the 23d June following he had a private audience with his majesty In 1721 he voted by list at the election of a representative peer, when his title was questioned His vote was again objected to at the general elections of 1722 and 1727 In consequence of which, he brought a declaration of his right to the title before the court of session, and their judgment, pronounced July 3, 1730, was in his favour To prevent an appeal, a compromise was entered into with Hugh Mackenzie, son of the baroness, who, on the death of his mother, had assumed the title, whereby, for a valuable consideration, he ceded to Simon Lord Lovat his claim to the honours and his right to the estate after his father's death

Although Lord Lovat had deemed it best for his own purposes to join the friends of the government in 1715, he was, nevertheless, throughout his whole career, a thorough Jacobite in principle, and in 1740 he was the first to sign the Association for the support of the Pretender, who promised to create him duke of Fraser, and lieutenant-general, and general of the Highlands On the breaking out of the rebellion in 1745, he sent his eldest son, much against the young man's inclination, with a body of his clan to join the army under Prince Charles, while he himself remained at home After the disastrous defeat at Culloden, the young Pretender took refuge, on the evening of the battle, at Gortuleg, the house of one of the gentlemen of his clan, near the Fall of Foyers, where his lordship was then living, and not at Castle Downie, as erroneously supposed by Sir Walter Scott According to Mrs Grant of Laggan's account of the meeting, Lovat expressed attachment to him, but at the same time reproached him with great asperity for declaring his intention to abandon the enterprise entirely "Remember," said he fiercely, "your great ancestor, Robert Bruce, who lost eleven battles, and won Scotland by the twelfth" Lovat himself afterwards retired from the pursuit of the king's forces to the mountains, but not finding himself safe there, he escaped in a boat to an island in Loch Morar Thither he was pursued, taken prisoner, being found concealed in a hollow tree, with his legs muffled in flannel, and carried to London His trial for high treason commenced before the House of Lords, March 7, 1747 He was found guilty on March 18, sentence of death was pronounced next day, and he was beheaded on Tower Hill, April 9, 1747, in the eightieth year of his age His behaviour while in the Tower was cheerful and collected When advised by his friends to petition the king for mercy, he absolutely refused, saying he was old and infirm, and his life was not worth asking His estates and honours were forfeited to the Crown, but the former were restored in 1774 to his eldest son, as already mentioned on page 263 of this volume

Lord Lovat's appearance, in his old age, was grotesque and singular Besides his forced marriage with the dowager Lady Lovat above described, he entered twice, during that lady's life, into the matrimonial state, first, in 1717, with Margaret, fourth daughter of Ludovick Grant of Grant, by whom he had two sons and two daughters, and, secondly, in 1733, after that lady's death, with Primrose, fifth daughter of John Campbell of Mamore, brother to the duke of Argyle By this lady he had one son The lady's objections to the marriage he is said to have overcome by the following stratagem She received a letter purporting to be from her mother, in a dangerous state of health, desiring her presence in a particular house in Edinburgh On hastening to the house indicated, she found Lovat waiting for her there, when he informed her that the house was devoted to purposes which stamped infamy on any female who was known to have entered it To save her character, she married him, but is said to have been treated by him with so much barbarity as to be obliged to leave his house, when he was forced to allow her a separate maintenance Of the eldest son, General Simon Fraser, born 19th October, 1726, an account has been already given (see page 269 of this volume) The second son, Alexander, born in 1729, after serving in the army abroad, returned to the Highlands with the title of brigadier Janet, the elder daughter, married Macpherson of Cluny Sybilla, the younger, died unmarried On the faith of his 'Memoirs written by himself in the French language,' Lord Lovat has been admitted into Walpole's list of Royal and Noble Authors The subjoined woodcut is taken from his well-known portrait by Hogarth

FRASER, Robert, F R.S., an eminent statistical writer, eldest son of the Rev George Fraser, minister, first of Redgorton, and afterwards of Monedie, Perthshire, a lineal descendant of one of the Frasers of Farraline in Stratherrick, was born in the manse of Redgorton, about 1760 At an early age he was sent, with his cousin, the celebrated antiquarian, Thomas Thomson, Esq , of the General Register House, Edinburgh, to the university of Glasgow, and placed under the care of their uncle, Professor Traill of that college Here he became remarkable for the accuracy and extent of his scholarship, and was admitted to the degree of master of arts before he was fifteen years of age He studied for the Church of Scotland, but on leaving college he went as a tutor to a family in the Isle of Man, and afterwards proceeded to London, where he attracted the notice of Mr Pitt, then prime minister, and was employed by the government in various statistical inquiries regarding the Isle of Man, and the counties of Devon and Cornwall He subsequently obtained an official appointment in the establishment of the prince of Wales (afterwards George the Fourth) As he had shown considerable zeal and ability in his endeavours to increase the resources of the country, by improvements in the fisheries and mining interests of Great Britain and Ireland, he was applied to, in 1791, by the earl of Breadalbane, to accompany him on a tour through the Western Isles and Highlands of Scotland, with a view to the discovery of the best means of promoting the welfare of the inhabitants On making application for leave to the prince of Wales, he received from his royal highness a note, of which the following is an extract "Whatever neglect may happen in the department intrusted to you in my affairs, I think it is of so much consequence to the improvement of those counties that the earl of Breadalbane should interest himself about them, that you have not only my leave, but my best wishes for your success, and if on your return you have anything you would wish to report, I myself will take it to the king as I know there is nothing nearer his majesty's heart than the desire of promoting the happiness and prosperity of those parts of the kingdom"

Mr Fraser was subsequently chosen by the government to carry out a series of statistical surveys in Ireland, and he was the means of originating several important works in that country, among others the celebrated harbour of Kingstown, (sometimes called Queenstown,) in the neighbourhood of Dublin. He died in 1831. His eldest son, the Rev Robert William Fraser, M A, became, in 1844, minister of the parish of St John's, Edinburgh. His next brother, Major William Fraser, Hon East India Company's service, founded the celebrated stud of the Company at Pusa, of which he was appointed superintendent. He was on the staff of Sir David Baird at the storming of Seringapatam, and translated from the Persian, a valuable work on horsemanship, which was printed at Calcutta in 1802, 4to

Mr Fraser's works are

FRASER, ROBERT, an ingenious poet, remarkable also for his facility in the acquisition of languages, the son of a sea-faring man, was born June 24, 1798, in the village of Pathhead, parish of Dysart, Fifeshire In the summer of 1802 he was sent to a school in his native village, and after being eighteen months there, and about four years at another school, he went to the town's school of Pathhead, and early in 1809 commenced the study of the Latin language In 1812 he was apprenticed to a wine and spirit merchant in Kirkcaldy, with whom he remained four years In the summer of 1813 he was afflicted with an abscess in his right arm, which confined him to the house for several months, during which time he studied the Latin language more closely than ever, and afterwards added the Greek, French, and Italian, and acquired a thorough knowledge of general literature

In 1817, on the expiry of his apprenticeship, he became clerk or book-keeper to a respectable ironmonger in Kirkcaldy, and in the spring of 1819 he commenced business as an ironmonger in that town, in partnership with Mr James Robertson. In March 1820 he married Miss Ann Cumming, who, with eight children, survived him His leisure time was invariably devoted to the acquisition of knowledge, and in September 1825 he commenced the study of the German language. About this period his shop was broken into during the night, and jewellery to the value of £200 stolen from it, of which, or of the robbers, no trace was ever discovered

Having made himself master not only of the German but of the Spanish languages, he translated from both various pieces of poetry, which, as well as some original productions of his, evincing much simplicity, grace, and tenderness, appeared in the Edinburgh Literary Gazette, the Edinburgh Literary Journal, and various of the newspapers of the period

In August 1833 his copartnership with Mr Robertson was dissolved, and he commenced business on his own account Owing, however, to the sudden death, in 1836, of a friend in whose pecuniary affairs he was deeply involved, and the decline of his own health, his business, notwithstanding his well-known steadiness, industry, and application, did not prosper, and, in 1837, he was under the necessity of compounding with his creditors It is much to his credit that several respectable merchants of his native town offered to become security for the composition

In March 1838, he was appointed editor of the Fife Herald, and on leaving Kirkcaldy he was, on August 31st of that year, entertained at a public dinner by a numerous party of his townsmen, when he was presented with a copy of the Encyclopedia Britannica, seventh edition, as a testimonial of respect for his talents and private character Declining health prevented him from long exercising the functions of an editor, and on being at last confined to bed, the duties were performed for him by a friend In the intervals of acute pain he employed himself in arranging his poems with a view to publication, and among the last acts of his life was the dictation of some Norwegian or Danish translations He died May 22,

1889 His 'Poetical Remains,' with a well written and discriminating memoir of the author by Mr David Vedder, was published soon after his death

FRENDRAUGHT, Viscount, a title in the peerage of Scotland (now extinct), conferred in 1642, on James Crichton, eldest son of James Crichton of Frendraught, in Aberdeenshire, the seventh in direct descent from the celebrated Lord Chancellor Crichton, and the fifth from the chancellor's grandson, the third Lord Crichton, in whom that title was forfeited 24th February 1484, (see CRICHTON, Lord, vol i. p. 725). The father of the first Viscount Frendraught is the subject of the well-known ballads of 'the Burning of Frendraught,' and 'Frennet Hall,' both founded on the following circumstances A dispute having occurred between him and William Gordon of Rothiemay on 1st January 1630, a rencontre ensued in which Rothiemay was killed, and several persons hurt on both sides. To prevent farther feud, the marquis of Huntly, as the friend of both parties, interfered, and directed Frendraught to pay fifty thousand merks to Rothiemay's widow, as compensation for the loss of her husband. On the 27th of the following September, the laird of Frendraught being with Robert Crichton of Condlaw, and James Lesly, son of Lesly of Pitcaple, another quarrel ensued, when Condlaw shot young Lesly through the arm, and was, in consequence, put out of Frendraught's company In the following month the latter went to visit the marquis of Huntly at the Bog of Gight, when the laird of Pitcaple, at the head of thirty horsemen, rode up to demand satisfaction for the wound of his son Huntly endeavoured to convince the angry laird that Frendraught was not the cause of his son's wound, and as Pitcaple still vowed vengeance, sent Frendraught home under a strong escort, commanded by his son Viscount Aboyne, the "Lord John" of the ballad, and young Gordon of Rothiemay, the son of him who had been killed On arriving at Frendraught castle, they were well entertained, and pressed to remain all night, which they unfortunately consented to do, and were placed for the night in a tower in rooms one above the other About midnight a fire broke out in the tower so suddenly, and burnt so furiously, that Aboyne, Rothiemay and their attendants, six in number, perished in the flames, one person only escaping Huntly, in the belief that the fire was wilful, instituted a prosecution against the laird of Frendraught, who, on his part, suspecting the laird of Pitcaple of the crime, seized a nephew of the latter, named Meldrum, as the incendiary, and carried him to Edinburgh, where he was tried, found guilty, and executed, asserting his innocence to the last. Spalding's account of this event, which is unfavourable to Frendraught, and is usually copied as a note in the ballad collections, must be taken with considerable reservation One pathetic incident connected with it may, however, be quoted from his pages "It is reported," he says, "that upon the morn after this woeful fire, the Lady Frendraught, daughter to the earl of Sutherland, and near cousin to the marquis, backed in a white plaid, and riding on a small nag, having a boy leading her horse, without any more in her company, in this pitiful manner, she came weeping and mourning to the Bog, desiring entry to speak with my lord, but this was refused, so she returned back to her own house, the same gate she came, comfortless." The Gordons repeatedly plundered the lands of Frendraught, and for security to his person, Mr Crichton was compelled to reside in Edinburgh for some years, and to have recourse to the protection of the law One of his younger sons was killed by Adam Gordon, 23d August 1642

James Crichton, the eldest son, was in the lifetime of his father created Viscount Frendraught, as already stated, in consideration of his father being heir male of Lord Chancellor Crichton, by patent to him and his heirs male and successors, dated at Nottingham 29th August 1642. The second title was Lord Crichton He accompanied the marquis of Montrose in his last unfortunate expedition in March 1650, and was with him at Invercharron in Ross-shire, when he was defeated by Colonel Strachan on the 27th April following The marquis's horse having been shot under him, he mounted the horse of Lord Frendraught, which that young nobleman generously offered him, and galloping off the field, escaped for a few days. Lord Frendraught, severely wounded, was taken prisoner, but anticipated a public execution by what Douglas, in his Peerage, calls "a Roman death" He had two sons, James, second, and Lewis, fourth viscount.

The second viscount died young, having one son, William, third viscount, who died unmarried in his minority, and was succeeded by his uncle, Lewis, fourth and last viscount, served heir to his nephew in 1686 He joined King James Seventh and Second in France, for which he was attainted by parliament in July 1690, attended him to Ireland, and died without issue 26th November 1698. The lands of Frendraught now belong to Mr Morrison of Bognie, whose ancestor married the widow of the second viscount.

FULLARTON, a surname derived from the barony of Fullarton in the immediate vicinity of the town of Irvine in Ayrshire Traditionally, it is said that the first of the name in Scotland had an Anglo-Saxon or Norman origin [Robertson's Ayrshire Families, vol ii p 85], and is supposed to have accompanied Walter, son of Alan, ancestor of the high stewards, from Shropshire in England, about the beginning of the twelfth century As Walter, soon after his arrival, received a royal grant of the countries of Kyle (called from him Kyle Stewart), and Strathgryfe, now Renfrewshire, it is affirmed by Chalmers and others, that many of those who accompanied him obtained from him grants of land in that district, and the progenitor of the Fullartons is believed to have been of the number

The name Fullarton, anciently written Foulertoun is obviously of Saxon etymology, and is conjectured primarily to be derived from office or occupation, such as that of a fowler This conjecture derives probability from the fact that one Galfredus Foullertoun, who, there is reason to believe, belonged to a branch of the family which settled in Ayrshire, obtained from Robert the First a charter of some lands in Angus, together with the hereditary office of fowler to the king in that county, in which office he and his successors were obliged to serve the royal household with wild fowl when the king arrived at Forfar castle, where this fowler was to be entertained with a servant and two horses. Nisbet states that the original charter is in the earl of Haddington's Collections [Heraldry, vol i p 339]

The first of the Ayrshire family named in unquestionable written evidence is Alanus de Fowlertoun, who lived before the middle of the thirteenth century, and died about 1260 In 1242 he founded and endowed out of his lands a convent of Carmelite or White friars at Irvine His son, Adam de Fowlertoun, received a charter from James, high steward of Scotland, of the lands of Fullarton, which has no date, but must have been granted between 1283 and 1309, the period in which James held the office of high steward

Adam's son, Reginald de Fowlertoun of that ilk, was the father of Sir Adam Fowlertoun, who had a new charter from Robert, high steward of Scotland, dated at Irvine, April 13.

1344, of the lands of Fullarton, Gaylis, &c., in Kyle Stewart Of an active and energetic character, in the beginning of October 1346 he accompanied the army under David the Second into England, and was one of the knights created by that monarch before passing the border At the disastrous battle of Durham, on the 17th of the same month, he was taken prisoner, along with the king. On the release of the latter, October 3, 1357, Sir Adam's eldest son, John Foulertoun, younger of Foulertoun, was one of the twenty hostages left in England, until payment of the king's ransom He was much in the interest of King Robert the Second, both before and after that prince, the first of the Stuart kings, ascended the throne, and for his long and faithful services, he obtained various grants of land in his own neighbourhood. He frequently occurs as a witness in the charters of that monarch, when he is designed "dominus de Corsbie," having, among others, received a charter of the lands of that name By his wife, Marjory, a lady of the Stewart family, he had two sons, John and David John, the elder predeceased him, leaving a son, Reginald, who succeeded his grandfather, on his death, about the year 1399

The son of this Reginald, Rankin de Foullertoun, was twice married, and by his first wife had a son, George his successor His second wife was Marion, daughter of Wallace of Craigie, and by her he had two sons, William and Adam He had a charter, dated at Perth, July 20th, 1428, from king James the First, of the lands of Draugarn (now Droghorn), in Kyle, to which his elder son, by his second marriage, William, succeeded, and was the first of the Fullartons of Dreghorn

The eldest son, George Foulertoun of that ilk, but most frequently designed of Corsbie, had a charter under the great seal, by James the Third, in favour of himself, or, in failure of male heirs, to William his brother, of the lands of Fullarton, Marras, Shewalton Harperland, and West Laithis, also Corsbie, Trune, Craiksland, and Russelsland, all lying within the bailiary of Kyle, as also of the lands of Knightsland in the Isle of Arran, dated at Edinburgh, October 24th, 1464

His descendant in the seventh generation, James Fullarton of Fullarton, was served heir to his father, May 2, 1605 His youngest brother, Robert, is supposed to have been the first of the Fullartons of Bartonholme, in Ayrshire. James married Agnes, daughter of John Fullarton of Dreghorn, and (with a daughter, Helen, married to Blair of Ladykirk, Ayrshire,) had three sons. John Fullarton, the second son, adopted a military life, and served several years in Germany In 1639 he went to France as lieutenant-colonel to the Hon Alexander Erskine, brother of the earl of Mar, and the following year Louis the Thirteenth king of France, advanced him to the rank of colonel in the French army He acquired the estate of Dudwick in Aberdeenshire, which remained in his family till about the end of the eighteenth century The last proprietor of Dudwick of the name was General John Fullarton, a brave and able officer, who greatly distinguished himself in the Prussian and Russian service, and in the latter was promoted to the rank of general. He is described as being of a somewhat peculiar character, from habits acquired in foreign service, and while residing at Dudwick, from advancing age, had little intercourse with the neighbouring proprietors, unless at public meetings, to which he went in an old-fashioned carriage, accompanied by one or two Russian servants. Dying unmarried, he was succeeded in his estate of Dudwick by the family of Udny of Udny, in the same county, supposed to have been related to, or connected with him.

The third son, the Rev William Fullarton, minister of St Quivox, Ayrshire, acquired the lands of Craighall from his cousin, John Fullarton of Dreghorn. He married Frances, daughter of Stewart of Rosco, Renfrewshire, a cadet of the Stewarts of Lennox, and had several sons and daughters, and was ancestor of the Fullertons of Thrybergh Park, Yorkshire. He was also the progenitor of the Fullartons of Carstairs in Lanarkshire, one of whom, Roberton Fullarton, was governor of Prince of Wales Island. His heirs sold Carstairs to Henry Monteith, Esq.

James' eldest son, James Fullarton of Fullarton and Corsbie, received on November 20th, 1634, a commission under the great seal, from King Charles the First, appointing him sheriff of the bailiary of Kyle Stewart. How long this office remained in the family does not appear It was successively held by the families of Glencairn, Craigie, and Loudoun The laird of Fullarton was one of the two commissioners for the shire of Ayr in the Scots parliament in 1648. The family of Fullarton appear at this time to have warmly espoused the presbyterian interest, and did not escape the severe measures which followed the troubled and eventful period of Charles the First and the Commonwealth By the Act of Oblivion, September 9, 1662, by the unprincipled administration of Charles the Second, Fullarton of Fullarton was fined two thousand pounds Scots. He died in 1667 He married Barbara, daughter of John Cunninghame of Cunninghamehead, (sister of the first baronet of that family,) and had three sons and three daughters. George, the third son, succeeded to the estate of Dreghorn, by a special destination, and ultimately to his elder brother in Fullarton The youngest daughter, Barbara, married Patrick Macdowal of Freugh, Wigtonshire, ancestor of the noble family of Dumfries (see DUMFRIES, earl of, page 73 of this volume).

The eldest son, William Fullarton of Fullarton, studied the law On suspicion of being concerned in the affair of Bothwell Bridge, he and his brother, George Fullarton of Dreghorn were, on 30th July 1683, committed to prison, and on 2d April following, were indicted for trial, but the diet, it seems, was afterwards deserted simpliciter On this occasion, amongst other offences, they were charged with "harbouring and countenancing" their brother-in-law, Macdowal of Freugh, who, as is well known, was one of the most forward and zealous supporters of the Covenanters. This laird of Fullarton obtained a charter, under the great seal, dated at Windsor castle, August 5, 1707, by Queen Anne, constituting the port of Troon a free port and harbour, and erecting the town of Fullarton into a burgh of barony He died in 1710, but, although thrice married, he left no surviving descendant.

The estates and representation of the family devolved on his next surviving brother, George Fullarton of Fullarton and Dreghorn, as mentioned above. The latter estate, on succeeding to the family property, he sold to William Fairlie of Bruntsfield who changed its name to Fairlie George Fullarton's eldest son, Patrick, born in 1677, practised as an advocate at the Scottish bar, and predeceased his father in 1709 He had (with two daughters) two sons, namely, William, successor to his grandfather, and Patrick, who, in 1738, purchased the lands of Goldring, now called Rosemount, about four miles north-east of Ayr The latter had also two sons, William, who added considerably to his paternal estate by purchases, and John, a general in the East India Company's service. George's second son, Robert, carried on the line of the family

William Fullarton of Fullarton, the grandson of the above George Fullarton, by devoting his attention to the study of agricultural science, greatly improved his estate, and in 1748 he built the house of Fullarton He also successfully cultivated gardening and botany He died in 1758.

His only son, Colonel Fullarton of Fullarton, born January 12, 1754, was only five years of age when he succeeded his father. He received his academical education at Edinburgh, and in his sixteenth year was placed under the care of Patrick Brydone, Esq., (of whom a memoir is given in vol. i. of this work, p. 448). With that gentleman he travelled on the continent, and accompanied him when he made his celebrated tour in Sicily and Malta in 1770. In 1775 young Fullarton was appointed principal secretary to the embassy of Lord Stormont at the court of France. In 1780 he proposed to government the plan of an expedition to Mexico against the Spaniards, which being approved of, he raised the 98th regiment of infantry, of which he was appointed colonel, though not previously in the army. He and Lieutenant-colonel, then Major Mackenzie Humberstone, (of the noble family of Seaforth, see SEAFORTH, lord,) raised two thousand men, at their own expense, with unusual despatch, and involved their estates to a very large amount, by preparations for the expedition. The unexpected breaking out of the Dutch war, however, caused it, instead of Mexico to be sent upon an attack on the Cape of Good Hope, and ultimately it was employed in the war in India. Colonel Fullarton, with the troops under his command, served at first on board Commodore Johnston's fleet, but in May 1783 he received the command of the southern army on the coast of Coromandel, a force consisting of upwards of thirteen thousand men. His campaigns and operations with this army, in that and the succeeding year, were attended with a rapidity and brilliancy of success previously altogether unknown in that clime.

On his return to Europe, he published a work entitled 'A View of the English interests in India,' &c., together with an account of his campaigns there in the years 1782, 1783, and 1784 (London, 1787), a very interesting narrative, which contains also some curious and valuable information relative to the history of our eastern empire. He was frequently a member of the House of Commons, and was twice returned for his native county of Ayr. In 1791 he was served heir of line and representative of the family of Cunninghame of Cunninghamehead, baronet. (See vol. i. p. 746.)

At the breaking out of the French war in 1793, he raised the 23d light dragoons, then called "Fullarton's light horse," and also the 101st regiment of infantry. The same year, at the request of the president of the Board of Agriculture, he wrote 'An Account of the Agriculture of the County of Ayr, with Observations on the means of its improvement,' which was printed and generally circulated. In 1801 he also wrote an essay, addressed to the Board of Agriculture in England, on the best method of turning grass lands into tillage. The same year he was appointed governor of the island of Trinidad, but returned home in 1803, when he preferred a charge against Sir Thomas Picton, the former governor, for authorising torture on a female slave, which led to the trial of that gallant officer. Colonel Fullarton died at London, 13th February 1808, at the age of 54, and was interred within the church of Isleworth, where a marble monument, with an appropriate Latin inscription, was soon after erected to his memory. He had married in 1792, the Hon. Marianne Mackay, eldest daughter of the fifth Lord Reay, and had a daughter, Rosetta, married to the representative of the family as mentioned in the next paragraph. His widow claimed, as heir of entail, the estates of the former noble family of Bargeny, and in consequence assumed the family name of Hamilton. (See BARGENY, lord, vol. i., pages 250, and 251.)

As Colonel Fullarton left no male issue, the representation of the family of Fullarton devolved on his second cousin, Col Stuart Murray Fullarton of Bartonholme, grandson of Robert Fullarton, second son of George Fullarton of Fullarton and Dreghorn, above mentioned. This Robert Fullarton, a writer to the signet, drew up a genealogical tree of the family of Fullarton. The lands of Bartonholme and others were bequeathed to him by his kinsman Captain William Fullarton of Bartonholme, who died in 1781. By his wife, Grizel, daughter of John Stuart of Ascog, in the island of Bute, a branch of the noble family of Bute, he had, with other children, a son, George Fullarton of Bartonholme, an officer in the army, who was much engaged in foreign service, and was present in North America, during the whole period of what was called the "Seven years' war." Col. Stuart Murray Fullarton, who succeeded to the representation of the principal family, was a son of this gentleman. He entered the army early, and in 1812 was appointed colonel of the Kirkcudbright and Wigton, or Galloway regiment of militia, but resigned his commission on becoming in May 1819, collector of customs at Irvine. He was a fellow of the Royal Societies of London and Edinburgh. On January 4, 1796, he married Rosetta, daughter of Colonel Fullarton, of Fullarton, and had eight sons and four daughters. His wife having died October 19, 1814, he married, secondly, September 11, 1820, Isabella Buchanan, only daughter of the late James Muir, D.D., Glasgow, and had by her one daughter and one son.

In 1805 the estate of Fullarton was purchased by the duke of Portland, and it now belongs to that noble family.

John Fullarton of Dreghorn, who was served heir to that estate in 1546, and who was the fifth in direct descent from Raukine Fullarton of Fullarton, mentioned in the preceding page, took an active part in the Reformation in Scotland, and involved his estate very much on that account. With a view of suppressing the convent of Carmelite friars at Irvine (referred to on page 271), which the Fullartons of that ilk for centuries liberally supported, he purchased, on 19th May 1558, from Robert Burne, prior of said convent, the lands of Friars Croft and Dyets Temple, on which it was situated. At the meeting of the first General Assembly of the reformed Church of Scotland at Edinburgh, 20th December 1560, Fullarton of Dreghorn was one of the commissioners "for the kirk of Kyle." On 4th September 1562, with the earl of Glencairn, Lords Boyd and Ochiltree, and a number of the gentlemen of Ayrshire, he subscribed the famous band at Ayr, to support and defend the reformed religion at all hazards, and against all its enemies, and, on Queen Mary's marriage with Lord Darnley, he went, on 31st August 1565, to Edinburgh along with the earls of Moray, Glencairn and Rothes, and Lords Boyd and Ochiltree, at the head of 1 300 horse, in defence of the reformed faith. He was also one of those who, on 25th July 1567, subscribed the articles agreed to in the fifteenth General Assembly, for the punishment of the murderers of the king (Darnley) the defence of King James, and the rooting out of all monuments of popery. In 1570, with the Reformed noblemen and gentlemen of Ayrshire, he signed the letter addressed to Kirkaldy of Grange, desiring to know the meaning of his threats towards John Knox. In the General Assembly of March 1571, he was one of the commissioners appointed to wait upon the Regent, relative to matters pertaining to the jurisdiction of the church. By his wife, Janet, daughter of Mungo Mure of Rowallan, he had three sons and three daughters. His third son, Sir James Fullarton, was educated at Glasgow, under the tuition of the celebrated Andrew Melville, and afterwards went into the court of Charles the First, who knighted him, and appointed him first gentleman of the bedchamber. In this situation he died, and was interred in Westminster Abbey, where an elegant monument was erected to his memory.

The family of Fullarton held, from an early period, lands in the island of Arran. A cadet of the principal family, said to have sprung from a second son, named Lewis, settled in the island, and his descendants have always been distinguished by the patronymic of M'Lewie, or M'Lewis. When Robert the Bruce landed in Brodick Bay, whilst upon his peregrinations through the Western Highlands, one of the Fullartons directed him to a place where some of his adherents had taken shelter, and were employed in making a temporary fort. For this and other services, the king granted to Fergus Fullarton a charter, dated at Arnele castle, in Cunningham, 29th November, in the second year of his reign (1307), of the lands of Kilmichael and others, with the hereditary office of coroner of the bailiedom of Arran. The farm of Kilmichael, in the parish of Kilbride, worth about £100 a-year, still remains in possession of the family, the rest of the island being the property of the duke of Hamilton The present proprietor of Kilmichael, who resides on his property, has his right of coroner confirmed to him and his heirs, from the family of Hamilton He is obliged to have three men to attend him upon all public emergencies, and he is bound by his office to pursue all malefactors and to deliver them to the steward or in his absence to the next judge. The perquisites due to the coroner are a firlot or bushel of oats, and a lamb from every village in the isle, both of which are punctually paid to him at the ordinary terms. [Martin's Description of the Western Islands]

From the Kilmichael family was descended Mr Allan Fullarton of Glasgow, proprietor of the estate of Orchard in Lanarkshire. He married, in 1812, Janet, daughter of John Wilson, surgeon in Kilmarnock, and had a son, and several daughters. Another branch of Kilmichael were designed of Glenderuel, one of whom was bishop of Edinburgh from 1720 to 1727

Coeval with the Arran family, but from a third brother, were the Fullartons of the island of Bute, who had the patronymic of M'Camie, or son of James, which seems to have been the name of their original ancestor in that island They are often also called Jameson

Of the Carstairs branch, who spelled their name Fullerton, one of them became a lord of session, and was distinguished as a sound lawyer and an able judge John Fullerton, second son of William Fullerton of Carstairs, passed advocate, 17th Feb. 1798, when in his 23d year, and on 17th Feb. 1829 he was elevated to the bench in the room of Lord Eldin, when he took the judicial title of Lord Fullerton He died 3d Dec. 1853, about three weeks after resigning his seat on the bench

FULTON, a surname evidently a contraction of Fullarton Two individuals of this name, originally in humble life acquired in their respective positions, a popularity in their time which entitles them to a place in any collection of Scottish biographies.

GEORGE FULTON, an eminent teacher, born February 3, 1752, was originally intended to be a printer, and served his apprenticeship in a printing-office in Glasgow He was afterwards a compositor in Edinburgh, and subsequently in Dumfries. While yet a young man, he married the daughter of a preacher and teacher of Edinburgh, of the name of Tod, and became a teacher himself of a charity school in Niddry's Wynd of that city To enable his pupils to become readily proficient in their knowledge of the English tongue, both as regards reading and pronunciation, he made use of moveable letters pasted on pieces of wood, that were kept in boxes like those in a compositor's case. The idea of improvement in pronunciation was derived partly from Mr Sheridan's system, and that of the letter-box from his former trade of a printer

His abilities becoming known, he was appointed by the town-council of Edinburgh one of the four teachers of English under the patronage of the city corporation In 1790 he resigned his situation, and having removed to the new town of Edinburgh, commenced teaching grammar and elocution on his own account. Among his pupils were teachers from various quarters, eager to acquire a knowledge of his system Having devoted his constant efforts to the improvement of his method, his long experience in teaching enabled him, in co-operation with his nephew, Mr Knight, to produce a 'Pronouncing Dictionary,' which, being at that time unrivalled of its kind, was soon adopted as a standard work in most schools. Acquiring an independence, about 1811 Mr Fulton resigned his school to his nephew, Mr George Knight, and spent the remainder of his life at the villa of Summerfield, near Newhaven, which he had purchased in 1806 He died, September 1, 1831, in the 80th year of his age He was twice married, but had no children

JOHN FULTON, a self-taught astronomer and mathematician, born at Fenwick, Ayrshire, in 1800, was eldest son of a shoemaker After being taught to read and write at the parish school, he began to work at his father's trade, but soon gave his attention to mechanics, and having constructed a planetary machine, it was bought by the Philosophical Society of Kilmarnock He afterwards constructed an Orrery, which after nearly ten years' labour, was completed in 1838, and notwithstanding his scanty means and education, by dint of application during his leisure hours, he executed his undertaking with the greatest accuracy At this time he studied botany, and took a principal part in the construction of a small gaswork, as well as made a velocipede for a lame lad in his native village The Orrery was exhibited in the principal towns of Scotland and England, and at Edinburgh Fulton received the silver medal of the Society of Arts for Scotland, value ten sovereigns. He afterwards went to London, and was employed in the establishment of Mr Bates, mathematical instrument maker to King William IV, where his ingenuity and skill were fully demonstrated in making theodolites for the Pacha of Egypt and balances for her Majesty's mint. He was 15 years in Mr Bates' employment, earning twenty-five to thirty shillings a-week, and on the death of that gentleman found work elsewhere. Nor did his genius develop itself merely in the mechanical arts. He also applied himself, almost unaided, to the study of the languages, five of which he mastered. He was a good French scholar, a proficient in German, a student of Greek, with a considerable knowledge of Italian His health failed him through excessive application He was taken ill in 1851, and after being most kindly treated in St. Bartholomew's Hospital, returned to Fenwick in 1852, and, after a lingering illness, died in May 1853, his constitution, naturally robust, having fairly broken down, under the pressure of an overwrought brain.

G

GALBRAITH, a surname derived from two Gaelic words, 'Gall Bhreatan,' strange Britain, or Low country Briton Nisbet renders the meaning 'the brave stranger,' but the former appears the more correct. The Galbraiths were once a powerful family in the Lennox The first known is Gillespick Galbrait, witness in a charter by Malduin, earl of Lennox, to Humphry Kilpatrick, of the lands of Colquhoun In the beginning of the reign of Alexander the Second, the same Earl Malduin gave a charter to Maurice, son of this Gillespick, of the lands of Gartonbenach, in Stirlingshire, and soon after, in 1288, the same lands, under the name of Bathernock, (now Baldernock,) were conveyed to Arthur Galbraith, son of Maurice, with power to seize and condemn malefactors, on condition that the culprits should be hanged on the earl's gallows. From the Galbraiths of Bathernock, chiefs of the name, descended the Galbraiths of Culcruich, Gronock, Killearn, and Balgair In the Ragman Roll occurs the name of Arthur de Galbrait, as one of the barons of Scotland who swore fealty to Edward the First in 1296 The family were afterwards designed of Gartconnell

William Galbraith of Gartconnell is noticed as a person "of good account" in the time of David the Second. about the middle of the 14th century [Crawford's Peerage, p 159, note.] This William had three daughters, coheiresses, the eldest of whom married John de Hamilton, a son of the house of Cadzow, predecessor of the Hamiltons of Baldernock and Bardowie, who in consequence adopted in their arms a boar's head, part of the arms of Galbraith, the second, Janet, married, in 1373, in the reign of Robert the Third, Nicol Douglas, fourth son of James first lord of Dalkeith, grandson of William lord of Douglas, the companion in arms of Sir William Wallace, by which marriage he acquired the estate of Mains and other lands in the Lennox, still in the possession of his descendant. The third daughter became the wife of the brother of Logan of Restalrig, from whom descended the Logans of Gartconnell and Balvey, long since extinct. In the reign of James the Second, one of the name of Galbraith was governor of the upper castle of Dumbarton

The family of Galbraith of Machrihanish and Drumore in Argyleshire, of which David Stewart Galbraith, Esq, is the representative (1854), is sprung from the Galbraiths of Gigha, descended from the Galbraiths of Baldernock They fled from the Lennox with Lord James Stewart, youngest son of Murdoch, duke of Albany, after leaving Dumbarton, in the reign of James the First, and held the island of Gigha from the Macdonalds of the Isles till after 1590 The Galbraiths, in the Gaelic language, are called Breatanuich or Clann-a-Breatanuich, 'Britons, or the children of the Britons.'

GALL, a surname obviously derived from the Latin appellation Galli, applied in ancient times to the Gael or Irish settlers from whom the extensive district of Galloway took its name. The abbey of St. Gall in Switzerland is said to have been founded in memory of St. Gall, a Scotsman, who taught there the Christian religion to the inhabitants, and who is still the patron saint of that country [Nisbet's Heraldry, vol. i. p. 327]

GALL, RICHARD, a poet of considerable merit, the son of a notary at Dunbar, was born at Linkhouse, near that town, in December 1776 At an early age he was sent to a school at Haddington, where he was instructed in the ordinary branches of reading, writing, and arithmetic. When he was eleven years of age he was put as an apprentice to his mother's brother, to learn the trade of a house-carpenter and builder The drudgery of such an occupation not suiting the bent of his mind, he soon quitted it, and walked on foot to Edinburgh, to which city his father's family had some time before removed Having chosen for himself the trade of a printer, he was, in 1789, entered as an apprentice to Mr David Ramsay, proprietor of the 'Edinburgh Evening Courant,' in whose service he remained during the remainder of his short life

He now made considerable progress in several branches of learning, under a private teacher, whom his mother had taken into her house to superintend the education of her family On the expiration of his apprenticeship, he was appointed travelling clerk to Mr Ramsay He had early turned his attention to Scottish poetry, and the 'Gentle Shepherd' called forth the latent poetic inspiration in his own breast He was an ardent admirer of the poems of Burns, and during the latter part of the life of our national bard, he enjoyed his friendship and correspondence With Hector Macneill, he was also on terms of intimacy Thomas Campbell lodged in the same house with Gall at the time he was preparing for the press 'The Pleasures of Hope,' and being about the same age, the similarity of their pursuits and sentiments naturally led to the most cordial friendship between them His principal associate was, however, Mr Alexander Murray, afterwards professor of oriental languages in the university of Edinburgh

Mr Gall wrote chiefly in the Scottish dialect, to which he was very partial Only a few of his detached songs were published in his lifetime, but these soon acquired a considerable degree of popularity. Amongst his best efforts in this way are 'The Braes of Drumlee,' 'Captain O'Kain,' and 'My only Joe and Dearie, O' Mr Stark, in his 'Biographia Scotica,' attributes to Gall the song, 'Farewell to Ayrshire,' usually printed among the works of Burns as the production of the latter He says that when Gall wrote it he sent it to Johnson's 'Scots Musical Museum' with Burns' name prefixed, to give it a better chance of attracting notice As he was employed in the same office with Gall, he had a good opportunity of knowing Being a member of a volunteer corps, Gall wrote several patriotic pieces, to stimulate the ardour of his comrades, and one of these being printed, copies of it were distributed to every individual in the regiment He had formed the plan of several larger poems, when he was prematurely cut off by abscess in his breast, just as his poetical powers were beginning to expand themselves He died May 10, 1801, in the 25th year of his age A selection of his poems was published in one small volume by Oliver and Boyd in 1819, with a life of the author by the Rev Alexander Stewart

GALLOWAY, a surname derived from a district in the south-west of Scotland, which took its name from the Gael, Galli, or Irish settlers, in the eighth and two following centuries, and which acquired the name of Gallwalia, Gallawidia, Gallowagia, Gallwadia, Gallwela, Gallway, Galloway The name may be merely Galliwav or Gaelwav, the bay of the Gael or Irish "A Gaelic etymologist," says Chalmers, "would probably derive the etymon of Galloway from Gallbagh, which the English would pronounce Gallwa or Gallwav, the estuary or bay of the strangers or foreigners. It seems more than probable that this difficult name was originally imposed by the Irish settlers, and afterwards Saxonised, from the coincidence of the name The legends of the country, however, attribute the origin of the name to King Galdus, who fought and fell on the bay of Wigton This is the fabulous Galdus who is said by Boece and Buchanan to have opposed the Romans, though conducted by Agricola. We may herein see a slight trait of history, by connecting the fictitious Galdus with the real Galgac, who fought Agricola at the foot of the Grampians." [Chalmers' Caledonia, vol i p. 859]

Of this surname was a distinguished officer of the Indian army, General Sir Archibald Galloway, K C B., who served the East India Company for thirty-five years, and during that long period, besides actions in the field, was present at six sieges and seven storms, in four of which he was closely engaged. He was the son of Mr James Galloway of Perth, and in 1799 he was appointed, as a cadet, to the 58th native infantry, of which he became the colonel in 1836. He was present at the siege of Delhi, and was one of the handful of men to whom the Company owed the remarkable defence of that city when besieged by an army of 70,000 men, with 130 pieces of cannon He was also at the siege of Bhurtpore, under Lord Lake, and commanded the corps of sappers, the most distinguished in the army for the hard and hazardous service it had to perform. On two most sanguinary assaults he led this corps at the head of the forlorn hope, and in the latter was desperately wounded. Lord William Bentinck, when governor-general, nominated him to be one of the members of the Military Board under its new constitution, and on his departure from India, he received an expression of the high approbation of the governor-general in council. His services were honoured with public approbation by commanders-in-chief in India, on nine different occasions, and by the supreme government of India, or the Court of Directors and superior authorities in England, on upwards of thirty occasions, the former twenty-one, and the latter eleven times. He was the author of a Commentary on the Moohummuddan Law, and another on the Law, Constitution, and Government of India. His work on Sieges in India, at the recommendation of General Mudge of the royal engineers, was reprinted by the Court of Directors, and used at their military college. It was likewise, by the orders of the marquis of Hastings when governor-general, distributed to the army for general instruction He wrote also other military treatises. In 1838 he was nominated a Companion of the Bath, and in 1848 a Knight Commander In 1846 he was elected a director of the East India Company, and in 1849 he officiated as chairman, which office he held at the time of his death, which took place at London on 6th April 1850, aged 70

GALLOWAY, lord of, the ancient title of the feudatory princes of that extensive district which, in former times, comprehended not only the shire of Wigton and the stewartry of Kirkcudbright, to which the name is now restricted, but also part of Dumfries-shire and the greatest part of Ayrshire. The first lord of Galloway mentioned in history with any certainty, is Jacob, who in 973 was one of the eight reguli who met Edgar at Chester Fergus, a subsequent lord of Galloway, flourished in the reign of David the First. At his death his extensive inheritance was divided between his two sons, Gilbert and Uchtred The former was the ancestor of the earls of Carrick, the latter was murdered by Gilbert's son, Malcolm, by order of his father, 22d September 1174.

Uchtred's son, Roland, on the death of Gilbert, in 1185, possessed himself of all Galloway, but by the interposition of King Henry the Second of England, he relinquished Carrick to his cousin Duncan, the son of Gilbert. On his marriage with Eva, or Elena, daughter of Richard de Moreville, high constable of Scotland, he obtained that office, in right of his wife His eldest son, Alan, lord of Galloway, died in 1234 By his first wife, whose name is not known, Alan had a daughter, Elena, married to Roger de Quincy, earl of Winchester, who, in her right, became constable of Scotland By his second wife Margaret, eldest daughter of David, earl of Huntingdon, brother of King Malcolm the Fourth, and King William he had two daughters, Devorgoil, married to John de Baliol lord of Barnard castle, through which marriage sprung the claim of his fourth but only surviving son, John Baliol, to the Scottish crown, and Christian, the wife of William de Fortibus, earl of Albemarle. Having, by a third wife, no issue, Alan's lordship was divided among the three daughters. Devorgoil's only daughter, Marjory, was married to John Cumyn of Badenoch, a competitor for the crown.

GALLOWAY, earl of, a title possessed by the family of Stewart of Garlies, (conferred in 1623,) descended from Sir Walter Stewart, son of Sir James Stewart of Bonkyl, and grandson of Alexander, high steward of Scotland. This Sir

Walter Stewart obtained the barony of Garlies, in Wigtonshire, from John Randolph, earl of Moray, by charter, wherein the earl denominates him his uncle. His son, Sir John Stewart of Dalswinton, was made prisoner at the battle of Durham in 1346, and in 1357 was one of the hostages for King David the Second. His grand-daughter (Marion Stewart, heiress of her father, Sir Walter Stewart of Dalswinton) married, 17th October, 1396, Sir John Stewart, son of Sir William Stewart of Jedworth, sheriff of Teviotdale, and left two sons, William and John, the latter provost of Glasgow The elder son, Sir William Stewart of Dalswinton and Garlies, obtained the estate of Minto in 1429, after much opposition from the Turnbulls, the former possessors. Sir William's third son, Sir Thomas Stewart of Minto, was ancestor of the Lords Blantyre. His eldest surviving son, Sir Alexander Stewart, succeeded him, and the great-grandson of the latter, Sir Alexander Stewart of Garlies, was one of the prisoners taken at the rout of Solway, in November 1542 He appears to have been released in 1543, on giving his son and heir Alexander as his hostage. He died in 1590, and (his son, Alexander, the same who offered to fight Kirkaldy of Grange in 1571, having been killed with the regent Lennox the same year,) he was succeeded by his grandson, Sir Alexander Stewart of Garlies, who married Christian, daughter of Sir William Douglas of Drumlanrig, and died in 1596

His elder son, Sir Alexander Stewart, was the first peer of the family After being knighted by King James the Sixth, he was created Lord Garlies by patent, dated at Whitehall, 19th July 1607, when he was sworn of the privy council. On 9th September 1623 he was created earl of Galloway He was also of the privy council of Charles the First, and died in 1649 His elder son, Alexander, Lord Garlies, having predeceased him, his second son, Sir James Stewart, who had been created a baronet in 1627, became the second earl For his loyalty to the king, he was in 1654 fined £4,000 by Cromwell's act of grace and pardon He died in June 1671 His elder son, Alexander, third earl, was succeeded by his eldest son, Alexander, fourth earl, who died unmarried in 1694, whereupon his next brother, James, became fifth earl In 1706 he was appointed one of the commissioners of the treasury, and sworn a privy councillor, but nevertheless opposed the treaty of union in all its articles, except two or three. He died 16th February 1746

His eldest son, Alexander, sixth earl, died at Aix in Provence, 24th September 1773, in the 79th year of his age His eldest son, Alexander, Lord Garlies, predeceased him in 1738, in the 19th year of his age. A Collection of poems printed at Glasgow contains a tribute to the memory of this young nobleman (inserted in the Gentleman's Magazine, vol ix. p 97), by his friend and fellow-student, the Hon Mr Boyle. His next brother having also died young, John, the third son, became seventh earl of Galloway The sixth earl's third and youngest son, the Hon Keith Stewart of Glasserton, appointed a captain in the royal navy in 1762, commanded the Berwick in Admiral Keppel's engagement with the French fleet in 1778, and the same ship, with a commodore's broad pendant, in Admiral Parker's action with the Dutch on the Dogger bank in August 1781 In the following year he commanded the Cambridge, in Lord Howe's squadron sent to the relief of Gibraltar, when they had an engagement with the combined fleets. He became rear-admiral in 1790, and vice-admiral in 1794 At the general election of 1768, he had been chosen M P for the county of Wigton, and was rechosen three times afterwards. In 1784, he vacated his seat, on being appointed receiver-general of the land tax of Scotland. He died 5th May 1795, aged 56. His eldest son, Archibald Keith Stewart, was a midshipman on board the Queen Charlotte, Lord Howe's flag ship, on the glorious first of June 1794, and in the same vessel, bearing Lord Bridport's flag, when the French fleet were defeated off Port L'Orient, 23d June 1796. Next day, a fatal curiosity led him over the ship's side, to observe the carpenters stopping the shot holes, when he lost his hold, fell into the sea, and was drowned, in the 13th year of his age. Admiral Stewart's second son, the Right Hon James Alexander Stewart, born in 1784, married Mary Lady Hood, eldest daughter and coheir of Francis Lord Seaforth, and assumed the surname of Stewart Mackenzie. This gentleman, who was governor of the island of Ceylon, and subsequently lord high commissioner of the Ionian islands, died 24th September 1843, leaving issue Keith William Stewart Mackenzie of Seaforth, and other children

John, seventh earl of Galloway, was, in 1768, while Lord Garlies, appointed one of the gentlemen of the board of police, and on 15th August, 1772, one of the commissioners of trade and plantations. He founded the town and seaport of Garlieston, in Wigtonshire. He succeeded his father in 1773, and on 25th January following was constituted one of the lords of police. He was invested with the order of the Thistle, 1st November 1775 He warmly supported the Pitt administration on its formation in December 1783, and on 2d January was appointed one of the lords of the bedchamber At the general election in 1774 he had been chosen one of the sixteen representative Scots peers, and was rechosen in 1780 and in 1784 He was created a British peer by the title of Baron Stewart of Garlies, in the stewartry of Kirkcudbright, 28th May 1796, with limitation to the heirs male of his body He died at Galloway house, Wigtonshire, 14th November 1806, in his 71st year

His eldest son, Alexander, Lord Garlies, having died young, the second son, George, succeeded as eighth earl The fourth son, the Hon William Stewart, entered the army young, and after passing through subordinate gradations, became lieutenant-colonel of the 95th foot, 25th August 1800 The same year he was severely wounded at the unsuccessful attempt on Ferrol He attained the rank of colonel 2d April 1801, and the same month accompanied the immortal Nelson to the attack on Copenhagen He was highly spoken of in his lordship's despatches, and after that attack, he concluded the convention with the Danes, by which the northern confederacy was broken In 1804 he was a brigadier on the staff, and in 1805 he published 'Outlines of a Plan for the general reform of the British Land Forces.' In the expedition to Egypt, in 1807, he accompanied Major-general Mackenzie Fraser as third in command After the surrender of Alexandria, on 20th March that year, a body of troops under Major-general Wauchope, second in command, was sent to take Rosetta, but was repulsed, and Wauchope being killed, Brigadier-general Stewart marched from Alexandria on 3d April, at the head of 2,500 men, and invested Rosetta. Though wounded, the very day of his arrival before that place, he never quitted his post, but, deceived in his expectations of support from the Mamelukes, and the enemy, consisting of Turks, Albanians, and Egyptians, increasing in force, he was obliged to abandon the bombardment, and retreat to Alexandria, which he reached on 24th April, that city being soon after evacuated He had the rank of major-general 7th May 1808, and was appointed colonel commandant of the 3d battalion of the 95th foot, 2d September 1809 In 1795 he had been elected M P for Saltash in the room of his brother Lord Garlies. He died in 1827 Two of his younger brothers, the Hon. Edward Richard Stewart, and the Hon. James Henry Keith Stewart, were also officers in the army

George, eighth earl of Galloway, entered the navy in March 1780, and served in the Berwick, 74, in the action with the Dutch fleet, on the Dogger bank, in August 1781 He was appointed lieutenant 8th August 1789, master and commandant 1790, and commanded the Vulcan fire-ship in the squadron which sailed to the Mediterranean under Lord Hood in May 1793. The same year he was promoted to the rank of captain In command of the Winchelsea frigate, he assisted materially in the reduction of Martinique, St. Lucia, and Guadaloupe, 11th April 1794, and was mentioned in Sir John Jervis' despatches to the secretary of the admiralty, as having "acquitted himself with great address and spirit in the service, although he received a bad contusion from the fire of a battery against which he placed his ship, in the 'good old way,' within half musket shot." His lordship commanded the Lively frigate in Jervis' fleet at the glorious victory off Cape St. Vincent, 14th February 1797, and was sent home with the news of that signal action He was appointed one of the lords of the admiralty 13th April 1805, but on the change of administration, in the following February, he quitted the board On 28th March 1807 he was appointed lord-lieutenant and sheriff principal of Wigtonshire, and 20th January 1808 he moved the address of thanks in the House of Lords for the king's speech In 1810 he became rear-admiral of the Blue squadron He was a knight of the Thistle. He died 27th March 1834

His eldest son, Randolph Stewart, ninth earl, born at Coolhurst in Sussex, in 1800, was lord-lieutenant of Kirkcudbright, but resigned in 1844, and of Wigtonshire, but resigned in 1851 While Lord Garlies he was M P for Cockermouth from 1826 to 1831 He married, in 1833, Lady Harriet Blanche Somerset, 7th daughter of 6th duke of Beaufort, issue, Alan Plantagenet, Lord Garlies, 4 other sons and 7 daughters.

The earl of Galloway claims the representation of the line of Darnley, on the ground that as Sir William Stewart of Jedworth was brother of Sir John Stewart of Darnley, (which, however, Mr Andrew Stuart, in his Genealogical History of the Stewarts, argues against the probability of) the earl of Galloway, the lineal descendant of the former, must be the representative of the family after the death of Cardinal York.

GALLOWAY, ROBERT, author of 'Poems, Epistles, and Songs, chiefly in the Scottish dialect,' was born at Stirling in June 1752 He was bred a shoemaker, but finding that occupation too sedentary for a weak habit of body, he became a bookseller, and rhymster, and kept a circulating library in Glasgow His poems were published in that city in 1788, and the volume contained also a brief account of the Revolution of 1688, &c He died March 4, 1794

GALT, a surname, meaning, in Gaelic, a stranger or travelled person

GALT, JOHN, an eminent novelist and prolific miscellaneous writer, was born at Irvine in Ayrshire, May 2, 1779 He was the eldest son of a person engaged in mercantile pursuits, and his parents ranked among the native gentry. In the excellent schools of his native town he received the first rudiments of his education. In his eleventh year the family removed to Greenock, where he pursued his studies at the public school, under Mr Colin Lamont and being addicted to reading, his inborn passion for literature found ample gratification in the stores of a public library to which he had access. Having a mechanical turn, with a taste for music, he attempted the construction of a small pianoforte or hurdy-gurdy, as well as of an Æolian harp In these early years he composed some pieces of music, one or two of which became popular He also conceived the idea of several local improvements of importance some of which were afterwards carried out

In his boyhood his health was delicate, and, like his great contemporary Sir Walter Scott, he was considered a dull scholar His strength and energy of character, however, increased with his years, and in due time he was placed in the counting-room of Messrs James Miller and Co, with the view of learning the mercantile profession He continued in their employment for several years, but having, in 1804, resented an insult from a mercantile correspondent in a manner which rendered his situation in Greenock very disagreeable, he was induced to remove to London, where he embarked in trade in partnership with a Mr M'Lachlan, but the connexion ultimately proving unfortunate, was in the course of two or three years dissolved, when he entered at Lincoln's Inn, but eventually abandoned the law In 1809, on account of his health, he embarked for the Mediterranean At Gibraltar he made the acquaintance of Lord Byron and Mr Hobhouse, (created in 1851 Lord Broughton,) in whose company he sailed to Sicily, whence he proceeded to Malta and Greece At Tripolizza he conceived a scheme for forming a mercantile establishment in the Levant to counteract the Berlin and Milan decrees of Napoleon After touching at Smyrna, he returned to Malta, where, to his surprise, he found that a plan similar to his had already been suggested to a commercial company there by one of their partners resident in Vienna. He now proceeded to inspect the coast of the Grecian Archipelago, and to ascertain the safest route to the borders of Hungary, and after satisfying himself of the practicability of introducing goods into the Continent by this circuitous channel, he returned home in August 1811 He made several applications to Government on the subject of his scheme, but these were little attended to, and he never derived any benefit from the project, which was soon afterwards acted upon by others to their great advantage The result of his observations he communicated to the public in 1812, under the title of 'Voyages and Travels in the years 1809, 1810, and 1811,' which was his first avowed work, and contained much new and interesting information relative to the countries he had visited He had previously published, about the end of 1804, a Gothic poem, without his name, entitled 'The Battle of Largs,' which he subsequently endeavoured to suppress

Having been appointed by Mr Kirkman Finlay of Glasgow, joint superintendent of a branch of his business established at Gibraltar, he went for a short time to that place, where, however, his health suffered, and the victories of the duke of Wellington in the Peninsula having seriously checked the success of his mercantile operations, he resigned his situation, and returned home for medical advice Shortly after his arrival in London he married Elizabeth, only daughter of Dr Alexander Tilloch, one of the proprietors and editor of the Star evening newspaper, and editor of the Philosophical Magazine, by whom he had a family

Mr Galt's next work, published about the same time as his Travels, was the 'Life and Administration of Cardinal Wolsey,' and then followed in rapid succession—'Reflections on Political and Commercial Subjects,' 8vo, 1812, Four Tragedies, 1812, 'Letters from the Levant,' 8vo, 1813 'The Life and Studies of Benjamin West,' 8vo, 1816, 'The Majolo, a Tale,' 2 vols, 1816, which contains his peculiar opinions on fatality, founded on an idea that many of the events of life depend upon instinct, and not upon reason or accident, 'Pictures from English, Scotch, and Irish History,' 2 vols, 12mo, 'The Wandering Jew,' 'Modern Travels in Asia,' 'The Crusade,' 'The Earthquake,' 3 vols, and a number of minor biographies and plays, most of the latter appearing in a periodical work called at first the Rejected Theatre, and afterwards the New British Theatre. Among other schemes of utility which about this time engaged Mr Galt's attention was the establishment of the National Caledonian Asylum, which owed its existence mainly to his exertions In the year 1820 he contributed a series of articles, styled the 'Ayrshire Legatees,' to Blackwood's Magazine, these were afterwards collected into a separate volume, which, from its admirable delineation of Scottish life and character, became very popular, and established his name at once as second only to that of the author of Waverley Soon after appeared 'The Annals of the Parish,' intended by the author as a kind of Scottish Vicar of Wakefield, and it certainly possesses much of the household humour and pathos of that admired work About this period Mr Galt resided at Eskgrove House, near Musselburgh, having removed to Scotland chiefly with a view to the education of his children He next published 'The Provost,' in one vol, which was considered by the author his best novel, 'The Steam Boat,' 1 vol, 'Sir Andrew Wylie,' 3 vols, 'The Entail,' 3 vols, and 'The Gathering in the West,' which last related to the flocking of the West country people to Edinburgh at the period of George the Fourth's visit The peculiarities of national character, the quaintness of phrase and dialogue, the knowledge of life, and the 'pawky' humour displayed in these works, rendered them unusually attractive, and they were in consequence eagerly perused by the public A series of historical romances, in 3 vols each, comprising 'Ringan Gilhaize,' 'The Spaewife,' and 'Rothelan,' were published by Oliver and Boyd, Edinburgh, but these were considered inferior to his other novels

In 1824 he was appointed acting manager and superintendent of the Canada Company, for establishing emigrants and selling the crown lands in Upper Canada, a situation which required his almost constant residence in that country, and appears to have yielded him a salary of £1,000 a-year Unfortunately he soon got involved in disputes with the Government, having encountered opposition to his plans from the governor, Sir Peregrine Maitland, and his conduct being unfairly represented to the Directors at home, in

1827 he sent in his resignation to the chairman He had in the meantime founded, amidst many difficulties, the now flourishing town of Guelph, on the spot where he had hewed down the first tree in that till then uncultivated wilderness Another town in the neighbourhood of Guelph was named Galt, after himself, by his friend the Hon William Dixon He returned to London in 1830, just previous to the breaking up of the Canada Company, who seem to have treated him in a very harsh manner At a subsequent period he endeavoured, but without success, to form a New Brunswick Company, and, besides various other schemes, he entertained a project for making Glasgow a sea-port, by deepening the Clyde, and erecting a dam, with a lock at Bowling Bay This, which was a favourite crotchet of his, he said was the legacy he left to Glasgow, in gratitude for the many good offices done to him by the inhabitants of that city His portrait is subjoined

After his return to England he again had recourse to his pen for support, and was for a short time editor of the Courier newspaper Among the principal of his works after this period may be particularly noticed—'Lawrie Todd, a Tale,' 3 vols., 1830, in which Mr. Galt gives the fruits of his own experience in America as agent for the Canada Company; 'Southennan, a Tale,' in 3 vols., 1830, which embodied an antiquarian description of Scottish manners in the reign of Queen Mary, 'The Lives of the Players,' 2 vols., written for the National Library, 'The Life of Lord Byron,' for the same series, 'Bogle Corbet, or the Emigrants,' 3 vols, 1831, intended as a guide-book to Canada, 'Stanley Buxton, or the School fellows,' 3 vols, 1832, 'Eben Erskine,' 3 vols., 'The Stolen Child,' 1833, 'Apotheosis of Sir Walter Scott,' 'The Member' and 'The Radical,' political tales, in one volume each

In July 1832 Mr Galt was struck with paralysis, and was removed to Greenock, to reside among his relations Although deprived of the use of his limbs, and latterly unable to hold a pen, his mental powers retained their vigour amid the decay of his physical energies His memory, it is true, was so far impaired that, some time previous to his death, he required to finish any writing he attempted at one sitting, as he felt himself at a loss, on returning to the subject, to recall the train of his ideas, yet his mind was as active, and his imagination as lively as ever, and the glee with which he either recounted or listened to any humorous anecdote, showed that his keen sense of the ludicrous, displayed to such advantage in his novels, had lost none of its acuteness In 1833 he published his 'Autobiography,' in 2 vols, and in 1834, his 'Literary Life and Miscellanies,' 3 vols He also contributed a variety of minor tales and sketches to the magazines and annuals. Among his latest productions was a tale called 'The Bedral,' which was not inferior to his Provost Pawkie, and 'The Demon of Destiny, and other Poems,' privately printed at Greenock in 1839 His name appears as editor on the third and fourth volumes of 'The Diary Illustrative of the Times of George IV,' a work which created considerable outcry on the publication of the first and second volumes in 1838 Mr Galt wrote in all sixty volumes, and it would be difficult to furnish a complete list of his works In a list which he himself made he forgot an epic poem, and he afterwards jocularly remarked that he should be remembered as one who had published an epic poem, and forgot that he had done so.

About ten days before his death he was visited by another paralytic shock, being the fourteenth in succession. This deprived him at first of the use of his speech, although he afterwards had power to articulate indistinctly broken sentences He was, however, quite sensible, and indicated, by unequivocal signs, that he understood what was said to him He died April 11, 1839, leaving a widow and two sons In person he was uncommonly tall, and his form was muscular and powerful He had moved, during the greater part of his life, in the best circles of society; and as his manners were frank and agreeable, he was ever a most intelligent and pleasant companion His feelings during the monotonous latter years of his changeful life, which were varied only by his sufferings, he expressed in the pathetic lines given in his Autobiography, beginning—

"Helpless, forgotten, sad, and lame,
On one lone seat the livelong day,
I muse of youth, and dreams of fame,
And hopes and wishes all away"

GARDEN, Francis, Lord Gardenstone, an eminent Judge, second son of Alexander Garden, Esq of Troup, in Aberdeenshire, by Jane, daughter of Sir Francis Grant of Cullen, one of the lords of session, was born at Edinburgh, June 24, 1721 After passing through the usual course of liberal education at the university of his native city, and attending the law classes, he was admitted advocate 14th July 1744 In spite of his inclination for literary pursuits, and a strong taste for convivial enjoyments, he soon acquired eminence at the bar In the celebrated Douglas cause he took a leading part, and was one of the counsel sent to France to inquire into the circumstances connected with the case in that country He made a distinguished figure before the parliament of Paris, where he was opposed by Mr Wedderburn (afterwards lord chancellor), and astonished all present by his legal knowledge and fluency in the French language In 1748 he was appointed sheriff depute of Kincardineshire, and on 22d August 1759 was nominated one of the assessors for the city of Edinburgh On 30th April 1760 he was appointed conjunct solicitor-general with James Montgomery, afterwards lord chief baron, and on 3d July 1764 he was raised to the bench, when he assumed the title of Lord Gardenstone.

In 1762 he had purchased the estate of Johnston in Kincardineshire, and in 1765, greatly added to the value of this property by laying down a plan for the extension of the adjoining village of Laurencekirk, then a mere hamlet, which, in 1779, he procured to be erected into a burgh of barony He built a commodious inn, styled the Gardenstone Arms, for the reception of travellers, founded a library for the use of the villagers, with a museum for the attraction of strangers, and established manufactures of various kinds Although some of his undertakings in connection with this village did not succeed, this did not in the least dishearten him, or cause him to abate in his philanthropic exertions, and he had at length the satisfaction of seeing the village of Laurencekirk, which afterwards became famous for its manufacture of snuff-boxes, attain to a degree of prosperity and importance which exceeded his most sanguine expectations

In 1785, on the death of his elder brother, who was for some time M P for Aberdeenshire, he succeeded to the family estates in Banffshire, worth about £3,000 a-year, when, in accordance with the natural generosity of his disposition, he remitted to the tenants all the arrears due to him as the heir of his brother He had been appointed, in 1776, to a seat on the justiciary bench, in the room of Lord Pitfour, which he now resigned for a pension of £200 a-year, and, in September 1786, he went to the Continent for the recovery of his health, which had been much impaired After travelling through France, the Netherlands, Germany, and Italy, he returned home in the end of 1788 In 1791 he published the first volume of his 'Travelling Memorandums, made in a Tour upon the Continent of Europe in the years 1786, 1787, and 1788' In 1792 he added a second volume, and a third, supplied from his papers by his friends, appeared after his death In 1791, a collection of satires and light fugitive pieces, entitled 'Miscellanies in Prose and Verse,' which had been published by a person of the name of Callander, was, by general report, although erroneously, attributed to Lord Gardenstone, as partly his own, and partly the composition of some of the convivial friends of his youth His lordship resided, during the latter years of his life, chiefly at Morningside, near Edinburgh Having derived benefit from the use of the mineral spring, called St. Bernard's Well, in the vicinity of that city, he erected over it a massy building of freestone, surmounted by a temple, in which he placed a statue of Hygeia, the goddess of health. He died July 22, 1792, aged seventy-three

GARDEN, ALEXANDER, an eminent botanist and zoologist, was born in Scotland in January 1730 At the university of Edinburgh, where he was educated, he studied botany according to the system of Tournefort, under Dr Alston, and it is probable that he took the degree of M D there In 1752 he settled as physician at Charlestown, in South Carolina, and soon after married From the outset of his residence in America he engaged in botanical researches, with the assistance of the works of Tournefort and Ray, but he found the greatest difficulty in ascertaining his discoveries, and especially in reducing such plants as appeared nondescripts to their proper places in the systems of those writers, which were more adapted for Europe than America Having met with the 'Fundamenta Botanica' and the 'Classes Plantarum' of Linnæus, he opened a correspondence with that great naturalist, in March 1755, by an elegant and enthusiastic Latin letter He soon after received from Europe the 'Philosophia Botanica,' the 'Systema Naturæ,' and some other works of the Swedish botanist, which greatly assisted him in his investigations His labours were directed to the discovery and verification of new genera among the animal and vegetable tribes of North America, in which he was very successful To his exertions Linnæus was indebted particularly for a knowledge of the insects and fishes of South Carolina, among which is the "Siren lacertina," a most curious animal, resembling both a lizard and a fish, of which he sent a description, with specimens, to Linnæus at Upsal in the spring of 1765

After a residence of more than twenty years in Charlestown, the revolutionary disturbances in America interrupted his scientific correspondence, and finally obliged him, as he had joined the loyalists, to quit that country and take refuge in England. He left a son behind him, but was accompanied by his wife and two daughters. In June 1778 he was elected a fellow of the Royal Society, but was not admitted till May 10, 1783, the latter being probably his first opportunity of attending in person after he came to London, where he died April 15, 1791, in the 62d year of his age On the recommendation of Linnæus, he had, in 1761, been elected a member of the Royal Academy of Upsal Dr Garden published an account of the 'Gymnotus Electricus,' or Electric Eel, in the Philosophical Transactions, and also wrote some other detached papers, but produced no separate work His name will be botanically perpetuated by the elegant and fragrant "Gardenia," dedicated to him by his friend Ellis.

GARDINER, JAMES, a distinguished military officer, celebrated as much for his piety as for his courage and loyalty, the son of Captain Patrick Gardiner, of the family of Torwoodhead, by Mrs. Mary Hodge, of the family of Gladsmuir, was born at Carriden, Linlithgowshire, January 10, 1687-8, and received his education at the grammar school of Linlithgow He served as a cadet very early, and at fourteen years of age had an ensign's commission in a Scots regiment in the Dutch service, in which he continued till 1702, when he received an ensign's commission from Queen Anne At the battle of Ramillies, May 23, 1706, he was wounded and taken prisoner, but was soon after exchanged In the latter year, he obtained the rank of lieutenant, and on January 31, 1714-15, was made captain-lieutenant in Colonel Ker's regiment of dragoons At the taking of Preston in Lancashire, in 1715, he headed a party of twelve, and advancing to the barricades of the insurgents, set them on fire, in spite of a furious storm of musketry, by which eight of his men were killed He afterwards became aide-de-camp to the earl of Stair, and accompanying his lordship in his celebrated embassy to Paris, acted as master of the horse on occasion of his splendid entrance into the French capital After several intermediate promotions, he was, July 20, 1724, appointed major of a regiment of dragoons, commanded by his friend Lord Stair, and in January 1730, he was advanced to the rank of lieutenant-colonel in the same regiment, in which he continued till April 1743, when he received a colonel's commission in another dragoon regiment then newly raised, which was quartered in the neighbourhood of his own house in East Lothian

Colonel Gardiner had for many years been noted for his gay and dissolute habits of life, but about the middle of July 1719 a remarkable change took place in his conduct and sentiments, caused by his accidental perusal of a religious book, written by Mr Thomas Watson, entitled 'The Christian Soldier, or Heaven taken by storm' The account of his wonderful conversion as given by Dr Doddridge, in his celebrated memoir of him, which partakes of the character of the early miracles of the church, is well known He was, says his biographer, in the most amazing manner, without any religious opportunity, or peculiar advantage, deliverance, or affliction, reclaimed, on a sudden, in the prime of his days and the vigour of health, from a life of profligacy and wickedness, not only to a steady course of regularity and virtue, but to high devotion and strict though unaffected purity of manners, which he continued to sustain until his untimely death

On the breaking out of the Rebellion in 1745 his regiment marched with the utmost expedition to Dunbar, and being joined by Hamilton's regiment of dragoons, and the foot under the command of Sir John Cope, the whole force proceeded towards Edinburgh, to give battle to the rebels The two hostile bodies came into view of each other on September 20, in the neighbourhood of Colonel Gardiner's own house of Bankton near Prestonpans, of which the following, sketched by Mr J C Brown in 1844, is a representation It was totally destroyed by fire on 27th November, 1852 On the 21st he fell at the battle of Pres-

tonpans At the beginning of the action he received a wound by a bullet in his left breast, and soon after received a shot in his right thigh After a faint fire, his regiment was seized with a panic, and took to flight, at the same moment he saw a party of infantry who were bravely fighting near him, without an officer to head them, on which he said, "These brave fellows will be cut to pieces for want of a commander," and riding up to them, he cried out, "Fire on, my lads, and fear nothing" But just as the words were spoken, he was cut down by a Highlander with a scythe fastened to a long pole, and immediately after, being dragged off his horse, another Highlander gave him a stroke, either with a broadsword or a Lochaber axe, on the back part of his head, which was the mortal blow His remains were interred on the 24th of the same month at the parish church of Tranent, where he usually, when at home, attended divine service He had married, July 11, 1726, the Lady Frances Erskine, daughter of the fourth earl of Buchan, by whom he had thirteen children, five only of whom, two sons and three daughters, survived their father One of his daughters, named Richmond, married Mr Laurence Inglis, depute-clerk of Bills at Edinburgh She was the subject of a song of Sir Gilbert Elliot's, 'Fanny fair, all woe-begone,' which was originally set to the tune of Barbara Allan She herself was the authoress of 'Anna and Edgar, or Love and Ambition, a Tale' Edin 1781, 4to. She died 9th June 1795

GARDNER, GEORGE, see SUPPLEMENT

GARNOCK, Viscount, one of the titles of the earl of Crawford, and one of the peerages which appear on the union roll, conferred in 1703 on John Crawford of Kilburny, eldest son of the Hon Patrick Lindsay, second son of the seventeenth earl of Crawford and first earl of Lindsay Mr Lindsay, who died in 1680, married Margaret, second daughter of Sir John Crawford of Kilburny, Ayrshire, and her father having, by special entail, settled his estate upon her and her descendants, their son, John Crawford of Kilburny above mentioned, succeeded to the estate, and took the name of Crawford He was born 12th May 1669, and was elected M P for Ayrshire in the Scots parliament in 1693, and again in 1703, and sworn a privy councillor On 10th April of the latter year he was raised to the peerage by the title of Viscount Mount Crawford, which was changed to Garnock on 26th November following His 2d title was baron Kilburny and Drumry He died at Edinburgh, 24th December 1708, in his 40th year

His eldest son, Patrick, 2d viscount, died 29th May 1735, and his eldest son, John, 3d viscount, having died unmarried, 22d September 1738, in his 17th year, his next brother, George, became 4th Viscount Garnock The latter in 1747 was a lieutenant in Lord Drumlanrig's regiment in the service of the States of Holland, and in 1749 he succeeded as 21st earl of Crawford, and 5th earl of Lindsay, on the death of the celebrated general, John, 20th earl of Crawford See that title, vol i p 718

GARNOCK, ROBERT, one of the martyrs of the covenant, was a native of Stirling, and after the Restoration was a constant attender of the field-preachers His father was a blacksmith, and having learnt the same trade, he followed his occupation for some time at Glasgow He subsequently returned to his native town, where he was apprehended and confined for a short period in the castle In the beginning of 1678, when the Highland host was commanded westward, and all the inhabitants of Stirling were required to take arms in behalf of the government, he refused, and went out of the town with a few others to hold a meeting for prayer Orders were forthwith issued for his apprehension, but he escaped He now wandered about from one place to another, until the morning of May 9, 1679, when he was taken prisoner by two soldiers on Stirling Castlehill, in consequence of being present at a skirmish the previous day at a hill above Fintry, between some troopers from Stirling, and a party of Covenanters who had met there at a field-preaching. Being removed to Edinburgh, he remained in prison for nearly two years and a half, continually refusing to subscribe the bond of conformity against offensive arms, tendered by government, and testifying against the indulgence, &c. On October 1, 1681, he was brought before the council, and, having disowned the king's authority, and refused them as his judges, he was, on the 7th, indicted before the high court of justiciary, and condemned, with five others, to be executed at the Gallow-lee betwixt Edinburgh and Leith, their heads and hands to be cut off, and to be fixed upon the Pleasance Port, Edinburgh On the 10th, the sentence was carried into effect, upon Garnock and four others, one of the prisoners having been reprieved

GARTHSHORE, a surname derived from lands of that name, now Gartshore, in the parish of Kirkintilloch, Dumbartonshire The family of Garthshore of that ilk is of great antiquity They possessed charters of their lands of Garthshore as far back as the reign of Alexander II On the death of Captain Patrick Gartshore of that ilk, without issue in the end of the reign of Charles I, the succession devolved on his immediate younger brother, James Gartshore, D D, parson of Cardross, but the estate being incumbered with debts contracted by his brother while in the army, he made it over to his next brother Alexander Gartshore, who was bred a merchant. It continued in the family till the 19th century, when Captain John Murray, born in 1804, 2d son of Sir Patrick Murray, 6th bart. of Ochtertyre, and nephew of General Sir George Murray (died in 1846), succeeded to the estate, and assumed the name of Gartshore, in addition to his own

The name has been rendered eminent by having been borne by Dr Maxwell Garthshore, a skilful physician and accoucheur, son of the minister of Kirkcudbright, and born in that town, October 28, 1732 At the age of 14 he was placed with a surgeon and apothecary at Edinburgh, and after attending the medical classes in the university, in his 22d year he entered the army as assistant surgeon. In 1756 he succeeded to the practice of Dr John Fordyce at Uppingham, in Rutlandshire, where, in 1759, he married a young lady, heiress to a small estate In 1763 he removed to London, where he practised with great reputation for nearly fifty years. He was physician to the British Lying-in Hospital, and a fellow of the Royal and Antiquarian Societies, and contributed several medical and physiological papers to the Philosophical Transactions, the London Medical Journal, &c. His first wife having died in March 1765, in 1795 he married a second wife, who predeceased him Dr Garthshore died, 1st March 1812, at the age of eighty, leaving a fortune of £55,000 His works are

GAVIN, a surname, which has assumed various forms, as Givan, Giscon, Givin, Gavine, &c., derived from Govan, (pron. Guwan) the name of a parish on the Clyde, partly in the lower ward of Lanarkshire and partly in Renfrewshire, and anciently called Guuen or Gunan Govan itself is conjectured to be compounded of two Saxon words, God wen (good wine), the parish, according to Lesly, being said to have obtained its name from the excellence of its ale, which, in his days, was famed over the whole country, and tasted like Malvoisie. [Regionet. Insul. Scotiæ Descriptio, Joannæ Leslæo Episcopo Rossensi, pp. 4, 10, Romæo, 1558, Reprinted 1675] In charters of the 12th century, the name appears in the form of Gowan, and, subsequently, of Gowan and Gowan. The former, in the British, as Gova in the Gaelic, signifies a Smith. The name has also been derived from Gamhan, pronounced Gawan, the Gaelic for a ditch [Chalmers' Caledonia, v 3 p. 674] Robert, 6th Lord Boyd, had a charter of the lands of Gavin and Risk, in Renfrewshire, 9th June 1620 In the west and north of Scotland Gavin is often used as a baptismal name

Gavin of Whiteriggs, Kincardineshire, entailed his estate in 1749

In 1758 David Gavin, Esq, purchased the estate of Langton, Berwickshire, anciently the possession of the Cockburns, and two years after built the village of Gavinton He married Lady Elizabeth Maitland, eldest daughter of the Earl of Lauderdale. His eldest daughter and heiress, Mary Turner, married in 1793, the first marquis of Breadalbane. The 2d daughter, Christina Maria, became the wife of Robert Baird of Newbyth Mr Gavin died in 1773

In Ireland are the families of Gavin of Kilfeacon House, near Limerick, and Giveen of Rock Castle, settled for many generations in the county of Londonderry

GED, a surname derived from the Scottish word ged, a pike, persons of this name bearing three geds or pikes in their arms, with a pike's head proper for a crest.

GED, WILLIAM, the inventor of stereotyping, was a goldsmith in Edinburgh, where he first practised his great improvement in the art of printing in 1725 In July 1729 he assumed as partner William Fenner, stationer, London Subsequently Mr John James, architect at Greenwich, with his brother Thomas James, a letter-founder, and Mr James Ged the inventor's son, became partners, and in 1730 they applied to the university of Cambridge for printing Bibles and Common-Prayer books by blocks instead of common types, when a lease was sealed to them April 23, 1731 Only two Prayer-books, however, were finished, after a large sum of money had been expended, and the attempt being relinquished, the lease was given up in 1738 Ged imputed this failure to the villany of the pressmen and the ill treatment of his partners, particularly Fenner, whom John James and he were advised to prosecute, but declined doing so In 1733 he returned to Scotland, and at the request of his friends, who were anxious to see a specimen of his invention, published, in 1744, a stereotyped edition of Sallust, which his daughter says was printed in 1736 Ged died in very indifferent circumstances, on October 19, 1749, after his utensils had been sent to Leith to be shipped for London, where he intended to enter into trade as a printer with his son James The latter had engaged in the Rebellion of 1745 as a captain in the duke of Perth's regiment, and being taken at Carlisle, was condemned, but on his father's account, by Dr Smith's interest with the duke of Newcastle, was pardoned and set at liberty in 1748 He afterwards worked for some time as a journeyman, and then commenced business on his own account, but being unsuccessful, he went out to Jamaica, where his younger brother, William, was established as a printer, but died soon after The process of stereotyping is now in very general use, being applied to such works as are likely to have a large circulation

GEDDES, a surname, evidently the plural of Ged, those of this name bearing also three pikes in their arms The estate of Geddes in Nairnshire belonged at one period to the Roses, one of whom, Hugh Rose of Geddes, by his marriage with Mary de Bosco, heiress of Kilravock, became the founder of that ancient family It now belongs to a family of the name of Mackintosh There was at one time a family of Geddes of Geddes, as the Geddeses of Rachan are said to have been descended from them In the parish of Nairn there is a hill called the hill of Geddes.

GEDDES, MICHAEL, an eminent divine of the church of England, and ecclesiastical writer, was born about 1650 He was educated at the university of Edinburgh, which city is supposed to have been his native place, and having taken the degree of M A, he was, in July 1671, incorporated in the same at Oxford, being one of the first four natives of Scotland who were admitted to the benefits of the exhibitions founded by Bishop Warner in Baliol college In 1678 he went to Lisbon as chaplain to the English factory there In 1686 the Inquisition, taking offence at the exercise of his functions, cited him to appear before them, and, in violation of the privilege guaranteed by the commercial treaty between England and Portugal, prohibited him from continuing his ecclesiastical duties The English merchants immediately wrote to the bishop of London, representing the hardships of their case, and showing their right to a chaplain, but before their letter reached that prelate, he was himself suspended by the ecclesiastical commission appointed by James the Second of England, who was then endeavouring to establish popery at home.

In May 1688, Mr Geddes returned to England, where he took the degree of LL D, and after the promotion of Dr Burnet to the bishopric of Salisbury, he was chosen by that prelate to be chancellor of his church He died before 1714 Bishop Burnet speaks in very respectful terms of him in his 'History of the Reformation' During his residence at Lisbon, Dr Geddes had collected a mass of historical materials from scarce books and manuscripts in the Spanish and Portuguese languages, and in 1694 he published the 'History of the Church of Malabar,' in one volume, translated from the Portuguese, which was followed by other works, a list of which is subjoined

History of the Church of Ethiopia. To which are added, An Epitome of the Dominican History of that Church, an Account of the Practices and Conviction of Maria of the Annunciation, the famous Nun of Lisbon Lond. 1696, 8vo

Several Tracts against Popery Lond, 1715, 8vo

GEDDES, James, an accomplished essayist, the eldest son of an old and respectable family in Tweeddale, was born there about 1710 He was educated under his father's roof, and afterwards went to the university of Edinburgh, where he particularly applied to mathematical learning, in which he made remarkable proficiency under the celebrated Colin MacLaurin Having studied for the law, he was admitted advocate, and practised at the bar for several years with increasing reputation, but was cut off by a lingering consumption in 1749, before he was forty years of age He had devoted much of his time to the perusal of the ancient poets, philosophers, and historians, and in 1748 he published at Glasgow 'An Essay on the Composition and Manner of Writing of the Ancients, particularly of Plato,' in one volume 8vo He is said to have left manuscript sufficient to make another volume, but it was never published

GEDDES, Alexander, a Roman Catholic divine, critic, and miscellaneous writer, was born in 1737 at Pathheads, in the parish of Rathven, Banffshire His father, also named Alexander Geddes, the second of four brothers, was a small crofter on the estate of Arradowl His mother, whose name was Mitchell, was a native of the neighbouring parish of Bellie Both were Roman Catholics The rudiments of his education were acquired in the village school, kept by a woman named Sellar His parents being in possession of an English Bible, he applied himself, as soon as he could read, to the study of it, and is said to have known the historical parts by heart before he was eleven years old The laird of Arradowl having engaged a tutor named Shearer, from Aberdeen, for his two sons, took young Geddes, with his cousin John Geddes, who afterwards became Roman Catholic bishop of Dunkeld, and another boy, into his house, to be educated gratuitously along with them At the age of fourteen he was sent to the free Roman Catholic seminary of Scalan, in the Highlands, to be educated for the service of his Church This seminary stood at the bottom of a gloomy glen, surrounded with mountains on all sides, and in allusion to their seldom seeing the sun in this dismal spot, he said in a letter to one of his fellow-students, who had obtained leave to visit his friends, "Pray, be so kind as to make particular inquiries after the health of the sun Fail not to present my compliments to him, and tell him I still hope I shall one day be able to renew the honour of personal acquaintance with him" At Scalan he remained till he was twenty-one, when he was removed to the Scots college at Paris In 1764 he returned to Scotland, and was ordered to Dundee to officiate as priest among the Catholics of Forfarshire. In 1765 he accepted of an invitation from the earl of Traquair to reside in his family at Traquair House, where he regulated his studies so as to be preparatory to the plan he had long conceived, of making a new translation of the Bible for the use of his Catholic countrymen.

Having formed an attachment to a female relative of the earl, which was returned by the lady with equal warmth, and not wishing to violate his vow of celibacy, he abruptly quitted the mansion of Lord Traquair, in less than two years after his arrival there, leaving behind him a beautiful little poem, entitled 'The Confessional,' addressed to the fair yet innocent cause of his departure He left Traquair in the autumn of 1768, and proceeded to Paris, where he remained the following winter, engaged mostly in the public libraries, making extracts on biblical criticism from rare books, particularly Hebrew ones In the spring of 1769 he returned to Scotland, and was appointed to the charge of a Catholic congregation at Auchinalrig in Banffshire, where in the summer of 1770 he erected a new chapel, on the spot where the old one, which was in ruins, stood, and repaired and improved the priest's dwelling-house at Auchinalrig, making it one of the most pleasant and convenient abodes belonging to the Roman Catholic clergy in that part of the country The liberality of his sentiments, and the friendships which he formed with persons of the Protestant faith, and especially his occasional appearance in the church of the Rev Mr Crawford, the minister of an adjoining parish, exposed him to the angry expostulations of Bishop Hay, his diocesan, who menaced him with suspension from his ecclesiastical functions, unless he became more circumspect in his life and conversation, and kept himself uncontaminated by heretical intercourse At this period he had contracted debts to a considerable amount, which he was totally unable to pay, when the duke of Norfolk, to whose notice he had been introduced by the earl of Traquair, stepped forward and generously relieved him of all his embarrassments In the hope of improving his circumstances, he now took a small farm at Linzie, in Fochabers, in the immediate vicinity of Auchinalrig, to stock which he was obliged to borrow money, and the failure of three successive crops, with the building of a small chapel close to his farm, which added considerably to his liabilities, in less than three years plunged him into deeper difficulties than ever To free himself from his new embarrassments he published, in 1779, at London, 'Select Satires of Horace, translated into English Verse, and, for the most part, adapted to the present Times and Manners,' which produced him a profit of about one hundred pounds. This sum, with the proceeds of the sale of his household goods, he applied to the liquidation of his debts Having carried his contumacy so far as occasionally to attend the church of the Rev Mr Buchanan, minister of Cullen, Bishop Hay put his former threat into execution, and suspended him from his clerical functions within his diocese This decided him upon going to London, and, accordingly, about the end of 1779, he quitted Auchinalrig, after having discharged there, for ten years, the various duties belonging to his pastoral office From the university of Aberdeen he received, at this time, the degree of LL D, being the first Roman Catholic to whom it had been granted since the Reformation

Dr Geddes arrived in the metropolis of England about the beginning of 1780, and officiated for a few months as priest in the Imperial ambassador's chapel, till it was suppressed in the end of that year, by an order from the emperor Joseph the Second He afterwards preached occasionally at the chapel in Duke Street, Lincoln's-Inn-Fields, till Easter 1782, when he relinquished altogether the exercise of clerical functions He now resumed his early project of completing a new version of the Bible, and he had the good fortune to meet with a patron in Lord Petre, who allowed him a salary of £200 per annum while employed upon the translation, and to be at the expense of whatever private library the Doctor might think requisite for his purpose In a short time he published a sketch of his plan, under the title of an 'Idea of a New Version of the Holy Bible, for the use of the English Catholics,' which excited considerable attention to his undertaking

In the summer of 1781 Dr Geddes paid a visit to Scotland, during which he wrote 'Linton, a Tweeddale Pastoral,' in honour of the birth of a son and heir to the noble house of Traquair He soon after accompanied the earl and countess on a tour to the south of France, and on his return to London, wrote an entirely new prospectus, detailing, fully and explicitly, the plan which he proposed to follow in his translation of the Bible. This he submitted in manuscript to Dr Lowth, bishop of London, on whose recommendation it was published in 1785 In November of the same year, Dr Geddes was elected by the society of antiquaries of Scotland, one of their corresponding members, an honour which he acknowledged in a poetical epistle to that body, written in "geud auld Scottis phrase" He afterwards contributed to the Society's Transactions, 'A Dissertation on the Scoto-Saxon Dialect,' with translations into Scottish Verse of the first Eclogue of Virgil, and the first Idyllion of Theocritus

On the commencement of the 'Analytical Review,' in May 1788, he became a contributor to it, and during five years and a half that he wrote for that periodical, he is known to have furnished to its pages forty-seven articles, principally in the department of Biblical criticism and ecclesiastical history

At length, after having been pioneered for years by many proposals and prospectuses, the first volume of his long-expected translation of the Bible, containing the first six books of the Old Testament, made its appearance in 1792, dedicated to his patron, Lord Petre This volume was keenly attacked by Christians of all denominations, and the vicars-apostolic of the Western, Northern, and London districts, issued a pastoral letter prohibiting its use and reception among the Catholics Against this prohibition the Doctor remonstrated in vain He first published an 'Address to the Public,' vindicating the impartiality of his translation He then wrote privately to the vicars-apostolic, and, receiving no answer, he published a 'Letter to Bishop Douglas, Vicar-apostolic of London,' complaining of their conduct as uncharitable, illiberal, and arbitrary The only notice that was taken of his remonstrances was his suspension from all ecclesiastical functions. In 1797 appeared the second volume of his Translation, and in 1800 'Critical Remarks on the Hebrew Scriptures, corresponding with a New Translation, Vol I, containing Remarks on the Pentateuch' In these works Dr Geddes denies the plenary inspiration of the Scriptures, and assails the credit of Moses in every part of his character as an historian, a legislator, and a moralist. He even doubts whether he was the author of the Pentateuch. He styles the history of the creation a fabulous cosmogony, and the story of the fall an allegory Can it be wondered at, then, that both Romanist and Protestant united in rejecting and denouncing his New Translation of the Bible?

Owing to the heavy expenses attending the works on which he was engaged, Dr Geddes became involved, for the third time, in pecuniary difficulties, and a subscription was set on foot for his behalf, when the sum collected and expended upon his account, from the commencement of 1788 to the middle of 1800, amounted to about £900 He had commenced a new translation of the Book of Psalms, and had already printed in octavo 104 of them, when a painful and excruciating disorder terminated his life on February 26, 1802, and his remains were interred in Paddington churchyard Besides the more important works above mentioned, he was the author of numerous other publications both in prose and verse, a list of which is subjoined He was also the author of the popular Jacobite song, 'O send Lewie Gordon hame! The life of this learned but eccentric divine has been written by Dr John Mason Good

GEDDES, Andrew, see Supplement

GEIKIE, Walter, an eminent artist, the eldest son of Archibald Geikie, perfumer, Edinburgh, was born in that city, Nov 9, 1795 A fever with which he was attacked when nearly two years old, destroyed his auricular organs, and brought upon him the calamity of being deaf and dumb for life He was nine years of age before he was taught the letters of the alphabet, but so great was his desire to learn that he was soon able to read, and perused with avidity every book that came in his way He was next taught writing and arithmetic, and soon after was sent to the institution of Mr Braidwood for the instruction of the deaf and dumb So great was his progress there, that that gentleman was soon induced to employ him more as a monitor than a pupil His turn for the art which he afterwards practised with so much dexterity was first manifested, whilst he was yet a child, by his infantine attempts to cut in paper representations of objects which came within his observation From his earliest youth he began also to sketch figures with chalk on floors or walls, and gradually advanced to the employment of paper and pencils When about fourteen years old he was sent to study under Mr Patrick Gibson, and in May 1812 he was admitted into the drawing academy established by the Hon the Commissioners of the Board of Trustees for the encouragement of Scottish manufactures, which has been the nursery of so many artists who have done honour to Scotland Although the Board did not then possess the magnificent gallery of casts from ancient statues busts, &c, which it has since collected, yet Geikie enjoyed the high advantage of drawing under the direction of Mr Graham, who then held the chair of its valuable school His favourite pursuit, however, was sketching from real objects in the open air, and all those figures or groups that peculiarly pleased his fancy were immediately transferred to his portfolio Indeed so great was the facility and skill with which he used his pencil out of doors, that it was by no means unusual for him to catch the contour of odd figures or of remarkable features, whilst walking by the side of the originals in the streets An amusing story is told of a porter in the Grassmarket of a peculiar appearance in figure and physiognomy, who, aware of his desire to take his likeness, contrived to elude him on all occasions, when he saw him approaching One crowded market day, however, Geikie, determined to attain his object, followed the doomed porter wherever he went, until at last, when the market began to thin, the latter lost all patience, and threatened and abused the young artist with great fury both of words and action The first were lost on the poor deaf lad, and although there was no mistaking the meaning shake of the angry porter's fist, he proceeded to the exercise of his pencil with the utmost enthusiasm, but was soon obliged to fly from the scene, pursued by the porter He took refuge in an open stair His pursuer halted in the street opposite, and placing his arms behind his back, waited there at his leisure to catch the young artist when he should emerge from his hiding-place From a window in the stair Geikie had a perfect view of his subject, and a few touches of his rapid pencil speedily transferred him to his sketchbook When the porter's patience was exhausted, he moved slowly away, and thus enabled the imprisoned artist to find his way home, unscathed, with his purpose accomplished This individual makes a conspicuous figure among the characters to be found in his etchings.

Geikie's collection of sketches of figures and of groups is immense. Many of these were disposed of by private sale after his death, when part of them were purchased by Sir James Gibson Craig, and the greater number by Mr Bindon Blood Although he attempted landscape painting, he was not very successful in that department of the art, and ultimately confined himself to it in pictures where it was subsidiary to his groups and figures As his love for Edinburgh was always great, his subjects of this description were chiefly taken in and about its environs There was not a hill or eminence in the vicinity, from which he did not, at one time or other, make an extensive panoramic view of the city and surrounding scenery, and that with a degree of accuracy and minuteness which few could have equalled To oil-painting he was much attached, but his colouring in general was cold and inharmonious Mr Andrew Wilson, who succeeded Mr Graham in the chair of the academy of the Board of manufactures, gave him many private instructions, but from some defect inherent in Geikie himself, could never impart to him such a knowledge of colours as might have insured to him proficiency in that part of his art A few of his pictures, indeed, were less objectionable as to colour, especially those in which he confined himself to groups of figures, and avoided landscape. Among these are 'All Hallow Fair,' 'The Grassmarket,' and 'Itinerant Fiddlers,' which were painted for the earl of Hopetoun, and are now in the collection at Hopetoun house

In 1831 Geikie was elected an associate of the Scottish Academy, and in 1834 a fellow of the same body His etching powers were equal to his expertness in drawing, and both were sufficient to compensate him for his deficiency in colouring. His first etching was that of John Barleycorn, which was executed as a tailpiece to a ballad of that name, in a collection of Scottish ballads published by Mr. David Laing The first fourteen plates that he executed he published on his own account, but he afterwards sold them to a person of the trade. Of his later etchings he was very proud, and even whilst labouring under those fits of despondency to which he was sometimes subject, he used to say of them, that those to whom they should fall after his death would make more by them than he should ever do during his life, a foreboding, says his biographer, which was but too truly verified Notwithstanding, adds the same authority, of the absence of any touches of the beau ideal, and of all grace from his figures, and especially from his women, and laying aside his faults of colouring, he is entitled, by his other qualities, and particularly by the broad humour which he exhibits, to be classed as the Teniers or the Ostade of the Scottish school

Geikie's disposition was remarkably amiable, and his temper patient in the extreme During the later years of his life, the Bible was his principal study, and his favourite authors were Doddridge's Harmony and Exposition of the New Testament, and Barnes' Notes thereon With two of his friends, who, like himself, were deaf and dumb, he established a religious meeting for persons unhappily labouring under the same infirmities as themselves, to whom he was in the habit of delivering, on Sundays, sermons or lectures, of his own composition, and explaining the Scriptures, by means of the usual signs on the fingers, which are employed by the deaf and dumb as a medium of verbal communication His understanding was singularly acute, and his perception surprisingly quick He was most remarkable for comic humour, and for his talent in displaying it, while his powers of mimicry were of the highest order Warm-hearted and affectionate, this peculiarly gifted artist was particularly attached to his relatives He painted his last picture, which was only finished six days before his death, with one of his little nephews constantly seated on his knee The day after finishing it, he took to his bed, and soon sank into a state of insensibility, from which he could not be roused. He died on the 1st August 1837, at the age of 41, and was interred in the Greyfriars churchyard of his native city. For these details we are indebted to the Biographical Introduction to his Etchings, by Sir Thomas Dick Lauder, baronet.

GERARD, Alexander, D D., a learned divine of the Church of Scotland, and ingenious writer on polite literature, eldest son of the Rev Gilbert Gerard, minister of Chapel Garioch, Aberdeenshire, was born there February 22, 1728 He received the rudiments of his education first at the parish school of Foveran, and afterwards at the grammar school of Aberdeen, whither he was removed on the death of his father, when he was only ten years of age, and two years later was entered a student at Marischal college He took the degree of M A in 1744, and immediately commenced his theological studies in the divinity hall of Aberdeen, which he afterwards completed in the university of Edinburgh In 1748 he was licensed to preach the gospel, and in 1750 he was appointed to lecture on natural philosophy in Marischal college, Aberdeen, in the room of Professor David Fordyce, who had gone on a visit to the Continent Two years thereafter, on that gentleman being unfortunately drowned on the coast of Holland on his return home, Mr Gerard succeeded to the vacant chair He had the merit of introducing into the university an improved plan of theological education, and, in 1755, printed at Aberdeen a well-written pamphlet on the subject, which he had drawn up by order of the faculty of his college In 1756 he gained the prize of a gold medal offered by the Philosophical Society of Edinburgh for the best 'Essay on Taste,' which he afterwards published He belonged to a literary society at Aberdeen, which numbered among its members Drs Blackwell, Gregory, Reid, Campbell, and Beattie, men who not only raised the character of the university which they adorned, but shed a lustre on the literature of their country

In 1759 Mr Gerard was ordained minister of Greyfriars church, Aberdeen, in 1760 he was chosen professor of divinity in the Marischal college, and about the same period he took his degree of D D Having, in 1771, resigned both his church, and his professorship in Marischal college, he was preferred to the theological chair in King's college, Old Aberdeen, where he remained till his death, on his 67th birthday, February 22, 1795 His funeral sermon was preached by his friend and pupil, Dr Skene Ogilvy of Old Aberdeen

GERARD, GILBERT, an eminent divine, son of the preceding, born in Aberdeen on August 12, 1760, was educated for the ministry of the Church of Scotland At the age of twenty-two, he went to Holland, as minister of the Scottish church at Amsterdam, where he remained for several years, and during his residence there, assisted by two literary friends, he wrote and edited a Dutch periodical, called 'De Recensent' He also contributed to the 'Analytical Review,' principally articles on foreign literature While still resident in Amsterdam, the university of his native city conferred on him the degree of D D In April 1791, he returned to Scotland, and soon after obtained the vacant professorship of Greek at King's college, Old Aberdeen In 1795 he succeeded his father as professor of divinity in the same college, and in 1811 he was appointed to the second charge of the collegiate church of Old Machar He also acted as master of mortifications for King's college, and was appointed one of the royal chaplains for Scotland Dr Gerard died suddenly, September 28, 1815 —His works are

On Indifference with regard to religious truths, a Sermon Lond 1797, 8vo.

Institutes of Biblical Criticism, being the heads of his course of lectures on that subject. Lond 1806, 1808, 8vo This work, styled by the Biographie Universelle, a work full of erudition, and written in a good spirit, was dedicated to Dr Herbert Marsh, afterwards bishop of Peterborough

GERARD, ALEXANDER, a distinguished scientific traveller, son of the preceding, was born in Aberdeen, and at the early age of sixteen went out to India. Not long afterwards he was sent by Sir David Ochterlony to survey Malacca, a survey which he executed with great accuracy, mostly at mid-day under a burning sun He held the rank of captain in the East India Company's service, and during a period of above twenty years was employed in exploring, surveying, and mapping the northern districts of India, having been selected by the Bengal government for the purpose, on account of his acknowledged skill in those departments of professional duty He was in particular appointed to many of the surveys which were deemed difficult and important, and this led to his residing for many years in the then almost unknown district of Chinese Tartary, and amongst the mountains of the Himalaya He traversed those gigantic regions in paths before untrodden by any European, and attained heights which had previously been deemed inaccessible At one part he ascended above 20,000 feet, and by ways steeper than it had been deemed possible to climb In these excursions he suffered the extremes of heat, cold, and hunger, and endured privations of every description And it was not until his health had been completely sacrificed that he could be persuaded to abandon his labours and return to his native country

While engaged in his exploratory expeditions, Captain Gerard made patient researches not only into the customs and antiquities of the tribes he encountered in his travels, but also into the geology and natural history of the districts through which he passed The Himalaya mountains are inhabited at extraordinary altitudes, he found cultivated fields and crops of corn at heights of from fourteen to sixteen thousand feet above the level of the sea, and flocks of sheep, and tribes of Tartar shepherds, with their dogs and horses, obtain subsistence at these immense elevations The notices of the state of literature in Chinese Tartary are also very interesting It would appear that when science and letters, flying from tyranny, abandoned the plains of Hindostan, they took refuge in the mountains of Thibet, where they have flourished to an extent of which we have been hitherto little aware In the Thibetan language an Encyclopædia was discovered, of 44 volumes, treating of the arts and sciences, and the medical part of which work formed five volumes Captain Gerard's brother, Dr James Gilbert Gerard of the Bengal Medical Establishment, who accompanied him in many of his excursions and surveys, had fallen in with a learned Hungarian, named Cosmo de Konas, who resided in Thibet, and who had made great progress in bringing to light much curious information respecting that hitherto little known people The art of lithography had been practised in the city of Thibet from time immemorial, and it had been used, amongst other purposes, for displaying the anatomy of different parts of the human body.

Captain Gerard died at Aberdeen December 15, 1839 Soon after his death appeared the 'Narrative of a Journey from Cannpoor to the Boorendo Pass in the Himalaya Mountains, by Major Sir William Lloyd, and Captain Alexander Gerard's Account of an Attempt to penetrate by Bekhur to Garoo and the Lake Manasarowara, with a Letter from the late J G Gerard, Esq, detailing a Visit to the Shatool and Boorendo Passes, edited by George Lloyd,' 2 vols 8vo, 1840

GIB, Adam, one of the early ministers of the Secession church in Scotland and leader of the Antiburghers, the ninth son of Mr John Gib, proprietor of the estate of Castletown, in the parish of Muckart, Perthshire, was born there on 7th April, 1714 His father, intending him for the medical profession, sent him in 1730 to the university of Edinburgh, to be educated under the superintendence of his uncle, Mr Gib, surgeon in that city Peculiarly attached to mathematical studies, he was a favourite scholar of the celebrated Professor M'Laurin, father of Lord Dreghorn, a lord of session One day as he was walking down the old West Bow, deeply meditating on a mathematical problem, he found himself in the midst of a crowd, assembled to witness the execution of a criminal in the Grassmarket, when the question forced itself upon his mind, "Will the subject which now so entirely engrosses my attention, prepare me for eternity?" Resolving from that moment to commence a new course of conduct, he lived retired that he might not be exposed to temptation, and writing out rules for his guidance, signed them with his own blood Finding himself, however, unable to act up to them, he determined upon retiring to some desert island, where no temptation could exist to lead him astray, but the perusal of Luther's work on the Galatians caused him to change his design The introduction to that work, it is supposed, brought him first to the knowledge of the truth

He now resolved to devote himself to the work of the ministry, and having, in 1735, joined the Associate Presbytery, he was by them, on 5th March 1740, licensed to preach the gospel in the West Kirk of Stirling Soon after he received a call from the Seceding congregation of Edinburgh, and another from that of Stitchell On the 2d April 1741, he was ordained minister of the former, and under his powerful and popular preaching, it soon increased largely in numbers

During the rebellion of 1745 he took an active part in support of the government He was the means of raising several companies of volunteers among his own people, for the defence of the capital, and, on its occupation by the Highland army, he assembled his congregation for public worship at Dreghorn near Colinton, about four miles west of the city, on which occasion he preached for five successive Sabbaths in the open air, showing his loyalty to the government, even in presence of some of the insurgents, by praying for the reigning sovereign Shortly afterwards he accompanied part of his congregation, who had taken up arms in defence of government, to Falkirk, where, a few hours before the battle of the 17th January, he signalized himself by his zeal in seizing a rebel spy, and lodging him in prison, from whence in the evening he was liberated by the Pretender's army, on marching victoriously into Falkirk

His father had been much displeased with him for abandoning the medical profession, and refused for some time to hear him preach, after he was licensed, but afterwards, being dissatisfied with the habits of his eldest son, he disinherited him, and settled the estate of Castletown on the subject of this notice When, after his death, his deed of settlement was read, Mr Gib asked of his brother, if he would engage to change his mode of life on condition of the estate being restored to him, and on being answered in the affirmative, he immediately destroyed the deed by putting it into the fire in presence of the company assembled on the occasion

In 1746, when the memorable schism occurred in the Secession church, respecting the religious clause in the burgess' oath, Mr Gib took a leading part on the side of those who maintained that the swearing of this clause was inconsistent with the public profession of Seceders The Antiburgher Synod was constituted in his house at Edinburgh, on 10th April 1747, and his prominent position in the controversy obtained for him the title of 'Pope Gib' During the last years of his life, he suffered severely from the gout He died at Edinburgh on 18th June 1788, in the 75th year of his age, and 48th of his ministry, and was interred in the Greyfriars churchyard of that city, where an elegant monument was erected to his memory by his congregation

An Exposition of some late Reveries concerning the Sonship of Christ. Edin 1780

A Memorial and Remonstrance read before the Associate Synod, at Edinburgh, May 2, 1782, relative to a printed Sermon which had been preached before them Edin 1784

Sacred Contemplations, in three parts Containing, 1 A view of the Covenant of Works, 2 of the Covenant of Grace, and 3 of the absolute and immediate dependence of all things on God Edin 1786, 8vo At the end of this work, executed in the 73d year of his age, and forming a compendious body of Calvinistic divinity, was an 'Essay on Liberty and Necessity,' in answer to Lord Kames' Essay on that subject.

GIBB, JOHN, an eminent civil engineer, was born in the year 1776, at Kirkcows, a small property near Falkirk, then belonging to his father, an extensive contractor in that quarter, who died when he was only twelve years of age. After having served a regular apprenticeship to a mechanical trade, at that time considered an indispensable part of training, either as a civil engineer or contractor, he received his first professional instruction at the Lancaster and Preston canal, from his brother-in-law, then engaged in the construction of that canal, under the direction of the late Mr Rennie He was next employed by Mr Easton, his father-in-law, at the formation of Leith docks From 1805 to 1809 he was employed by the magistrates and town council of Greenock, in the execution of what was then called the new harbour in that town, under the direction of Mr Rennie, and while engaged there he gave such proofs of his ability as to attract the attention of the celebrated Mr Telford, who was then looking out for a resident engineer to the harbour works at Aberdeen He went to that city in 1809, and built the extensive piers at the entrance into the harbour there At an after period he executed, along with his son, many important improvements in deepening and building quay walls, preparatory to the harbour at Aberdeen being made a wet dock In reference to these works Mr Telford, in his Life, published by his executors, thus mentions him "Mr Gibb, with unremitting attention, superintended every operation connected with these difficult works, in which he has distinguished himself by remarkable ingenuity and perseverance" There not being that field for engineering in the northern district in which he resided, which a man of his active mind and talents required, he became an extensive contractor for works principally in the south, and his exertions at the first contract he executed, which was at the Crinan canal, are thus described in their annual report by Lords Castlereagh, Binning, Glenbervie, and Melville, then parliamentary commissioners for the improvement of the canal "The canal was closed at the end of February 1817, to admit of the necessary operations, for the completion of which we allowed the contractor (Mr Gibb of Aberdeen) a twelvemonth, expiring February 1818. But his activity has outrun our expectations, the canal having been actually opened for use in the beginning of November last. On a review of what has been done by Mr Gibb, we cannot but be gratified at such an instance of exertion." Mr Gibb was afterwards engaged in a large number of important public works, the last one of any extent in which he took an active part and completed, along with his son, being the Glasgow bridge, (designed by Mr Telford,) which is faced with Aberdeen granite, and in the published account of that work by the executors of the late Mr Telford, it is stated "The bridge trustees were so well pleased with the execution of this splendid structure, that they presented to the contractors two elegant pieces of plate, in testimony of the high sense they entertained of their zeal and fidelity" Mr Gibb died at Aberdeen, on 3d December, 1850, being at the time of his death one of the oldest members of the Institution of Civil Engineers of London

GIBBS, James, an eminent architect, the son of Peter Gibbs, of Foot-dee-mire, merchant in Aberdeen, and Isabel Farquhar, his second wife, was born about 1674 He received his education at the grammar school and the Marischal college, Aberdeen, where he took the degree of M A. An anecdote is recorded of Peter Gibbs the father, which deserves to be related as an evidence of the spirit of the times. At the Revolution of 1688, party feeling running high, old Mr Gibbs, who was a Roman Catholic, named two dogs he had Calvin and Luther, in derision of both Presbyterians and Episcopalians For this the magistrates of Aberdeen summoned him to appear before them, and sagaciously ordered the unoffending puppies to be hanged at the cross as a terror to evil-doers, which wise, and just, and merciful sentence was duly executed accordingly!

About 1694 Mr James Gibbs left Aberdeen, to which he never returned, and spent some years in the service of an architect and master-builder in Holland The earl of Mar happening, about 1700, to be in that country, Mr Gibbs was introduced to him, and finding him to be a man of genius, his lordship generously furnished him with recommendatory letters and money, in order, by travelling, to complete himself as an architect. Mr. Gibbs accordingly went to Italy, and for ten years applied himself assiduously to the study of architecture among the classical models of ancient Rome. In 1710 he returned to England, when, by the influence of his noble patron, then secretary for Scotland, and high in favour with Queen Anne, his name was added to the list of architects appointed by the trustees named in the act of parliament which had been passed for building fifty new churches in the metropolis He designed and executed the church of St Martin's-in-the-Fields, the beautiful façade of which is considered his chef-d'œuvre, St Mary's in the Strand, and others The Radcliffe Library at Oxford, on the completion of which he received the degree of M A from that university, the King's college, Royal library, and Senate house at Cambridge, and the monument of John Holles, duke of Newcastle, in Westminster Abbey, with some buildings in the palace of Stowe, are also lasting evidences of his abilities as an architect. A few years before his death he sent to the magistrates of Aberdeen, as a testimony of his regard for his native place, a plan of St Nicholas church in that city, which was followed in the rebuilding of it. He died unmarried August 5, 1754, and bequeathed the bulk of his property, amounting to about £15,000, to public charities, and his particular friends; amongst the rest he left £1,000, the whole of his plate, and an estate of £280 a-year, to the only son of his patron, the earl of Mar In 1728 he had published a large folio volume of his designs, by which he realized £1,500, and sold the plates afterwards for £400 His papers and MSS, with his library, consisting of about 500 volumes, he left as a donation to the Radcliffe Library.

His works are

Gibson, a surname common to both Scotland and England, evidently having its root in the baptismal name of Gilbert, among the son names, nurse-names, and diminutives of which are Gib, Gibbs, Gibbie, Gebbie, Gibson, Gibbons, and similar appellations. [Lower's Essays on English Surnames, vol 1 p 168] The name of Gibson is of great antiquity in Scotland, and no less than five families of this surname, branches of the same stock, have been raised to the dignity of baronet.

The progenitors of the Gibsons of Durie, in Fife, were free barons of that county and Mid Lothian before the fourteenth century Their immediate ancestor was Thomas Gibson, who lived in the reign of King James the Fourth, and is particularly mentioned, with several other barons of the county of Fife, in a charter by Sir John Moubry, of Barnbougle, knight, in favour of his son, William de Moubry, in 1511 He left two sons, George his heir, and William, successively vicar of Garvock, rector of Inverarity, and dean of Restalrig. By James the Fifth the latter was appointed one of the lords of session, at the institution of the college of justice in 1532, and by that monarch he was frequently employed in embassies to the Pope, who honoured him with the armorial bearing of three keys, as being a churchman, with the motto Cœlestes pandite portæ, and as a reward for his writings on behalf of the church, he obtained the title of Custos Ecclesiæ Scotiæ [Douglas' Baronage, p 568] In 1540, Cardinal Bethune conjoined the dean of Restalrig with himself as his suffragan, that he might have the more leisure to attend to the affairs of state. He was to retain the benefices which he already held, and to receive, from the cardinal and his successors, a pension of £200, during his life.

George, the elder son, had a son, also named George, who succeeded him. The son of the latter, George Gibson of Goldingstones, was a clerk of session, and died about 1590 By his wife, Mary, a daughter of the ancient family of Airth of that ilk, in Stirlingshire, he had two sons, Sir Alexander

Gibson, Lord Durie, the celebrated judge, first baronet of the family (1628), of whom a memoir is subjoined; and Archibald, who was bred to the church, and obtained a charter, under the great seal, of several lands near Glasgow, dated 22d May, 1599 Sir Alexander, Lord Durie, purchased the lands of that name, anciently belonging to the family of Durie of that ilk, and had a charter of the same in 1614 He married Margaret, daughter of Sir Thomas Craig of Riccarton, lord advocate of Scotland, and, with 3 daughters, had 3 sons, Alexander, 2d baronet, Sir John Gibson of Pentland who carried on the line of the family, and George, of Balhouffie.

The eldest son, Sir Alexander Gibson, younger of Durie was appointed one of the clerks of session on 25th July 1632, and as such was one of the clerks of parliament. On the attempt of Charles I to impose the service book on the people of Scotland, he protested, with others, at the market cross of Edinburgh against the royal proclamations, on 8th July and 22d September 1638 He was also one of those who presented the petition against the bishops to the presbytery of Edinburgh and the General Assembly in November of that year As clerk of parliament he refused to read the royal warrant for the prorogation of parliament from 14th Nov 1639 to 2d June 1640 In the latter year he was appointed commissary general of the forces raised to resist King Charles I On 13th November 1641, he was nominated lord clerk register by the king, who, on the 15th of the previous March, had conferred on him the honour of knighthood He was also appointed one of the commissioners for the plantation of kirks On 1st February 1645, he was named one of the commissioners of exchequer, and on 8th March following, a supernumerary member of the committee of estates as also of the committees of a similar nature appointed in 1646 1647 and 1648 On 2d July 1646, he was admitted a lord of session, on the favourable report of that court to the king Having joined "the Engagement," he was deprived of his offices by the act of classes, on 13th February 1649 and in the following year as an entry, in Lamont's Diary states, both Durie and his lady was debarred from the table because of their malignancie." In August 1652, he was one of the commissioners chosen for Scotland to attend the parliament of England, and he again went to England in January 1654 He died in June 1656

His son, Sir John Gibson of Durie, 3d baronet, sat in the first Scots parliament of Charles II in 1660 His only son Sir Alexander Gibson of Durie, having died without issue, in him ended the male line of the eldest son of the 5th baron Sir Alexander, Lord Durie the eminent judge, and the title and estates devolved upon the grandson of Sir John Gibson of Pentland, his lordship's 2d son A steady loyalist, Sir John Gibson of Pentland attended Charles I in all his vicissitudes of fortune, and in 1651 accompanied King Charles II to the unfortunate battle of Worcester where he lost a leg, and for his gallant behaviour was knighted by the king He had, with 2 drs. 3 sons 1 Sir Alexander Gibson of Pentland and Adiston one of the principal clerks of session and clerk to the privy council of Scotland, 2 Sir John Gibson, Bart., colonel of a regiment of foot, and governor of Portsmouth, 3 Sir Thomas Gibson of Keirhill, created a baronet in 1702

The eldest son, Sir Alexander Gibson, with five daughters, had four sons, namely, Sir John, who succeeded Alexander, progenitor of the present family, Thomas Gibson of Clifton-hall; and James, a lieutenant-general in the service of the queen of Hungary

Sir Alexander's eldest son, Sir John, 5th baronet, m. Elisabeth daughter of Lewis Craig of Riccarton, and had, with two daughters, two sons, Sir Alexander, 6th baronet, and John, merchant, London Sir Alexander, the elder, leaving no male issue, was succeeded by his nephew, Sir John, 7th baronet, son of John Gibson of London He also dying without male issue, was succeeded by his brother Sir Robert, 8th baronet. At Sir Robert's death in America, without issue, the title reverted to the descendant of Alexander Gibson, of Durie, 2d son of Sir Alexander Gibson, clerk of the privy council, above mentioned. This gentleman, Alexander Gibson, one of the principal clerks of session, obtained from his father, the lands of Durie in 1699 His eldest son, John Gibson of Durie, married Helen, 2d daughter of Hon. William Carmichael of Skirling, (son of John, 1st earl of Hyndford, and father of 4th earl,) by his first wife, Helen, only child of Thomas Craig of Riccarton, and had, by her, with 3 drs., 5 sons, viz., Alexander, William, merchant, Edinburgh, father of James Gibson, W S, created a baronet in 1831, and on succeeding to the estate of Riccarton, Mid Lothian, assumed the additional name of Craig (see CRAIG, Sir James Gibson, vol. i p. 692), Thomas, lieut.-col 83d regiment, and two who died young John Gibson of Durie, the father, sold the estate of Durie to the ancestor of Mr Maitland Christie, the present proprietor His eldest son, Alexander, had two sons, John and Thomas.

Sir John the elder succeeded Sir Robert as 9th baronet, and assumed the name and title of Gibson Carmichael of Skirling, on inheriting the estates, as heir of entail, of the 4th earl of Hyndford, his grand-uncle Having only a daughter, he was succeeded in 1803 by his brother, Sir Thomas Gibson Carmichael of Skirling, 10th baronet of the Gibson family, (see vol i p. 591) By his wife, a daughter of General Dundas of Fingask, Sir Thomas had 7 children The eldest, Alexander, born at the family seat, Castle-Craig, Peebles-shire, June 6, 1812, succeeded his father in 1849 Educated first at Harrow, and subsequently at Cambridge, immediately after leaving the university, he entered upon public life At the election of 1837 he contested the county of Peebles, but was defeated by a small majority He subsequently became private secretary to the Hon Fox Maule, who in 1852 succeeded his father as 2d Lord Panmure. Sir Alexander Gibson Carmichael died 1st May 1850 He was remarkable for his piety, and a brief memoir of him is inserted in the volume of the Christian Treasury for 1850, p. 376. He was succeeded by his brother, Sir Thomas, 12th baronet, who died Dec. 30, 1855, when his next brother, Rev Sir William Henry, born Oct. 9, 1807, became 13th baronet The latter m., in 1858, Eleonora-Ann, daughter of David Anderson, Esq of St Germains

GIBSON, Sir ALEXANDER, Lord Durie, an eminent lawyer, was the son of George Gibson of Goldingstones, one of the clerks of session. On 14th December 1594, on a commission from the lord clerk register, he was admitted third clerk of session King James in person was present at his admission, and for the readiness with which the first and second clerks complied with his desire that he should be received, he promised in presence of the court to reward them with "ane sufficient casualtie for said consents" On 10th July 1621, he was appointed a lord of session, when he took the title of Lord Durie, his clerkship being conferred upon his son, to be held conjunctly with himself, and to devolve on the longest liver In

1628 he was created by Charles the First, a baronet of Nova Scotia, on which occasion he received a grant of land in that province In 1633 he was named a commissioner for revising the laws and collecting the local customs of the country In 1640 he was elected a member of the committee of estates, and on 13th November, 1641, his appointment as judge was continued under a new commission to the court

While the office of president continued elective in the senators of the college of justice, Lord Durie was twice chosen head of the court, namely, for the summer session on 1st June 1642, and for the winter session of 1643 This able and upright judge died at his house of Durie, June 10, 1644 Having, from 11th July 1621, the day after his elevation to the bench, to 16th July 1642, preserved notes of the more important decisions, these, known as 'Durie's Practicks,' were published by his son, at Edinburgh, in 1690, in one volume folio, and are the earliest digested collection of decisions in Scottish law

Of this judge the following remarkable circumstance, highly illustrative of the unsettled state of the country at that period, is recorded The earl of Traquair, lord high treasurer, having a lawsuit, of great importance to his family, depending before the court of session, and believing that the opinion of Lord Durie, then lord president, was adverse to his interests, employed Willie Armstrong, called Christie's Will, a noted and daring moss-trooper, to convey his lordship out of the way until the cause should be decided Accordingly, one day when the judge was taking his usual airing on horseback on Leith sands, without any attendant, he was accosted by Armstrong near the then unfrequented and furzy common called the Figgate Whins, forcibly dragged from his saddle, blindfolded, and muffled in a large cloak, in which condition he was carried to an old castle in Annandale, named the Tower of Graham He remained closely immured in the vault of the castle for three months, debarred from all intercourse with human kind, and receiving his food through an aperture in the wall His friends, supposing that he had been thrown from his horse into the sea, and been drowned, had gone into mourning for him, but upon the lawsuit terminating in favour of Lord Traquair, he was brought back in the same mysterious manner, and set down on the very spot whence he had been so expertly kidnapped

GIBSON, PATRICK, an accomplished artist and able writer on art, was born at Edinburgh in December 1782 After receiving an excellent classical education at the High school, and at a private academy, he was placed as an apprentice under Mr Alexander Nasmyth, the celebrated landscape painter, and about the same time attended the Trustees' academy, then taught by Mr Graham Besides mathematics he carefully studied architectural drawing, and acquired a thorough knowledge of perspective and the theory of art in general Many of his landscapes are valuable from the masterly delineations of temples and other classical buildings which he introduced into them He distinguished himself also by his criticisms and writings on art Having been appointed professor of painting in the academy at Dollar, he removed from Edinburgh to that village in 1824 He died there, August 26, 1829, in his 46th year He had married in June 1818, Isabella, daughter of Mr William Scott, the eminent teacher of elocution, and had three daughters and one son, the latter of whom died in infancy

Mr Gibson published,

GIFFORD, a surname, originally Giffard, signifying the Liberal, first conferred on Walter, Count de Longueville, a kinsman of his own, who came over with William the Conqueror This Walter Giffard was nephew of Gunnora, duchess of Normandy, the Conqueror's great-grandmother Having distinguished himself at the battle of Hastings, William created him earl of Buckingham, and bestowed on him in that county 48 lordships or baronies, besides 85 in other parts of England. Several English families of the name are noted in Dugdale. Fonthill in Wiltshire, celebrated for its abbey, belonged to one of them, and is still called Fonthill-Giffard.

Two of the race came to Scotland under David the First, Hugh, and William, the latter supposed to be an ecclesiastic. The former obtained extensive lands in East Lothian, where he settled His son, also named Hugh Gifford, witnessed many of the charters of King William the Lion, under whom he rose to distinction, and in 1174 was one of the hostages for his release. From that monarch he obtained the additional lands of Yestred (Cambro-British Ystrad, the strath or vale), now Yester, and in process of time the parish of that name in East Lothian came to be popularly called Gifford. The village of Gifford is remarkable as the birthplace of John Knox. A rivulet which runs through the parish is also called Gifford His eldest son, William Gifford of Yester, was sent on a mission to England in 1200, and also witnessed several charters of William the Lion In 1244 he was one of the guarantees of a treaty with England His son, Hugh Gifford of Yester, was one of the guardians of Alexander the Third and his queen, and one of the regents of the kingdom appointed by the treaty of Roxburgh, 20th September, 1255 According to the practice of feudal times, he had his own sheriff His castle of Yester was celebrated on account of a capacious cavern, called Bohall (Hobgoblin Hall), which makes a conspicuous figure in Sir Walter Scott's 'Marmion' He died in 1267, leaving three sons, William, Hugh, and James. The two latter swore fealty to Edward the First in 1296 Hugh was the reputed ancestor of the Sheriffs of Sheriffhall in Mid Lothian, a family which, in the person of John Gifford of Sheriffhall, was forfeited by King James the Third, for keeping company with the English, and entertaining the English pursuivant, called Bluemantle.

William Gifford of Yester, the eldest son, was in Stirling castle when it surrendered in 1304, and being sent prisoner to England, was confined in Corfe castle till 15th June 1310 His son, Sir John Gifford of Yester, by marriage with the daughter of Sir Thomas Morham of Morham, obtained the lands of that name With his son, Hugh Gifford of Yester, who was dead before 11th March 1409, the male line failed The latter had, however, four daughters, his coheiresses. 1st, Jean, or Joanna, married Sir William Hay of Locherworth, sheriff of Peebles, ancestor of the marquis of Tweeddale, to whom she brought the barony of Yester, and that family quartered the arms of Gifford with their own 2d, Alice, married Sir Thomas Boyd of Kilmarnock, 3d, Mary, m. Eustace Maxwell of Tealing, 4th, Euphemia, m. Dougal Macdougall of Makerstoun Nisbet mentions a family of the name of Gifford who possessed the lands of Busta in Zetland

GILCHRIST, a surname derived from two Gaelic words, Gille and Criosd, meaning the servant of Christ.

GILCHRIST, EBENEZER, a physician of considerable eminence, was born at Dumfries in 1707 He began the study of medicine at Edinburgh, and completed it at London and Paris. Having obtained the degree of M D. from the university of Rheims, he returned, in 1732, to his native town, where he continued to practise till his death, which took place in 1774 —His works are:

On the use of Sea Voyages, in Medicine. Lond. 1756, 8vo. New edition in 1771. The chief object of this small work is to recommend sea voyages in cases of consumption.

A dissertation on Nervous Fevers. Edin. Medical Essays, iv p. 347 It recommends a liberal use of opium in such cases. Continuation of the same subject. Ib. v p. 505.

GILCHRIST, JOHN BORTHWICK, LL D, an eminent orientalist, was born at Edinburgh in 1759 He was educated in George Heriot's Hospital, to which excellent institution he bequeathed a handsome donation Having studied for the medical profession, he went early to Calcutta as assistant-surgeon in the Hon East India Company's service Perceiving the importance of the Hindostanee in conducting business with the natives, he devoted himself with unremitting ardour and industry to the acquirement of that language, and in an Indian garb travelled through those parts of Hindostan where it is spoken in the greatest purity Nor did he confine his studies to the Hindostanee tongue alone He acquired the Sanscrit, the Persian, and others, and was one of the first Europeans who excited an interest in the languages of India far exceeding what had previously been considered necessary for mere official purposes, or for the government of our vast possessions in the East. In 1787 he published at Calcutta an English and Hindostanic Dictionary, in two parts, which soon became the standard work on the subject, not only in India but at home This was followed by various other introductory works on the languages of Hindostan and Persia.

When the college of Fort-William in Bengal was founded, in 1800, by the Marquis Wellesley, Dr Gilchrist was created professor of the Hindostanee and Persian languages, being the first that had been appointed in India. About the end of 1803, or beginning of 1804, he was compelled from ill health to resign his situation in the college at Fort-William, when he received from the governor-general in council a public letter to the court of directors at home, dated February 29, 1804, recommending him "to the favour and protection of that honourable court, as a proper object of the liberal spirit which the court had always manifested in promoting the study of the oriental languages" In addition to this, the Marquis Wellesley furnished him with the following highly honourable and flattering letter of introduction to Mr Addington, afterwards Lord Sidmouth —"Mr John Gilchrist, late professor of the Hindoostanee language in the college of Fort-William, will have the honour of delivering this letter to you The records of this government furnish ample proof of the importance of Mr Gilchrist's services I am anxious, however, that you shall be apprised of the personal interest which I feel in Mr Gilchrist's honourable reception in England, and I take the liberty of recommending him to your favourable notice, as a gentleman highly distinguished for his zeal in the promotion of an important branch of the public service, and for his eminent knowledge of the Oriental languages" With these and other testimonials, Dr Gilchrist returned in 1804 to Britain, and took up his residence in Edinburgh While he resided in that city, his house, on the north side of Nicolson's Square, was remarkable for the aviary which he had erected upon it, and for the number of rare and curious birds he had collected together At one period, in conjunction with Mr James Inglis, he instituted a bank in Edinburgh, under the name of "Inglis, Borthwick Gilchrist, and Co" They issued notes which, we believe, the other banks refused to take, and after going on for some time, the establishment was at last obliged to be relinquished

In politics Dr Gilchrist was a violent liberal, and took a strong interest in all local matters of public discussion In June 1815, when the announcement of the battle of Waterloo was read aloud in a coffeeroom in Edinburgh where he was, he at once gave the lie to the gentleman who proclaimed the intelligence, and had not the friends of the parties interfered, a duel would have been the consequence.

About the year 1816 he quitted Edinburgh, and settled in London, where he at first taught the oriental languages privately in his own house, but in December 1818, he commenced teaching and lecturing on the Hindostanee, Persian, Persi-Arabic, and other eastern languages, under the auspices and sanction of the Hon East India Company, at the Oriental Institution, Leicester Square In June 1825, he resigned his duties at this establishment, his appointment being only probationary for successive terms of three years During his residence in London he published various oriental works, (the titles of which are given below,) one of the most remarkable of which appeared in 1826, entitled 'The Orienti-Occidental Tuitionary Pioneer,' consisting, chiefly, of his official reports to the court of directors as to the progress of the pupils under his charge, some of which, it must be confessed, are conceived in a very extraordinary style In the latter ones especially, he complained most bitterly of the parsimony and ill-treatment of the Hon Company, on account of the small remuneration allowed him for his services Besides his pension of £300, as a retired surgeon, instead of £500, to which he considered himself entitled, he had a salary of £200 per annum, with £150 for lecture-rooms and other incidental charges From some of his works, however, he must have derived immense profits, and indeed he himself tells us in one of his reports, that he had acquired an ample fortune from his oriental publications, and "from a favourable change in his banking adventures"

During the latter years of his life Dr Gilchrist lived in retirement He died at Paris in January 1841, aged 82 He had married a Miss Mary Ann Coventry, by whom he had no family, and who, in August 1850, married, a second time, at Paris, General Guglielmo Pepe, of the kingdom of Naples Although very eccentric in his way, Dr Gilchrist was truly a good-hearted and benevolent person, and it may be said to his honour, that he never had an opportunity of doing a good action to a fellow-creature without availing himself of it The interest he took in his pupils, and especially in those who showed any indications of genius and application in their studies, was very great, and continued during their subsequent career Since the commencement of his labours vast progress has been made in the knowledge of the literary antiquities and philology of India, which is mainly owing to the impetus that his example and writings gave to the study of the Hindoostanee language and literature in this country

GILFILLAN, a surname, composed of two Gaelic words, signifying servant of Fillan. Who this Fillan was it is impossible to say Ossian makes one Fillan a son of Fingal. Originally the Gilfillans belonged to the Isle of Mull, and were all cut in pieces by a hostile tribe, with the exception of two married women, who made their escape to the mainland, and bore twins each, from which four sprung all the Gilfillans in Scotland. The tradition of all the tribe being slain in the clan wars of ancient times, except one or two married women who were in a condition to perpetuate the race, is common to more Highland septs than the Gilfillans. Persons of the name abound in the parish of Buchlyvie, Stirlingshire.

Two of the name, the Rev George Gilfillan, Dundee, and Robert Gilfillan, song writer, of whom a memoir follows, have acquired considerable literary reputation

The Rev George Gilfillan, celebrated as a critic and popular essayist, was born January 30, 1813, at Comrie, Perthshire, where his father, the Rev Samuel Gilfillan, author of a work on the Sabbath, which went through several editions, and was translated into the French, Dutch, and Russian languages, was minister of the Secession Church He was a native of Buchlyvie, Stirlingshire, and enjoyed extraordinary popularity as a preacher His writings, under the signature of Lenmas, were read over all Scotland, and are mentioned with high praise by Hugh Miller in his 'Schools and Schoolmasters.' He died in 1826, aged 64 George, the youngest child of his parents, was educated at the parish school of his native place, and went to Glasgow College in the end of 1825 He took several prizes, and in 1830 entered the Divinity Hall of the Secession body, (now the United Presbyterian Synod,) and continued there five sessions, being employed in the winter teaching in Edinburgh. In April 1835 he was licensed to preach by the Edinburgh Secession Presbytery, and received a call from Comrie, and one from the Schoolwynd church, Dundee He accepted the latter, and was ordained there in March 1836 In the end of 1839 he published a little book entitled 'Five Discourses,' and in 1842, a Discourse, entitled 'Hades, or the Unseen,' which reached a third edition He early discovered a taste for literature, and wrote a series of literary portraits in the 'Dumfries Herald,' which he afterwards collected and enlarged, and published, separately, in 1845, under the title of 'A Gallery of Literary Portraits,' which was very successful, and in 1860 had reached its 4th edition In 1849 he issued a Second 'Gallery,' and in 1850 'The Bards of the Bible.' In 1851, amongst many other prefaces, he wrote 'Preface to Book of British Poesy' In 1852 he published a work, entitled the 'Martyrs, Heroes, and Bards of the Scottish Covenant,' which, like his other works, sold well, and in 1853 a little religious treatise on the Fatherhood of God In 1854 a third 'Gallery of Literary Portraits' appeared, in 1856 his 'History of a Man,' in 1857 his most elaborate work 'Christianity and our Era,' and in 1860 his Alpha and Omega,' in 2 vols. In 1853 he commenced an edition of the 'British Poets,' published by Nichol of Edinburgh, which has extended to 48 vols. His contributions to periodicals, such as the 'British Quarterly,' the 'Eclectic Review,' 'Tait's Magazine,' 'Hogg's Instructor,' 'Titan,' 'The Scottish Review,' &c. have been numerous. In 1860 he made a tour in Sweden, and his sketches of that country inserted in 'The Scottish Review,' a Glasgow publication, were full of interest. As a lecturer he has at various times appeared in most of the large towns of Scotland and England, and for a long time no name was more prominent than his in current periodical literature. In the pulpit he is distinguished as an earnest, impressive, and fervid preacher Referring to the connection of the discharge of clerical duty with attention to literary pursuits, he says in his 'History of a Man,' "In my own humble way I have sincerely and conscientiously sought to unite and harmonize literature and the duties of a clergyman, and, however imperfectly I may have succeeded, I do not regret the attempt, since I believe it has, in some instances, made my voice be heard with greater deference, first, when I spoke to Christians of the glories of genius and the charms of literature, and far more when I spoke to young lovers of literature, of the superior claims and infinitely higher merits of the Book of God."

The minor lyrical poet, Robert Gilfillan, was born in Dunfermline, on 7th July 1798. His father was a manufacturer in a small way, having a few weavers working under him A second cousin of his is believed to have been the author of the song entitled 'The Braes aboon Bonaw,' who in early life went abroad and died soon after Robert's mother, Marion, was the daughter of Henry Law, also a small manufacturer in Dunfermline. He was the second of three sons. There was also one daughter, Margaret. In a letter to Mr George Farquhar Graham, editor of 'Wood's Songs of Scotland,' dated 14th March 1848, he gives the following account of his family "My great-grandfather," he says, "rented a small farm in Stirlingshire. His only son, Robert, my grandfather, chose the sea-life as a profession, and became captain of a merchant vessel, trading to foreign parts. In one of his voyages his ship was captured by a Spanish privateer, but while the Spaniards were below, rummaging his papers and cargo, he, with great promptitude, ordered the hatches to be nailed down and placing himself with loaded pistols on the cabin stair, declared that the first who made his appearance was a dead man! At the same time he directed both ships to make sail for England, standing twenty-four hours as sentry over his double prize, both of which he carried safely into a British port. For this act of bravery he was recommended to government, but merit, eighty years ago, was tardily rewarded A change of ministers took place, and my poor grandfather's claims fell to the ground. He is buried in Torryburn churchyard, where a massive stone covers his humble grave. My father wrote occasional verses on local subjects, all above mediocrity, but, with less vanity than his son, none of them were ever published" He received the rudiments of his education at a school in his native place, and in 1811, while only 13 years of age, his parents removed to Leith, where he had an uncle in good circumstances. In that town he was apprenticed to the cooper trade, and served the usual term of seven years. In 1818 he returned to Dunfermline, where he was employed for three years as manager of a grocery shop He then returned to Leith and obtained employment as a clerk in the warehouse of a firm of oil and colour merchants He was afterwards engaged as confidential clerk to a wine merchant of the same town In 1837 he was appointed collector of the police rates at Leith, the duties of which office he continued to discharge during the remainder of his life On St Andrew's day (30th November) of the same year he was, on the motion of Sir Thomas Dick Lauder, baronet, elected Grand Bard to the Grand Lodge of Free Masons in Scotland, an office originally created for and filled by Robert Burns. In April 1850 he originated a subscription to defray the expense of repairing the monument to the memory of Robert Fergusson, erected by Burns in the Canongate churchyard. Mr Gilfillan died on the 4th of the following December (1850), aged 52, having the previous day been attacked by apoplexy His remains were interred in South Leith churchyard, where a monument was soon after erected to his memory He was never married His attachment to his relatives, particularly to his mother and sister, was intense, and his niece, Miss Mary Marion Law Gilfillan, the daughter of his brother James, constantly resided with him, from her childhood till his death He claimed to be a second cousin of the Rev George Gilfillan, although their connexion could never be traced

Mr Gilfillan first attempted song-writing while still in his apprenticeship. His earliest printed pieces appeared in a Dundee paper, and they at once attracted attention for their genuine Scottish feeling, truthfulness of sentiment, and fine illustrations of home and the domestic affections. In 1828 he wrote no less than twenty-two songs, among these was 'Peter M'Craw,' one of the most humorous satires in Scottish verse Encouraged by the popularity of such of his songs as had been singly published, and by the occasional favourable notice of his name in the 'Noctes Ambrosianæ' of Blackwood's Magazine, he produced in 1831 a volume of about 150 pages, entitled 'Original Songs,' which he dedicated to Allan Cunningham In 1835 he published an enlarged edition of his songs, with fifty additional pieces. Soon after the publication of this volume he was entertained at a public dinner by about eighty gentlemen in the Royal Exchange Coffee house Edinburgh, when a splendid silver cup was presented to him, in token of their high estimation of his poetical talents and private worth On this occasion, Mr Peter M'Leod, the composer of the music of some of his finest songs was chairman In 1839 a third and larger collection of his songs appeared Soon after his death a fourth edition of his songs was published with a memoir by the author of this work, and a supplement of his latest poems.

GILLESPIE, George, a learned and faithful divine of the Church of Scotland, son of the Rev John Gillespie, minister at Kirkcaldy, was born January 21, 1613 At the university he surpassed most of his fellow-students in acquirements, and having been licensed to preach the gospel, became, about 1634, chaplain to the Viscount Kenmure, and afterwards to the family of the earl of Cassillis During the time he remained with the latter, he wrote his famous 'Dispute against the English Popish Ceremonies, obtruded upon the Church of Scotland,' meaning the Episcopal innovations of Charles the First, which was published in 1637, and prohibited by the bishops soon after In April 1638 he was ordained minister of Wemyss in Fife, when he began publicly to distinguish himself by his advocacy and defence of Presbyterianism and the Covenant In the memorable Assembly held at Glasgow in the ensuing November, Mr Gillespie preached one of the daily sermons, choosing for his text Prov xxi 1 "The king's heart is in the hand of the Lord" In this discourse he spoke out very boldly, and the earl of Argyle, thinking that he had encroached too nearly on the royal prerogative, warned the Assembly against similar language in future, which, we are told, was taken in good part At the General Assembly held at Edinburgh in 1641, a call in favour of Mr Gillespie was read from Aberdeen; but, at his own request, he was allowed to remain at Wemyss. On Sunday, the 12th September of that year, he preached before the king in the Abbey church at Edinburgh

In 1642, he was translated by the General Assembly to Edinburgh, of which city he continued to be one of the ministers till his death In 1643, he was one of the four commissioners sent from the Church of Scotland to the Assembly of Divines at Westminster, where his knowledge, zeal, and judgment enabled him to give essential assistance in preparing the Catechisms, the Directory for Worship, the Confession of Faith, and other standards of the Scottish Church At a meeting of the parliament and the assembly of divines, he ably refuted a long and elaborate speech made in favour of Erastianism by one of those present, and that without taking notes of the arguments of his opponent After his return from Westminster, he was employed in most of the affairs of the church, and in 1648 was chosen moderator of the General Assembly He was also one of those appointed to conduct the treaty of uniformity in religion with England, but his last illness seized him soon after, and, for the benefit of his health, he went with his wife to Kirkcaldy, where he died December 16, 1648

We learn from Wodrow's Analecta, that six volumes of manuscript which Mr Gillespie composed during his attendance at the Westminster Assembly, were extant in 1707 He had also, while in England, prepared his Sermons for publication, but these were suppressed in the hands of the printer, through the jealousy of the Independents Four days after his death the committee of Estates testified the public sense of his great merits and usefulness by voting to his widow and children £1,000, which was ratified by act of parliament, June 8, 1650, but which, owing to the confusion and distraction of the times, his family never received

GILLESPIE, THOMAS, The Rev, founder of the Synod of Relief, the son of a farmer and brewer, was born at Clearburn, in the parish of Duddingstone, near Edinburgh, in 1708. When he was little more than twenty years of age he commenced his studies for the ministry at the university of Edinburgh Previous to this period he had lost his father, and his mother having, on the origin of the Secession, joined that body, by her advice he went to Perth to attend the lectures of Mr Wilson, their first professor of divinity Disapproving, however, of the principles on which the Seceders were acting, he did not remain longer in that city than ten days, and proceeding to England, he pursued his studies at the Theological Academy in Northampton, at that time superintended by the celebrated Dr Philip Doddridge. He was licensed to preach the gospel October 30, 1740, by a respectable body of English Dissenters, Dr Doddridge presiding on the occasion as moderator, and ordained to the work of the ministry January 22, 1741 He officiated, for a short time, as minister of a dissenting congregation in the north of England, but returned to Scotland in March following, and being soon after presented by Mr Erskine to the parish of Carnock, near Dunfermline, to which he had received a call, he was inducted by the presbytery of Dunfermline, as if he had been a regularly ordained minister of the church At his admission, he objected to the doctrine of the Confession of Faith respecting the power of the civil magistrate in matters of religion, and was allowed to subscribe it with an explanation of his meaning. He continued minister of Carnock for eleven years, during all which time he was wholly attentive to his pastoral duties, and took no conspicuous part in the discussions of the church courts

Owing to the grievous and unpopular operation of the law of patronage, which had already produced the Secession, the evangelical party, though in those days the minority in the church, lost no opportunity of protesting against violent settlements, and of maintaining the constitutional right of the people to have a voice in the election of their minister, and cases occurred of whole presbyteries refusing to be instrumental in forcing unacceptable presentees on reclaiming parishes In 1751 Mr Andrew Richardson, minister of Broughton, near Biggar, was presented by the patron to the church of Inverkeithing, and his settlement being opposed by the parishioners, not only the presbytery of Dunfermline, but the synod of Fife, refused to obey an order of the commission of Assembly to proceed with his induction In consequence of which the Assembly of 1752 appointed the presbytery of Dunfermline to meet at Inverkeithing, during the sitting of the Assembly, to induct Mr Richardson, enjoining every member to be present on the occasion, and to report proceedings at the bar the day after Only three members of the presbytery attended, and that number not being sufficient to constitute a quorum, nothing of course was done, and the Assembly proceeded to punish the six members of the presbytery who had disobeyed their injunctions Notwithstanding of a representation given in by them to the Assembly, pleading conscientious scruples as the reason why they had not attended, the Assembly decided by vote that one of them should be deposed from the holy ministry, while the rest should be censured and provisionally suspended By a majority, Mr Gillespie was the one chosen for deposition, and with the meekness which belonged to his character, he heard the sentence pronounced which cast him forth of the Church of Scotland for ever He replied to the sentence of deposition in the following solemn words "Moderator, I desire to receive this sentence of the General Assembly of the Church of Scotland with real concern, and awful impressions of the divine conduct in it; but I rejoice that to me it is given, in behalf of Christ, not only to believe on him, but also to suffer for his sake."

On the following Sabbath Mr Gillespie, whose fate was universally commiserated, preached to his people in the fields at Carnock, choosing for his text the very appropriate declaration of St. Paul, "For necessity is laid upon me, yea, woe is unto me if I preach not the gospel" A church having been provided for him at Dunfermline, he formed there the first Relief congregation Five years later Mr Thomas Boston, son of the author of the 'Fourfold State,' resigned his charge of the parish of Oxnam, and the people of Jedburgh having built a church for him, he became their minister in December 1757, when, quitting the Church of Scotland, he immediately joined Mr Gillespie These two ministers, with the Rev Thomas Collier, who was admitted pastor of a new Relief congregation at Colinsburgh in Fife, on October 22, 1761, formed themselves, upon that occasion, into a presbytery for the relief of the Christian people from what the great body of the Scottish nation have all along styled "the yoke of patronage" In 1847 the Relief Synod was joined with the United Associate Synod, and formed one body under the name of the United Presbyterian Church Mr Gillespie died January 19, 1774 He left in MS about 800 sermons He was the author of,

Essay on the Continuance of Immediate Revelations of Facts and Future Events in the Christian Church 1774

Treatise on Temptation —To this and the preceding work prefaces were written by Dr John Erskine of Edinburgh 1774

His Correspondence with President Edwards has been inserted in the Quarterly Magazine, edited by Dr Stuart, Dr Erskine's son-in-law

GILLESPIE, William, The Rev, author of 'Consolation, and other Poems,' eldest son of the Rev John Gillespie, minister of Kells in Galloway, was born in the manse of that parish, February 18, 1776, and received the rudiments of education at the parish school In 1792 he went to the university of Edinburgh to study for the church, and was appointed tutor to Mr, afterwards Sir Alexander, Don, baronet Having been duly licensed as a preacher, he was, in 1801, ordained assistant and successor to his father, on whose death, in 1806, he became sole minister of Kells In 1805 he published 'The Progress of

Refinement, an allegorical Poem;' and in 1815, 'Consolation, and other Poems;' but neither of these works evinced much poetical genius, and their sale was but limited In July 1825 he married Miss Charlotte Hoggan, and soon after was seized with erysipelas, which terminated in general inflammation, and caused his death October 15 of that year, in the fiftieth year of his age Besides communicating information to the Highland Society, of which he was a zealous and useful member, Mr Gillespie occasionally furnished papers to various periodicals, and among other valuable contributions to literature, he wrote an elegant and affecting account of John Lowe, author of 'Mary's Dream,' for Cromek's Remains of Nithsdale and Galloway Song

GILLIES, a surname evidently the plural of the Gaelic Gillie, a servant or henchman Mr Lower (Essays on English Surnames, vol i p 168) fancifully but erroneously derives it from the baptismal name of Giles.

Adam Gillies, a lord of session under the title of Lord Gillies, was the youngest son of Robert Gillies, Esq of Little Keithock, Forfarshire, and the junior, by twenty-one years, of his brother, Dr John Gillies, the historian of Greece, of whom a memoir is given below in larger type. Born at Brechin in 1766, he passed advocate, 14th July 1787, and was appointed sheriff-depute of Kincardineshire on 26th March, 1806. He was raised to the bench of the court of session on 30th November 1811 Opposed as he was to the party then in power, being a Whig in politics, he owed his appointment entirely to his legal knowledge and eminence at the bar In 1812 he was made a lord of justiciary, and on 10th July 1816, he was nominated one of the lords commissioners of the jury court. In 1837 he was appointed judge of the court of Exchequer in Scotland, when he resigned his seat as a lord of justiciary He died 24th December, 1842

GILLIES, JOHN, D D, an eminent divine of the Church of Scotland, author of the Life of Whitfield and several theological works, was born in 1712 He was the son of the Rev John Gillies, minister of Caraldstone (now Carriston), in the presbytery of Brechin, and of Mrs Mary Watson, his wife, descended from a respectable family in Galloway Little is known of his early history. When a student of divinity, he was successively employed as a tutor in several families of distinction He was ordained one of the ministers of Glasgow, July 29, 1742 Though greatly addicted to literary pursuits, he did not permit them to encroach upon his ministerial or other duties One of his most favourite books was Milton's 'Paradise Lost,' the greater part of which he could repeat by heart

Besides generally delivering three discourses every Sabbath, several years of Dr. Gillies' life were distinguished by his instituting public lectures and serious exhortations, twice and often thrice every week For some time he published a religious weekly paper, addressed to the consciences and hearts of his people, which was productive of much good in awakening the attention of many to what concerned their spiritual welfare Having been fifty-four years minister of one church, he had baptized and married the larger portion of his congregation He died March 29, 1796 He was twice married first, to Elizabeth, eldest daughter of the Rev John M'Laurin of Glasgow, who died soon after the birth of her eighth child, August 6, 1754, and, secondly, to Joanna, youngest daughter of John Stewart, Esq, and twin sister of Sir Michael Stewart of Blackhall, baronet Their only child, Rebecca, was married to the Hon Colonel David Leslie, second son of the earl of Leven A brief sketch of Dr Gillies' life and character, drawn up by his friend, Dr Erskine, of Old Greyfriars parish, Edinburgh, will be found inserted in the Supplement to Dr Gillies' 'Historical Collections,' edited and published by Dr Erskine in 1796

GILLIES, JOHN, LL D, an eminent historian, and king's "Historiographer for Scotland," son of Robert Gillies, Esq of Little Keithock, Forfarshire, and elder brother of Lord Gillies, a lord of session, mentioned above, was born at Brechin, Forfarshire, on January 18, 1747 He received his education at the university of Glasgow, where he was patronized by Principal Leechman and Professor Moore, from the latter of whom he is believed to have imbibed his admiration of Greek learning, and his knowledge of Greek literature. While yet under twenty years of age, he was chosen to teach the Greek class, on the illness and decline of the then aged professor of Greek in that university. He soon, however, resigned that appointment, and went to London, with the view of making literature his sole pursuit In furtherance of this object, he spent some time at Paris and other parts of the continent, in acquiring facility in the modern languages Soon after his return, being yet a young man, John, the second earl of Hopetoun, to whom he had been introduced by his eldest son, Lord Hope, (afterwards third earl of Hopetoun) invited him to travel with his second son, Henry, and, as he was induced, for that purpose, to relinquish some honourable and lucrative literary engagements, his lordship settled upon him, in 1777, an annuity for life

His young charge, Henry Hope, having died at Lyons, Mr Gillies returned home, and in a few years went again to the continent with the earl's younger sons, John, afterwards the celebrated military commander, Sir John Hope, Baron Niddry, and earl of Hopetoun, and Alexander, afterwards Sir Alexander Hope, G C B, lieutenant-governor of Chelsea Hospital Mr Gillies returned to England with his companions in 1784, when he resumed his literary labours, and took his degree of LL D, previously to the publication of the first part of his 'History of Ancient Greece,' which appeared in 1786, and immediately became a standard work In 1792 he married, and the following year, on the death of his friend Dr Robertson, Dr Gillies was appointed Historiographer to the King for Scotland He died at Clapham, February 5, 1836, in the 90th year of his age He was F R S, F A S, and a member of many foreign societies

Gilmour, (Anglicé, Gilmore) a surname derived from the Gaelic, gille-mhor, great servant, being the designation of the henchman or follower of a Highland chief The family of Gilmour of Craigmillar, Mid Lothian, carried in their armorial bearings three writing pens, with, as crest, a dexter hand holding a scroll of paper, and the motto Nil penna, sed usus, to indicate that their rise was from being writers or lawyers. They acquired in 1661, the castle of Craigmillar, celebrated as the residence of Mary queen of Scots on her return from France a hundred years before John Gilmour, an eminent writer to the signet of the early part of the seventeenth century, had a son, Sir John Gilmour, who became lord president of the court of session, and continued in that office for ten years. Having passed advocate on 12th December 1628, he was, in 1641, appointed by the Estates of parliament one of the counsel to the earl of Montrose, and conducted himself so much to the satisfaction of the royalist party that he obtained, through their means, a very extensive practice at the bar On 13th February 1661, he was nominated by the king lord president of the court of session, which court, after an interruption of nearly eleven years, resumed its sittings on the 1st June following As president he received a yearly pension of £500 At the same time he was appointed a privy councillor, and one of the lords of Exchequer Chosen one of the commissioners for the shire of Edinburgh, in the parliament of 1661, he continued to represent that county till his death, acting all the time as one of the lords of the articles. Although he had always favoured the king's side, he distinguished himself by his opposition to the arbitrary proceedings of the first "terrible parliament," as it is well named by Kirkton, of Charles the Second He obtained the insertion of a clause in the militia act, that the kingdom should not be obliged to maintain any force levied by the king otherwise than as it should be agreed by parliament, or a convention of estates. When the marquis of Argyle was brought to trial before the same parliament, Sir John Gilmour made an attempt to save him by declaring that, after paying all the attention in his power to the case, he could find nothing proved against him but what the greater part of the house was as deeply involved in as he On this the commissioner, the earl of Middleton, rose and observed that what Sir John had said was very true, but that the king might pitch upon whom he pleased to make an example of [Wodrow's Analecta, printed for the Maitland Club, vol ii p 145]

Sir John Gilmour seems to have belonged to the party of Lauderdale, and by that statesman was made instrumental in procuring the fall of Middleton in 1663 In the following year he was appointed a member of the high commission court, and vainly endeavoured to moderate the violence of the prelates who ruled there. He is said to have refused to vote, as a privy councillor, for the capital prosecution of the insurgents taken at Pentland, and promised quarter; but signed the more objectionable opinion of the court of session that it was lawful to pronounce sentence of forfeiture against the absent, provided they had been cited to appear. In consequence of infirmity and weakness, he resigned the lord president's chair on 22d December 1670, and died in 1671. He reported the decisions of the court from July 1661 till July 1666. Subjoined is his portrait, from a print in Smith's Iconographia Scotica, engraved from a painting by Old Scougal.

Sir John Gilmour's character as a pleader has been drawn by Sir George Mackenzie in his famous book of forensic eloquence entitled 'Idea Eloquentiæ Forensis.'

Sir Alexander Gilmour of Craigmillar was created a baronet in 1668. His son, Sir Alexander Gilmour, second baronet, born 6th December 1657, married the Hon. Grizel Ross, daughter of the eleventh Lord Ross, and died in October 1731. With several daughters, he had a son, Sir Charles Gilmour, third baronet, who was elected M.P. for the county of Edinburgh in 1737. He died at Montpellier, 9th August, 1750. His son Sir Alexander Gilmour fourth baronet, an officer in the foot guards, was M.P. for Mid Lothian from 1761 to 1774. In 1765 he was appointed one of the clerks comptrollers of the board of green cloth. He died unmarried in France, 27th December, 1792, when the baronetcy became extinct, and the estate of Craigmillar devolved upon William Charles Little of Liberton also in the county of Edinburgh who thereupon assumed the additional name of Gilmour. This gentleman was grandson of Helen Gilmour, eldest daughter of Sir Alexander Gilmour, the second baronet and the Hon. Grizel Ross, his wife. She had married William Little of Liberton, and their only child, Grizel Little becoming the wife of her cousin, Walter Little of Liberton, had an only son, the said William Charles Little Gilmour of Craigmillar and Liberton, who died 1st October 1797, aged 66. He had five sons and three daughters. The eldest son, Walter Little Gilmour of Craigmillar and Liberton, married, 6th July, 1805, Miss James Anne Macdowal, heiress of Canonmills, near Edinburgh, and died 1st April 1807. With a daughter, Jane, born 29th April, 1806, he had a posthumous son, Walter James Little Gilmour of Craigmillar and Liberton, born 24th April, 1807.

Lieutenant-general Sir Dugald Little Gilmour, of Stonehouse, Stirlingshire, the youngest of the five sons of Mr William Charles Little Gilmour of Craigmillar and Liberton above mentioned, was major of the 95th regiment of foot, or Rifle corps, which he commanded in Lord Wellington's last campaign in Portugal, with the rank of lieutenant-colonel in the army.

GLADSTONE, a surname originally Gladstanes, and derived from the estate of that name in Teviotdale. The Gladstanes of that ilk, previously designed of Cocklaw, were a pretty ancient family, as is proved by charters still extant. In one, granted by Robert the Third, of several lands to William Inglis of Manners, the right of Gladstanes of Cocklaw is reserved. George Gladstanes and William Gladstanes are witnesses in a charter of Archibald, earl of Angus, to his apparent heir, James Douglas, July 2, 1479. Nisbet mentions some charters of the Gladstanes' family about the same period. [Nisbet's Heraldry, vol. i. p. 267.]

Mr John Gladstanes, LL.D., supposed to have belonged to the family of Gladstanes of Gladstanes, was admitted a lord of session, 30th January 1542. From several instances being recorded of gifts and appointments made to him, with the view of increasing his emoluments, it would appear that he was by no means rich. While at the bar, he was, in March 1545, selected by the lords of session, with "Master Thomas Marjoribanks," to be advocate for the poor, on a letter from the king, enjoining them to choose a man of "gude conscience" for that office, under the title of Advocatus Pauperum. On the 3d September 1546, four years after being raised to the bench, he was appointed collector of the contributions due by the prelates, for the supply of the court, when he was designed "licentiate in baith the lawis." It does not appear that he adopted any judicial title, but in a roll of the judges made up on 19th January 1555, he is styled "My lord Doctor Mr Jo. Gladstanes." On 21st May 1557, he obtained a gift from the court, of the arrears of the contribution due by the minister of Failfurd, who was superior of the Trinity or Red Friars.

George Gladstanes, a native of Dundee, was, in 1600 made bishop of Caithness by James the Sixth, and in 1606 was translated thence to the archbishopric of St. Andrews. He had previously been minister of Arbirlot in Forfarshire, and in 1597 was removed to be minister at St Andrews, of the university of which city he was, in 1599, appointed vice-chancellor. In 1604, while bishop of Caithness, he was named a commissioner for promoting the union of the two kingdoms, a favourite project of James the Sixth after his accession to the English throne, but which at that time proved abortive. Archbishop Gladstanes, whose name often occurs in the ecclesiastical records of the period, died 2d May 1615. His son Mr Alexander Gladstanes, was archdean of St. Andrews.

Claiming descent from the ancient family of Gladstanes of Gladstanes, Mr John Gladstones of Toftcombes, near Biggar, in the upper ward of Lanarkshire, had by his wife Janet Aitken, a son, Thomas, a prosperous trader in Leith, who married Helen, daughter of Mr Walter Neilson of Springfield, and died in the year 1809 Of this marriage, Sir John Gladstone, the first baronet, of Fasque, was the eldest son Born at Leith on the 11th of Dec. 1764, he commenced business there at an early age, but soon removed to Liverpool, where he amassed considerable riches by his enterprise, industry, and skill, and was munificent in their disposal In 1840, he built and endowed St. Thomas' church at Leith, in communion with the Church of Scotland. He also built on the same spot—in the neighbourhood of the Coal Hill, where his father had his place of trade—a school, and an asylum with a revenue of £300 a-year for the support of ten females labouring under incurable diseases. When carrying on business in Liverpool—from which he retired in 1813—he was a liberal donor to the Church of England, and on returning to Scotland, he became a not less liberal benefactor to the Scottish Episcopal church His gifts to Trinity college, Glenalmond, were princely, he contributed largely to the fund for endowing the bishopric of Brechin, and at his own charge he built and endowed a church—making his place of sepulture within its walls—at his beautiful seat of Fasque in Kincardineshire, which he had purchased He likewise built two churches in Liverpool, and one in the immediate neighbourhood where he had long resided

In February 1835 he obtained the royal license to drop the final s at his name, and to change it to Gladstone His eminent position as a merchant, together with his great talents and experience, gave much weight to his opinions on commercial matters. He was frequently consulted on such subjects by the ministers of the day, and was the author of several pamphlets and letters to the newspapers on mercantile questions. He was almost to the last a supporter of the protective policy which reigned supreme during his youth and manhood, and three or four years before his death he wrote against the repeal of the corn and navigation laws. Desire was more than once expressed to see him in parliament, and he contested the representation of Dundee and other places on those conservative principles to which he adhered through life, but without success. On the 27th of June, 1846, he was created a baronet, on the spontaneous suggestion of Sir Robert Peel, then Premier, and his was one of the very few baronetcies conferred by a minister more than commonly frugal in the grant of titles. He was a magistrate both for Lancashire and Kincardineshire He died in December 1851

Sir John Gladstone was twice married first, in 1792, to Jane, daughter of Mr Joseph Hall of Liverpool, who died in 1798, without issue, and, secondly, on 29th April 1800, to Anne, daughter of Mr Andrew Robertson, for many years provost of Dingwall By this lady, who died on 23d September 1835, he had, with two daughters, four sons, namely, Thomas, second baronet, Robertson Gladstone, born in 1805, an eminent merchant of Liverpool, and chairman of the Financial Reform Association of that town, married, with issue, John Neilson Gladstone, born in 1807, a commander R.N, M P for Walsall and subsequently for Devizes, married, with issue, and the Right Hon William Ewart Gladstone, born in 1809, was educated at Eton and at Christ church, Oxford, where he attained a double first class in 1831, and received the honorary degree of D C L. in 1848 In 1832 he was elected M P for Newark, which place he represented till January 1846 He was a lord of the treasury in December 1834, and under secretary for the colonies from January to April 1835 In September 1841, he was appointed vice-president of the board of trade and master of the mint, and sworn a privy councillor In May 1843, he became president of the board of trade, retaining the mastership of the mint, but resigned both offices in February 1845 In December of that year he was appointed secretary of state for the colonies, which office he held till July 1846 Elected in 1847 M P for the university of Oxford, chancellor of the Exchequer, Dec. 1852 till Feb 1855 In 1858 lord-high-commissioner extraordinary to the Ionian islands, in June 1859 re appointed chancellor of the Exchequer The same year he was elected Rector of the University of Edinburgh He m. in 1839 the eldest dr of Sir Stephen R. Glynn Bart of Hawarden castle Flintshire, with issue Author of 'The State in its relation with the Church,' London 1838, 8vo. Church Principles considered in their results,' London, 1840 8vo 'A Manual of Prayers from the Liturgy,' 1845 'An examination of the official Reply to the Neapolitan government,' 1852 'Studies on Homer and the Homeric age' Oxford, 1858, and several political and official papers, letters, and addresses.

The eldest son, Sir Thomas, 2d baronet, born at Annfield near Liverpool, in 1804, was M P for Queensborough in 1830, for Portarlington from 1832 to 1835, for Leicester from 1835 to 1838, and for Ipswich from June 1842 to August in the same year, when he was unseated on petition A deputy lieutenant of Kincardineshire He m. in 1835, Louisa, daughter of Robert Fellowes, Esq of Shottisham Park, Norfolk, with issue Heir, his son, John Robert, born in 1852

GLAMIS, Lord, see LYON, surname of, vol II

GLAS, JOHN, Rev, founder of the sect of Glasites, son of Rev Alexander Glas, of a Stirling family, was born at Auchtermuchty, Fifeshire, Sept 21, 1698 He was educated at Kinclaven, Perthshire, to which parish his father was translated from Auchtermuchty, in 1697, and at the grammar school of Perth He studied at the universities of St Andrews and Edinburgh Ordained minister of Tealing, near Dundee, he soon became a popular preacher, but maintaining principles directly contrary to the standards of the established church, he laid himself open to the notice and censure of the ecclesiastical courts In 1727 he published a treatise, entitled 'The Testimony of the King of Martyrs,' the object of which was to prove that a state establishment of religion is inconsistent with Christianity For this and other errors he was deposed by the synod of Angus and Mearns on April 12, 1728 Removing to Dundee, he formed there the first congregation of his peculiar sect, from him called Glasites, and afterwards in England styled Sandemanians, from Mr Glas' son-in-law, Mr Robert Sandeman who adopted his doctrines to a modified extent

In 1733 Mr Glas left Dundee and went to Perth, where he erected a chapel, and formed a small congregation, which he styled a church, it being one of his favourite notions that every separate meeting of worshipping Christians constitutes a church within itself. In 1739 the General Assembly, among other strange acts, removed the sentence of deposition passed against him, so far as to restore him to his status as a minister of the gospel, though not to that of a minister of the Church of Scotland, until he should have made a solemn renunciation of the peculiar doctrines which he held But as he was sincere in his opinions, he maintained and advocated them to the last. He wrote a great number of controversial tracts, which were published at Edinburgh, in 1762, in 4 vols 8vo Mr Glas died at Dundee, in 1773, aged 75 By his wife, Catharine Black, a daughter of the Rev Mr Black of Perth, he had fifteen children, all of whom he survived One of his sons, Thomas, who was a bookseller in Dundee, became pastor of the congregation which his father had first formed there, but died in the prime of life of a fever Either Thomas, or a brother of his, who died in early youth, wrote 'The River Tay, a Fragment'

GLAS, JOHN, called also GEORGE, an enterprising but unfortunate mariner, son of the preceding, was born at Dundee in 1725 He was educated for the medical profession, and went several voyages to the West Indies in the capacity of surgeon; but afterwards became captain of a merchant vessel belonging to London, and was employed in the trade to the Brazils He wrote, in one volume 4to, an interesting 'Description of Teneriffe, with the Manners and Customs of the Portuguese settled there,' which was published by Dodsley in 1764 Being engaged by a company in London to attempt forming a settlement on the coast of Africa, he went out, taking with him his wife and daughter, but soon after his arrival he was seized by the Spaniards, while his men were murdered, and his vessel plundered of all that it contained He was kept a prisoner for some time, but at last he contrived, by concealing a note written in pencil, in a loaf of bread, to communicate his situation to the British consul, who immediately interfered, when he obtained his liberty In 1765 he set sail with his wife and daughter on their return to England On board the vessel which he commanded, all his property was embarked, as well as a considerable amount of specie; which induced four of the crew to enter into a conspiracy to seize the ship They put their design in execution as they came in sight of the coast of Ireland Hearing a noise on deck, Captain Glas hastened up from the cabin, but was stabbed in the back by one of the mutineers, who was lurking below, and almost immediately expired Mrs. Glas and her daughter implored mercy in vain, they were thrown overboard locked in each other's arms. Besides these, the mate, one seaman, and two boys, lost their lives. The villains then loaded one of the boats with the money chests, and having sunk the ship, landed at Ross, but being soon after apprehended, they confessed the crime, and were accordingly executed in October 1765

GLASGOW, Earl of, a title in the peerage of Scotland, conferred in 1703, on David Boyle of Kelburne, Ayrshire, whose ancestor, Richard Boyle (see BOYLE, surname of, vol. i p. 375), married Marjory, daughter of Sir Robert Comyn of Rowallan, and his direct male descendant in the sixth generation, John Boyle, a faithful adherent of King James the Third, lost his life at the battle of Sauchieburn in 1488. The son of the latter, John, obtained from King James the Fourth, in the third year of his reign, a precept for the restitution of the lands forfeited by his father for his adherence to James the Third. He lived to a great age, and had an exemption from King James the Fifth, excusing him from attending the royal army in time of war He married Agnes, daughter of the family of Ross of Hawkhead, in the shire of Renfrew, killed at Flodden in 1513, and in 1549 was succeeded by his eldest son, John, who in 1536, in his father's lifetime, got a charter of the lands of Ballehewin, in the isle of Cumbrae, and the same year was made hereditary coroner of that island. Of two sons, David, the elder, predeceased him, leaving a son, and John, of Halkshill, whose great-grandson married the heiress of Kelburne, and carried on the line of the family

David's son, John Boyle, succeeded his grandfather He had a son, also named John, who adhered firmly to the interest of Queen Mary, and died in 1610 His son, John Boyle, of Kelburne, was in 1630 one of the commissioners for revising the practice of the law of Scotland For his faithful adherence to the king, during the civil wars, he suffered ten years' banishment, and many hardships, had died in 1672. He married Agnes, only daughter of Sir John Maxwell of Pollock, and had an only daughter, Grizel, his sole heiress, who became the wife of her cousin, David Boyle of Halkshill, and had three sons and one daughter His eldest son, John Boyle of Kelburne, was chosen member for the shire of Bute in the parliament of 1681 In 1684 he was one of the tacksmen of the excise, and died 7th October 1685. He had, with a daughter, two sons David, first earl of Glasgow, and William, appointed one of the commissioners of the customs in Scotland in 1707

David, his elder son, was member of parliament for Bute in the convention parliament of 1689 sworn a privy councillor, 8th June 1697; and created a peer, by the title of Lord Boyle of Kelburne, Stewarton, Cumbrae, Largs, and Dalry, 31st January 1699 On 2d January 1703, he was appointed treasurer-depute, and on 12th April following, created earl of Glasgow, viscount of Kelburne, and Lord Boyle of Fenwick, by patent, to him and his heirs male whatsoever He steadily supported the protestant succession, and was one of the commissioners for the treaty of union In 1706 he was appointed lord-high-commissioner to the General Assembly of the Church of Scotland, and filled that high office for four successive years afterwards. He was one of the sixteen representative peers of Scotland chosen by parliament, 18th February 1707, and rechosen at the general election in 1708. Constituted the same year lord-register of Scotland, he held that office till 1714 On the alarm of invasion by the Pretender in July 1715, observing that there were few regular troops in Scotland, his lordship not only made an offer to George the First to maintain a thousand men at his own expense, for the service of government, but took an active part in promoting the arming and disciplining of the fencible men in Ayrshire. He died 1st November, 1733 By his first wife, Margaret, eldest daughter of Patrick Crawford of Kilburny, (sister of the first Viscount Garnock,) he had four sons, namely, John, second earl, Patrick, of Shewalton, passed advocate 15th January, 1712, and made a lord of session 19th December 1746, when he took the title of Lord Shewalton, and on 6th June 1749, was appointed by patent one of the commissioners for improving the fisheries and manufactures of Scotland, died, unmarried, at Drumlanrig, 31st March, 1761, the two younger sons also died unmarried. By his second wife, Jean, daughter and heiress of William Mure of Rowallan, in Ayrshire, he had two daughters, the elder of whom, Lady Jean Boyle, heiress of Rowallan, married to the gallant Sir James Campbell, K B, killed at Fontenoy in 1745, was the mother of the fifth earl of Loudon (see LOUDOUN, Earl of).

John, second earl of Glasgow, died at Kelburne, in May 1740, in his 53d year He had three sons and six daughters. The eldest son, William, died young. The second son, John, became third earl The third son, the Hon Patrick Boyle of Shewalton, who died at Irvine, 26th February 1798, was, by his second wife, Elizabeth, daughter of Alexander Dunlop, professor of Greek in the university of Glasgow, father of the Right Hon David Boyle, lord-justice-general of Scotland, who was his fourth and youngest son He passed advocate 14th December 1793, was appointed solicitor-general 9th May 1807, and the same year represented the county of Ayr in parliament. He was elevated to the bench of the courts of session and justiciary, 28th February 1811, and in the following October was constituted lord-justice-clerk by commission from the prince regent dated the 15th of that month, and sworn of his majesty's privy council On the resignation of President Hope in 1841, he was appointed lord-president in his stead, and lord-justice-general. Feeling his strength decline, he retired from the bench which he had adorned for forty-one years, in the beginning of May 1852, and died 4th February following, in his 80th year A portrait of this eminent judge, by Mr Watson Gordon, is placed in the stair lobby of the Signet library, Edinburgh He married, first, on 24th December 1804, Elizabeth, eldest daughter of Alexander Montgomery of Annick, brother of Hugh, earl of Eglinton, and had two sons, Patrick and Alexander, and two daughters. His wife having died in 1822, he married, secondly, in 1827, the eldest daughter of David Smythe, Esq of Methven Castle, Perthshire, a lord of session, and by her also had issue. He was succeeded in his estate by his eldest son, Patrick Boyle, born 29th March 1806, passed advocate in 1829, but never practised, being principal clerk of the high court of justiciary

John, third earl of Glasgow, born 4th November 1714, was a captain in the 33d foot, and was wounded at the battle of Fontenoy, 30th April 1745, and again severely at the battle of Laffeldt, 2d July 1747 In 1764 he was constituted lord-high commissioner to the General Assembly of the Church of Scotland, and held the same office for eight years thereafter He died 7th March, 1775, in his 61st year By his countess, Elizabeth, second daughter of George, twelfth Lord Ross, and sole heiress of her brother, William, thirteenth Lord Ross, he had John, Lord Boyle, who died young; George, who succeeded him, and two daughters.

His eldest son, John, Lord Boyle, born in August 1789, a lieutenant in the navy, served on board the Gibraltar in the Mediterranean, and in July 1807, while steering for the port of Gibraltar, he fell in with a French flotilla, against which he maintained a very gallant action, but was overpowered and taken prisoner He died in 1818. Lady Augusta Boyle, the 3d daughter, married, in 1821, Lord Frederic Fitzclarence, G C H., son of King William IV, a lieutenant-general in the army, appointed commander-in-chief at Bombay in 1852

James, the 2d son, born 10th April, 1792, a retired commander in the royal navy, became fifth earl of Glasgow in 1843, and in 1844 was appointed lord-lieutenant of Renfrewshire. In 1822 he assumed by sign manual the additional name of Carr, in right of his mother While Viscount Kelburne he was M P for Ayrshire from 1839 to 1843 He m. Aug 4, 1821, Georgiana, daughter of Edward Hay Mackenzie, Esq, of Newhall, without issue Heir presumptive, his lordship's half-brother, Hon George Frederick Boyle, born in 1825

GLASGOW, a surname, from the city of that name, derived, as some write, from the two Gaelic words, Glass, signifying grey, and gow, a smith Others, with more probability, trace the etymology of the name to two ancient British words signifying 'a dark glen"

For the family of GLASGOW of Mont-Greenan, Ayrshire, see ROBERTSON GLASGOW

GLASSFORD, LORD, a title in the peerage of Scotland conferred in 1685 on Francis Abercrombie of Fetterneir, brother of Dr Patrick Abercrombie, author of the 'Martial Achievements of the Scottish Nation,' (see vol i p 3,) and eldest son of Alexander Abercrombie of Fetterneir, Aberdeenshire, a branch of the house of Birkenbog, in Banffshire. Having married Anne, Baroness Sempill, in her own right, he was created a peer of Scotland, by the title of Lord Glassford (from an ancient property of the Sempill family of that name) 5th July 1685, for his life only He does not appear ever to have taken his seat in parliament, and the title became extinct at his death He had several children by Lady Sempill (see SEMPILL, Lord).

GLEIG, a surname derived from the Scottish word gleg, quick of apprehension, sharp-sighted, ready at the uptake. Those of this name have for crest a falcon holding a partridge. In the 17th century, Mr James Gregg, a native of Dundee, and one of the professors of St. Andrews university, but who resigned his chair for the rectorship of the grammar school of his native town, was the author of some elegant Latin poems, preserved in the Poeta Scotigenæ.

The Right Rev George Gleig, LL.D, bishop of Brechin, and primus of the Scots Episcopal church, who died at Stirling, March 9, 1840, in his 87th year, was for more than 60 years distinguished as a scholar and critic. Ordained a priest in 1778, he was in 1808 elected by the clergy of Brechin co-adjutor to their aged bishop, Dr Strachan, and consecrated at Aberdeen in October of the same year On the death of Bishop Strachan, in 1810, he was preferred to the sole charge of the diocese, and, on the death of Dr John Skinner, in July 1816, chosen to succeed him as primus. He was the author of 'Papers on Morals and Metaphysics,' 'Account of the Life and Opinions of Archibald, Earl of Kellie,' Edin, 1797 4to, 'Account of the Life and Writings of William Robertson, D D,' 8vo, 'A Supplement to the third edition of the Encyclopædia Britannica,' Edin 1801, 2 vols. 4to, 'Occasional Sermons,' Edin 1803, 8vo, 'A Charge delivered at Stonehaven to the Episcopal Clergy of Brechin,' 1809, 4to, 'Buonaparte and Benhadad delineated, in two Sermons,' Lond. 1814, 8vo, 'Directions for the Study of Theology, in a Series of Letters from a Bishop to his Son, on his admission into holy orders,' London, 1827, 8vo, and other publications

His son, the Rev George Robert Gleig, M A, born in 1796, was educated at Oxford. In his youth he left the university to join, as a volunteer, a regiment then marching through Oxford, on its way to Lisbon, and soon obtained a commission in the 85th regiment of light infantry He served in the peninsular war, and in 1825 published his military reminiscences in an interesting narrative styled 'The Subaltern' In the American war of 1812–13, he was wounded at the capture of the city of Washington Subsequently, he retired from the army on half-pay, married, and took orders, and in 1822 was presented by the archbishop of Canterbury to the living of Ivy church, Kent In 1844, he was made chaplain of Chelsea Hospital, and in 1846 became chaplain-general to the forces. Having devised a scheme for the education of soldiers, he was appointed Inspector General of Military Schools. In 1848 he was appointed a Prebendary of St Paul's Cathedral. Author of 'Campaigns of Washington and New Orleans,' 1821, 8vo, 'The Chelsea Pensioners,' 1829, 'The Country Curate,' 1830, 'Germany Visited,' 'Military History of Great Britain,' 'Two Volumes of Sermons,' 'Soldier's Help to Divine Truth,' London, 1835, 12mo, 'Chronicles of Waltham,' 'Family History of England,' 1836, 2 vols. 18mo, 'The Hussar,' 1837, 'Traditions of Chelsea Hospital,' 1837, 'Memoirs of Warren Hastings,' 1841, 2 vols., 'Chelsea Veterans,' 'Stories of Battle of Waterloo,' 1842, 'The Light Dragoons,' 1843, and a variety of other works.

GLENCAIRN, Earl of, a title (dormant since 1796), in the peerage of Scotland, conferred in 1488, on Alexander Cunningham, Lord Cunningham of Kilmaurs, descended from one Warnebald, who came from the north of England in the 12th century, to the district of Cunningham, as a vassal under Hugh de Morville, constable of Scotland, the proprietor of almost all the district. From him he obtained the manor of Cunningham, which comprehended most of the parish of Kilmaurs, and from it the family surname was assumed. (See vol i pp 742—744) Glencairn, which gave the title of earl to this principal stock of the Cunningham family, is a parish in the western part of Nithsdale, Dumfries-shire.

Alexander, the first earl, was ennobled about 1450, by the title of Lord Kilmaurs, and May 28, 1488, he was created earl of Glencairn, by patent under the great seal, to himself and his heirs, from James III, in whose cause he fell at the battle of Sanchieburn, 11th June of the same year By the Act Rescissory, passed in the first parliament of James IV, 17th October, 1488, all creations of new dignities granted by that monarch's father since 2d February preceding (1487–8) were annulled, and, in consequence, Robert, Lord Kilmaurs, eldest son of the earl of Glencairn, was deprived of the title and dignity of earl. The 1st earl m. Margaret, dr of Adam Hepburn, lord of Hailes, and sister of 1st earl of Bothwell, and had 4 sons. William, of Craigends, the 2d son was ancestor of the Cunninghams of Craigends, as well as those of Robertland, Carncuren, Bedlan, Auchenharvy, and Auchenyards.

The eldest son, Robert, Lord Kilmaurs, 2d earl by right, though he did not bear the title, married Christian, eldest daughter of the first Lord Lindsay of the Byres, relict of John, master of Seton, and had a son, Cuthbert, who was restored to his grandfather's title by the Act Revocatory passed in 1503. It is stated by an English herald that he was "belted" earl of Glencairn on 13th August, 1503, at the marriage of James IV with the princess Margaret of England He sat in the parliament 8th November 1505, as earl of Glencairn In 1526, he was appointed one of the members of the secret council, and joining the earl of Lennox, in his attempt to rescue king James V from the power of the Douglases, was engaged in the battle near Linlithgow 4th Dec. of that year, when Lennox was slain and himself wounded. He died before 1542 By his countess, Lady Marjory Douglas, eldest dr of 5th earl of Angus, he had a son, William, 4th earl

While Lord Kilmaurs, this nobleman was one of the principal adherents of the English court in Scotland, and accepted of a pension from Henry the Eighth He was one of the party which joined the force of the earls of Angus and Lennox on 23d November 1524, when they took possession of Edinburgh, and endeavoured to withdraw the young king from the queen-mother Appointed high-treasurer of Scotland 25th June 1526, he held that office only till 29th October following In 1538 he accompanied David Bethune, bishop of Mirepoix afterwards the celebrated cardinal, on a matrimonial embassy to France, when the treaty of marriage between Mary of Guise and James the Fifth was concluded He was taken prisoner by the English at the rout of Solway in 1542, and committed to the custody of the duke of Norfolk, but released on payment of a ransom of a thousand pounds, and subscribing a bond, with some others of the Scots captive nobles, to support Henry's project of a marriage between the young Prince Edward and the Scottish queen The English monarch's demands subsequently became so extravagant, that, in the course of the following year, the earl and Lord Cassillis informed the English ambassador that they would sooner die than agree to them Henry, therefore, abandoned some of them, and on the first of July 1543 the earl, with Sir George Douglas, and the Scottish ambassadors, Learmounth, Hamilton, and Balnaves, met the English commissioners at Greenwich, when the treaties of peace and marriage were finally arranged The same year, when the Sieur de la Brosse arrived in the frith of Clyde, from France, with military stores, and ten thousand crowns to be distributed among the partisans of Cardinal Bethune, the earl of Glencairn, with the earl of Lennox, who had deserted the cardinal's party, and joined the English faction, hastened to receive the gold of which he was the bearer, and secured it in Dumbarton castle. Having a private feud with the earl of Argyle, Glencairn suggested to the regent Arran, at a time when his rival was occupied in the Highlands against the Lord of the Isles, that the Highland chiefs and hostages left in prison by James the Fifth should be liberated, that they might act against Argyle, which was accordingly done. He and his son, Lord Kilmaurs, were engaged in all the intrigues of the Anglo-Scottish party at this period, and while the father is described as one of the ablest and most powerful barons of Scotland, the son is mentioned with praise for his spirit and military experience. In the west of Scotland the earl's power and influence were so great that when the English king in this year contemplated an invasion of Scotland, his lordship undertook to convey his army from Carlisle to Glasgow, "without stroke or challenge." On the 17th of May, an agreement was concluded between Glencairn, Lennox, and Henry the Eighth, at Carlisle, by which that monarch consented to settle an ample pension on the earl and his son, Lord Kilmaurs, whilst to Lennox was promised the government of Scotland, and the hand of Lady Mary Douglas, the king's niece, they acknowledging Henry as protector of the kingdom of Scotland, and engaging to use their utmost efforts to deliver the young queen into his hands, with the principal fortresses in the realm, undertaking at the same time to cause the word of God to be truly taught in their territories, the Bible being declared by them the only foundation of all truth and honour On his return to Scotland he collected his vassals, to the number of five hundred spearmen, but was attacked on the muir of Glasgow, by the regent Arran, and defeated with great slaughter, his second son, with many others, being slain The earl fled almost alone to Dumbarton, and in September of the same year he and his son, Lord Kilmaurs, abandoned the cause of Henry, which led Wriothesley, the English chancellor, to inveigh against "the old fox and his cub," who had imposed on the simplicity of Lennox In November of the same year the earl was with the army of Arran that laid siege to Coldingham, then held by the English, but which was dispersed by an English force. In the following March (1544) Glencairn and his son renewed their communications with the English government. An account of the double part acted by them will be found in the fifth volume of Tytler's 'History of Scotland,' and a narrative of the negociations with them of John Edgar, for the support of the English interest in Scotland, is contained in Lodge's 'Illustrations of British History,' vol i In the Scots parliament, 12th December 1544, the earl obtained a remission to himself and his adherents for all crimes of treason by them committed previous to that date. He is said by Tytler to have been a party to the design of cutting off Cardinal Bethune. He died in 1547 He was twice married first, to Catherine, second daughter of William, third Lord Borthwick, without issue, and, secondly, to Margaret or Elizabeth, daughter and heiress of John Campbell, of West Loudoun, by whom he had Alexander, fifth earl, Andrew, ancestor of the Cunninghames of Corsehill, baronets, Hugh, progenitor of the Cunninghams of Carlung, Robert, ancestor of the Cunninghams of Montgrenan, William, bishop of Argyle, and a daughter, Lady Elizabeth, married to Sir John Cunningham of Caprington.

Alexander, fifth earl, the most celebrated person who bore the title, styled "the good earl," was among the first of the Scots nobility who concurred in the Reformation In 1555, on the return of John Knox to Scotland, he resorted openly to hear him preach. When the Reformer, at the request of the earl marshal, addressed to the queen regent, Mary of Guise, a letter in which he earnestly exhorted her to protect the reformed preachers, and to consent to a reformation in the church, Glencairn had the boldness to deliver it to her majesty, who, after glancing carelessly over it, handed it to James Bethune, archbishop of Glasgow, and contemptuously said, "Please you, my lord, to read a pasquil!" In 1556 he entertained Knox at his house of Finlayston, when the sacrament of the Lord's Supper, after the manner of the Reformed church, was administered to his whole family and some friends. In December 1557 he was one of the leaders of the reform party who subscribed the memorable bond or covenant which had been drawn up for the support and defence of the protestant religion, and who thenceforth assumed the name of the "Lords of the Congregation" In 1559, in consequence of the rigorous proceedings of the queen regent, he and his relative, Sir Hugh Campbell of Loudon, sheriff of Ayr, requested an audience of her majesty, at which they reminded her of her promises of toleration. On the queen's replying that promises ought not to be urged upon princes, unless they can conveniently fulfil them, "Then," said they, "since you are resolved to keep no faith with your subjects, we will renounce our allegiance," an answer which induced her to dissemble her proceedings. In May of that year, when the Reformers at Perth found it necessary to protect themselves by force of arms, Glencairn joined them with 1,200 horse and 1,000 foot, which he had raised in the west country After the protestant religion had been established by parliament in 1560, the earl was nominated a member of Queen Mary's privy council He and the earl of Morton, and Maitland of Lethington, were sent as ambassadors to Queen Elizabeth, with a proposal, for the strengthening of the bonds of amity between the two nations, that she should accept as a husband of the earl of Arran, the heir to the Scottish crown, which she declined He was amongst the nobles who opposed the marriage of Queen Mary with Darnley He had a principal command in the army embodied against the queen in June 1567, and when the French ambassador came from the queen at Carbery, promising them forgiveness if they would disperse, he replied, that "they came not to ask pardon for any offence they had done, but to grant pardon to those who had offended." When Mary was conducted to Lochleven that month, his lordship hastened with his domestics to the chapel-royal of Holyrood-house, and destroyed the whole of the images, demolished the altar, tore down the pictures, and defaced all the ornaments. A satirical poem against the Popish party, entitled the Hermit of Allaret or Loretto, near Musselburgh, written by Lord Glencairn, and preserved in Knox's History of the Reformation, is published by Sibbald in his Chronicle of Scottish Poetry His lordship died in 1574 From a very characteristic portrait of the fifth earl of Glencairn in Pinkerton's Scottish Gallery, the woodcut in the preceding page is taken

His eldest son, William, sixth earl, had two sons and four daughters. The elder son, James, seventh earl, was engaged in the raid of Ruthven in 1582 He was a privy councillor to King James the Sixth, and one of the commissioners nominated by parliament for the projected union with England in 1604 The disputes among the Scots nobility regarding precedence reached such a height in the reign of James the Sixth that a royal commission was appointed by that monarch in 1606 to regulate the matter, and the different peers were invited to produce their patents, or other evidence, in support of the relative antiquity of their titles. The result was the publication of the noted 'Decreet of Ranking,' 5th March 1606. James, then earl of Glencairn, not having the requisite proof at hand, and not being lawfully summoned, did not appear on the occasion, his precedence was, in consequence, unjustly prejudiced, and he was ranked after, instead of before, the earls of Eglinton, Montrose, Cassillis, and Caithness. Three years afterwards, on 16th June 1609, having been summoned to attend the parliament, he appeared personally before the lords of the privy council, and stated that he had brought an action of reduction of the said decreet before the lords of council and session, and producing the original patent of 28th May 1488, requested that it should be "read in the audience of the parliament." In the action of reduction he obtained a judgment in his favour, dated 7th July 1610, affirming his precedence over the earls of Eglinton and Cassillis, but as the other two earls (Montrose and Caithness) had not been cited in the action, and as the judgment of the court placed the earl of Eglinton after them, though entitled to precede them, that nobleman, on his part, brought an action of reduction of the said sentence, and obtained a decree in his favour 11th February, 1617 The seventh earl of Glencairn died about 1630, and his son, William, eighth earl, in October of the following year The latter had three sons and five daughters. Colonel Robert Cunningham, his second son, was usher to King Charles the Second.

The eldest son, William, ninth earl, on 21st July, 1637, obtained a ratification from Charles the First, under the royal sign manual, of the original Glencairn patent of 1488. He was sworn a privy councillor, and in 1641 appointed one of the commissioners of the treasury As he supported the cause of the king, in 1643 he joined the duke of Hamilton and the earls of Lanark and Roxburgh, in opposing the sending an army into England to assist the parliamentary forces. This service the king was pleased to acknowledge in a letter under his own hand, concluding thus "I give you this assurance, on the word of a prince, that I shall never retract anything I have granted, either in religion or liberty, to my subjects in Scotland, and for your own part I will not die in your debt" In 1646 his lordship was constituted lord-justice-general by parliament; and on 19th January 1648, a decree of the court of session was given in his favour on the point of precedence, against the four earls who claimed to rank before him, and reducing the decreet obtained by the earl of Eglinton in 1617, above mentioned. The same year he entered heartily into the "Engagement" for the rescue of the king, for which, on 15th February 1649, he was deprived by parliament of his office as lord justice-general, in virtue of the act of classes. The parliament now being the dominant party, on the 2d March following, at the instance of the public prosecutor, it passed a decreet annulling the original Glencairn patent of 1488, and on the 9th of the same month the earl of Eglinton, who had appealed his case to parliament, obtained a decreet annulling that of the court of session which had been given against him. These decrects, however never legally took effect, having been pronounced by an incompetent court on an illegal appeal, and the whole proceedings of that parliament having been specially rescinded after the Restoration. Glencairn's insurrection in the Highlands in 1653, in favour of Charles the Second, when Monk had possession of Scotland, forms one of the most interesting historical incidents of the period. In August of that year he went to Lochearn in Perthshire, where he met the earl of Athol, and some chiefs of the Highland clans, and soon found himself at the head of a considerable body of men, with which, after various marchings, he took possession of Elgin, where, in January 1654, he received letters from General Middleton, announcing his arrival in Sutherland, with a commission from the king, appointing him generalissimo of all the royal forces in Scotland. The earl accordingly hastened to Dornoch to meet Middleton, and in March a grand muster of the army took place, when it was ascertained to amount to three thousand five hundred foot, and one thousand five hundred horse His lordship then resigned the command to Middleton, and riding along the lines he acquainted the troops that he was no longer their general The men expressed great dissatisfaction at this announcement by their looks, and some, "both officers and soldiers, shed tears, and vowed that they would serve with their old general in any corner of the world." After the review, the earl gave an entertainment to Middleton and the principal officers of the army, and in proposing the health of the commander-in-chief, he said, "My lord general, you see what a gallant army these worthy gentlemen here present and I have gathered together, at a time when it could hardly be expected that any number durst meet together these men have come out to serve his majesty, at the hazard of their lives and all that is dear to them. I hope, therefore, you will give them all the encouragement to do their duty that lies in your power" Sir George Munro, Middleton's lieutenant-general, immediately exclaimed, "The men you speak of are nothing but a pack of thieves and robbers. In a short time I will bring a very different set of men into the field." The earl rejoined, "You, Sir, are a base liar, for they are neither thieves nor robbers, but brave gentlemen and good soldiers" Sir George having, in consequence, challenged his lordship, a meeting took place early next morning about two miles to the south of Dornoch. Both were on horseback, and after discharging their pistols at each other without effect, they immediately began to combat with their swords. After a few passes, Sir George received a severe wound on the bridle hand, and fearing that he could no longer manage his horse, he called out to the earl that he hoped he would allow him to fight on foot "You earle," said his lordship, "I will show you that I can match you either on foot or on horseback." Dismounting, they renewed the contest, but at the first onset Munro received a severe cut in the forehead, the blood from which prevented him from seeing. The earl was just about to run him through the body, but was stayed by his servant. On returning to head-quarters his lordship was put under arrest, by order of Middleton, and his sword taken from him

He now resolved to leave the army, which he did in a fortnight afterwards, and proceeding home, made his peace with Monk, he was, however, excepted out of Cromwell's act of grace and pardon the same year He was one of the peers whom Monk called to the convention he summoned when he was about to march into England in 1659, and pressed the general to declare for a free parliament. On the Restoration he waited on Charles the Second at London, when he was sworn a privy councillor, and appointed high sheriff of Ayrshire. On 19th January 1661, he was constituted chancellor of Scotland for life, in room of the earl of Loudoun, resigned Although he was one of the principal advisers of the re-establishment of episcopacy, he was not, as he said to the earl of Lauderdale, at that time a presbyterian, "for lordly prelates, such as were in Scotland before the Reformation, but for a limited, sober, and moderate episcopacy" "My lord," replied Lauderdale, "since you are for bishops, and must have them, bishops you shall have, and higher than ever they were in Scotland, and that you will find." The pride of Archbishop Sharp, and the pretensions and assumptions of the new prelates, soon involved the earl in quarrels and embittered his life. On one occasion having requested Fairfowl, archbishop of Glasgow, not to molest Mr William Guthrie, a presbyterian minister, Fairfowl refused Glencairn said little, but when he came down stairs his attendants observed him in great confusion, "and the buttons were springing off his coat and vest." Being asked what was the matter, he replied, "Woe's me! we have advanced these men to be bishops, and they will trample on us all" [Wodrow's Analecta.] In 1663, Sharp went to London, and obtained from the king a letter to the Scots privy council, in January 1664, giving him, as primate, the right of precedence over the chancellor This offended the earl so deeply that he fell into ill health, and died at Belton, East Lothian, on 30th May of that year, aged 54 He was buried, with great pomp, in the south-east aisle of the cathedral of St. Giles', Edinburgh, on 28th July following, his funeral sermon being preached by Burnet, archbishop of Glasgow In Pinkerton's Scottish Gallery is a portrait of his lordship, from which the above woodcut is taken He had four sons, the two eldest of whom predeceased him

SIXTH EARL OF GLENCAIRN

Alexander, tenth earl, the third son, married Nicholas, eldest sister and coheiress of Sir William Stewart of Kirkhill and Strathbrock, Linlithgowshire, and had one daughter, Lady Margaret, married to the fifth earl of Lauderdale Her eldest son, Lord Maitland, had an only child, Jean, the wife of Sir James Fergusson, baronet, of Kilkerran, Ayrshire, and her son, Sir Adam Fergusson, claimed, in her right, the title of earl of Glencairn, as afterwards mentioned Earl Alexander died 26th May, 1670, and was succeeded by his brother John, eleventh earl The latter, in the parliament of 1686, opposed the repeal of the penal laws against popery, and, supporting heartily the Revolution, raised in 1689 a regiment of six hundred foot (of which he was appointed colonel), for the service of the government He was sworn a privy councillor on 1st May of the latter year, and appointed governor of Dumbarton castle He died 14th December, 1703

His only son, William, twelfth earl, succeeded his father as governor of Dumbarton castle, and was also sworn a privy councillor He supported the treaty of union, and died 14th March 1734 His son William, thirteenth earl, had an ensign's commission in 1729, and, on his father's death, was appointed governor of Dumbarton castle. He attained the rank of major-general in the army in 1770, and died in September 1775

William, Lord Kilmaurs, eldest son of the thirteenth earl, was a cornet in the 3d dragoon guards, and when a mere youth travelling on the continent and talking in a loud tone, in the theatre of Lyons, he was requested by a French nobleman present to desist, but not heeding the request, the latter pulled his lordship rudely by the arm, whereupon going into the lobby, they drew their swords on one another Lord Kilmaurs was thrust through the body while his antagonist received a severe wound in the thigh, but neither of their wounds proved mortal He died before his father, at Coventry, unmarried, on 3d February 1768, in his 25th year His brother, James, became fourteenth earl on the death of his father, in 1775 He was at that time abroad, on a tour through Norway, Lapland, and Sweden In 1778 he was a captain in the west Lowlie regiment, and in 1780 was chosen one of the sixteen Scottish representative peers. He is celebrated as the patron of the poet Burns. In 1786 he disposed of his ancient family estate of Kilmaurs to the marchioness of Titchfield, and died, soon after landing from Lisbon, at Falmouth, on 30th January 1791, in his 42d year, and was buried in the chancel of the church of that town Dying unmarried, he was succeeded by his brother, John, fifteenth earl, an officer in the 11th dragoons. He afterwards took orders in the Church of England, and died at Coats, near Edinburgh, 24th September 1796, in his 47th year He was buried at St. Cuthbert's, Edinburgh, where is a monument to his memory As he died without issue, the title became dormant. The earldom was claimed by Sir Adam Fergusson of Kilkerran, bart., as heir of line by Sir Walter Montgomery Cunninghame of Corsehill, baronet, as heir male, and by Lady Henriet Don, sister of the last earl, and wife of Sir Alexander Don of Newton Don, Roxburghshire. In the committee of privileges of the House of Lords, on 14th July 1797, the lord chancellor (Rosslyn), in deciding the claim of the first-named, took a view unfavourable to all the claimants, and adjudged, that while Sir Adam Fergusson had shown himself to be the heir-general of Alexander, earl of Glencairn, who died in 1670, he had not made out his right to the title. The title is also claimed by Cuninghame of Craigends.

GLENDONWYN, GLENDONING, or GLENDINNING, a surname derived from the territory anciently known by that name, which comprehended a considerable district of Eskdale, Eusdale, Liddesdale, and the western parts of Teviotdale. In the reign of Alexander the Third this territory was possessed by Adam de Glendonwyn, whose son, Sir Adam de Glendonwyn, was a faithful adherent of King Robert the Bruce, and a constant companion of James Lord of Douglas, called "the good Sir James." As many of his lands were held of the house of Douglas, in 1313 he obtained a discharge of the feu duties from Archibald Douglas, lord of Galloway He had four sons, namely, Sir Adam, his heir, Sir Simon, killed at the battle of Otterbourne in 1388, at the side of the earl of Douglas, Matthew, bishop of Glasgow from 1389 to 1408, and Sir John, who was one of the conservators of the peace with the English in 1398

The eldest son, Sir Adam, was general receiver of all the earl of Douglas' rents, and he, and Sir Henry Douglas of Lugton, were sent as envoys to King Richard of England, then in Picardy, when that monarch swore to the observation of a truce at Lenlyngham, 18th June, 1389 He appears to have been much about the court of King Robert the Third, as he is witness to many of the charters of that king He died in 1397 His son, Sir Simon de Glendonwyn, had a share in the achievements of both the third and the fourth earls of Douglas, and was concerned in all their transactions. In 1398 he became, with his uncle, Sir John, surety to the English for keeping the peace in all the earl of Douglas' lands on the borders. From King Henry the Fourth he had letters of safe-conduct, in 1405, to travel through England in company with several other knights, and in 1406 he got other two safe-conducts to go to the English court, with Archibald and James, sons of the earl of Douglas, and other noblemen and gentlemen In an indenture made between King Henry and Archibald, earl of Douglas, dated London, 14th March, 1407, Sir Simon is a witness, and when the earl, then a prisoner in England, in 1408, obtained leave to go to Scotland, upon his giving security to return, his own two sons, with Sir Simon, became hostages for him By his wife, Lady Mary Douglas, daughter of Archibald, fourth earl of Douglas, and first duke of Turenne, he had three sons, Sir Simon, his heir; John de Glendonwyn, who, following the fortunes of the ninth earl of Douglas, settled in England, and was progenitor of several of his name in that kingdom

Sir Simon, the eldest son, was knighted by James the Second, by whom he was held in great favour Vested with the most extended justiciary powers within his own lands, particularly in Glendonwyn, and with the privilege of regality throughout Eskdale, of which he was hereditary bailie,—that office having been conferred on his father by charter dated 26th April 1407,—Sir Simon was one of the most potent barons in the kingdom of his time In 1449 he was one of the guarantees of a treaty of peace with King Henry of England, the other guarantees being the earls of Douglas, Angus, Ross, Murray, Crawford, &c , and he was among several great lords who were guarantees of the peace in subsequent years. In 1458 he obtained a confirmation of the barony baronial rights, and patronage of what is now the parish of Parton, in the stewartry of Kirkcudbright, by which he and his descendants were afterwards designed, and which is now the title of the representative of this ancient family

His son, John de Glendonwyn of Glendonwyn and Parton, died in the autumn of 1503. He was succeeded by his son, Ninian, whose great-great-grandson, John de Glendonwyn, the eleventh baron mentioned in Douglas' Baronage, joined Montrose on his first setting up the king's standard at Dumfries in the spring of 1644, for which, on 27th May of that year, he was denounced a traitor, and forfeited All his goods and gear were sold by Robert Gordon, commissary of Dumfries, on 29th October thereafter, part whereof being bought back by friends for the benefit of his wife and children. He himself took refuge on the continent, where he remained till the Restoration

The male line of the family ended in 1720, but Robert, the last laird, left a daughter, Agnes Glendonwyn, who married James Murray of Conheath, and that gentleman, in consequence, assumed the surname and arms of Glendonwyn instead of his own

GLENELG, LORD, a title in the peerage of the United Kingdom, conferred in 1835 on the Right Hon. Charles Grant, eldest of 3 sons of Charles Grant, for many years M P for Inverness-shire. [See GRANT, Charles, p. 366, and GRANT, Sir Robert, p. 367] Born in 1783, and educated at Cambridge, his lordship was, in 1807, called to the bar at Lincoln's Inn Elected, in that year, M P for the Fortrose burghs, he continued to represent them till 1818, when he was chosen for Inverness-shire, for which county he sat till raised to the peerage in 1835 From Dec. 1813 to March 1819, he was a lord of the treasury, and from Aug 1819 to Dec. 1821 chief secretary for Ireland In 1828, he became vice-president of the board of trade, and in Sept. 1827 president of that board, and treasurer of the navy, but ceased to hold these offices in June 1828 In Dec. 1830 he was made president of the board of control and continued so till Nov 1834 From April 1835 to January 1839 he held the office of secretary of state for the colonies.

The name Glenelg is said to be derived from two Gaelic words, Gleann, signifying a valley, and seilg, hunting, or from glen, a valley, and elad, a roe.

GLENIE, or GLENNIE, JAMES, an eminent mathematician, born in Fifeshire in 1750, was the son of an officer in the army At the university of St Andrews he distinguished himself by his proficiency in the mathematics, and in 1769 obtained two prizes Being originally destined for the ministry, he entered the divinity class, and soon became a keen polemic and an able theologian He afterwards turned his thoughts towards the army, and through the influence of the professors of St Andrews, and that of the earl of Kinnoul, chancellor of the university, he was nominated by Lord Adam Gordon a cadet of artillery at Woolwich He obtained a commission; and at the opening of the war with America in 1775, went out to New York, as lieutenant of artillery, with the troops ordered to embark for that country There he distinguished himself so much under colonel, afterwards general, St Leger, that, on the arrival of the Marquis Townshend, he was, without any solicitation on his part, transferred from the artillery to the engineers, which circumstance, with the reasons annexed, was duly notified in the London Gazette

In 1779 Mr Glenie was nominated one of the thirty practitioner engineers, and promoted to be second, and soon after first, lieutenant. Notwithstanding the harassing duties in which he was engaged, his zeal for science led him at this time to write a variety of important papers on the most abstruse subjects, which were transmitted to his friend and correspondent the Baron Maseres and read before the Royal Society, when he was elected a member, like Dr Franklin, without the payment of the usual fees On his return to England, he married Mary Anne Locke, a daughter of the store-keeper at Portsmouth, by whom he had three children

In 1783 the duke of Richmond succeeded Glenie's patron, the Marquis Townshend, in the master-generalship of the ordnance To prevent such a national misfortune as had happened in 1779, when the navy of England was obliged to take refuge in the Bristol Channel from the combined fleets of France and Spain, which had menaced the dock-yard of Plymouth, and insulted the whole coast, his grace had conceived the romantic idea of fortifying all our naval arsenals, and strengthening every important maritime station, instead of increasing the navy, and creating a new nursery for our seamen This absurd scheme had met with the approbation of several officers and engineers, and, from Mr Glenie's high scientific reputation, the duke was desirous of obtaining his sanction to the plan He accordingly consulted him on the subject, when he unhesitatingly declared the scheme extravagant and impracticable, and advised his grace to abandon it altogether At the request of Mr Courtenay, the secretary of the Marquis Townshend, at whose house Mr Glenie was residing for a few days, the latter was induced to write his famous pamphlet against it, entitled 'A Short Essay' which was no sooner published than it occupied exclusively the attention of all parties. In this celebrated publication, which passed through several editions, he demonstrated that extended lines produce prolonged weakness, not strength, and that the troops cooped up within the proposed fortifications would be far more formidable, as an active and moveable force, against an invading enemy, than confined in their redoubts He also showed, by a correct and careful estimate, that the sum necessary for the execution of the duke's scheme, being no less than forty or fifty millions, would exceed the whole capital required for building a new and complete fleet, superior to that of any nation on earth The duke published an unsatisfactory reply to Mr Glenie's pamphlet, and his proposal was soon after negatived in parliament

Being now deprived of all hopes of promotion, and treated with neglect by his superiors, Mr Glenie, resigning his commission, emigrated with his wife and children to New Brunswick, where he purchased a large tract of land, and was elected a representative to the House of Assembly Soon after he became a contractor for ship timber and masts for government, but both he and his partner, who is said to have been possessed of considerable wealth, were ruined by the speculation Compelled to return to England, he obtained an introduction to the earl of Chatham, then master-general of the Ordnance, who, not being able to employ him, retained him as engineer extraordinary By his recommendation, however, Glenie was soon afterwards appointed by the East India Company instructor of the cadets at the establishment formed for its young artillery officers, with a salary and emoluments amounting to about £400 per annum Unfortunately for him, he was one of the witnesses summoned in the famous trial in which the duke of York and Mrs Clarke were concerned, and his evidence having given offence to his royal highness, he was soon afterwards dismissed from his situation

In November 1812, Mr Glenie was employed by a gentleman who had been a member of parliament, to go out to Copenhagen to negociate for him the purchase of a large plantation in Denmark But having made no specific agreement with his employer, he never received any remuneration for his trouble. After this he endeavoured to support himself by taking a few mathematical pupils, but did not meet with much success. He died of apoplexy, November 23, 1817, in his 67th year Among other contributions made by Mr Glenie to the 'Transactions' of the Royal Society, was a demonstration of Dr Matthew Stewart's "42d Proposition, or 39th Theorem," which had remained without solution, and puzzled the learned during a period of 65 years, and also his celebrated paper, sent in 1811, on 'The Squaring of the Circle,' in which he demonstrates the impossibility of it, a question which is supposed to have engaged the attention, and to have eluded the research of the illustrious Newton

GOODAL, WALTER, a literary antiquarian, eldest son of John Goodal, a farmer in Banffshire, was born about 1706 In 1723 he entered himself a student in King's college, Old Aberdeen, but did not remain long enough to take a degree. In 1730 he obtained employment in the Advocates' Library, Edinburgh, but had no formal appointment there till 1735, when he became under-librarian He now assisted his principal, the celebrated Thomas Ruddiman, in the compilation of a catalogue of that library, upon the plan of the 'Bibliotheca Cardinalis Imperialis.' This catalogue was printed in folio in 1742. Warmly attached to the memory of Mary queen of Scots, he at one time entertained the design of writing the life of that beautiful and ill-fated princess, but this he afterwards relinquished for his work entitled 'Examination of the Letters said to be written by Mary Queen of Scots to James Earl of Bothwell,' in 2 vols 8vo, published in 1754 In this work he satisfactorily proves, from intrinsic evidence, that the letters attributed to Mary are forgeries, but his prejudice and inordinate zeal weakened the general effect of his arguments. In the previous year he had edited a new edition of 'Crawford's Memoirs,' which by no means conferred credit on his judgment or character for accuracy In 1754 he published an edition of Sir John Scott of Scotstarvet's 'Staggering State of Scots Statesmen,' a work which much required the emendatory notes that Goodal supplied In the same year he wrote a preface and life to 'Sir James Balfour's Practicks' He also contributed to the 'New Catalogue of Scottish Bishops,' by Bishop Keith, who, in his preface to that work, gratefully acknowledged the assistance he had received from him, particularly with regard to the preliminary account of the Culdees, &c. Goodal likewise published an edition of Fordun's 'Scotichronicon,' with a Latin introduction, and a dissertation on the marriage of Robert the Third An English translation of his introduction was published at London in 1769 He died July 28, 1766, in very indigent circumstances, caused by habits of intemperance, in which he had indulged during the later years of his life To enable his daughter to pay off some of his debts, and proceed to her friends in Banffshire, the faculty of advocates, on petition, awarded her the sum of ten pounds

GORDON, the surname of an ancient and distinguished family, originally from Normandy, where their ancestors are said to have had large possessions. From the great antiquity of the race, many fabulous accounts have been given of the descent of the Gordons. Some derive them from a city of Macedonia, called Gordonia, whence they went to Gaul; others find their origin in Spain, Flanders, &c. Some writers suppose Bertrand de Gourdon who, in 1199, wounded Richard the Lion-Heart mortally with an arrow, before the castle of Chalus in the Limoges, to have been the great ancestor of the Gordons, but there does not seem to be any other foundation for such a conjecture than that there was a manor in Normandy called Gourdon. It is probable that the first persons of the name in this island came over with William the Conqueror in 1066. An old tradition states that in the reign of Malcolm Canmore a knight arrived in Scotland, at a time when the borders were infested by a wild boar, which he killed, or gored down, and that, for this service, that monarch gave him a grant of land in the Merse, or Berwickshire, which he called by that name, taking also the boar's head for his armorial bearing If he was an Anglo-Norman knight, however, he is more likely to have styled himself "de Gordon," after his lands. According to Chalmers, (Caledonia, vol. ii. p. 887,) the founder of this great family came from England in the reign of David the First, (1124-53) and obtained from that prince the lands of Gordon, (anciently Gordun, or Gordyn, from, as Chalmers supposes, the Gaelic gor dún, "on the hill," a derivation as fanciful as the other). He left two sons, Richard, and Adam, who, though the younger son, had a portion of the territory of Gordon, with the lands of Fanys on the southern side of it.

The elder son, Richard de Gordon, a person of considerable distinction in the reigns of Malcolm the Fourth and William the Lion, granted, between 1150 and 1160, certain lands to the monks of Kelso, and died in 1200 His son, Sir Thomas de Gordon, confirmed by charter those donations, and his son and successor, also named Thomas, made additional grants to the same monks, as well as to the religious of Coldstream He died in 1285, without male issue, and his only daughter, Alicia, marrying her cousin, Adam de Gordon, the son of Adam, younger brother of Richard above mentioned, the two branches of the family thus became united

This Adam de Gordon was one of the Scots barons who joined King Louis the Ninth of France in his famous crusade for the recovery of the Holy Sepulchre in 1270, and he died during the expedition. His son, also named Sir Adam de Gordon, appears to have had some property in England, but whether his own inheritance, or in right of his wife, an Englishwoman, cannot now be determined. During the disputes between Henry the Third of England and his barons, he joined the latter, and was for some time governor of Dunster castle. After the battle of Evesham, so fatal to the rebellious barons, he maintained himself with eight horsemen in the woods between Alton and Farnham, plundering the counties of Berks and Surrey, until surprised by Prince Edward In the single combat which ensued between them, Sir Adam's foot slipping, he fell to the ground, when the prince not only granted him his life, but admitted him into his service, and he continued ever after a faithful friend to the English monarch's cause. He was a firm adherent of Baliol, as he held most of his lands either of that prince, or of the earls of March, his fast friends, but he died before King John, as he was called, resigned the sovereignty of Scotland to King Edward, in 1296, as in 3d September in that year Margery, his widow, obtained restitution of the estates, having sworn fealty to the English king.

His son, Sir Adam de Gordon, lord of Gordon, one of the most eminent men of his time, was the progenitor of most of the great families of the name in Scotland In 1300 he was one of the wardens of the marches, and in 1305 one of the ten commissioners elected at the general council of the Scots nation at Perth, and invested with full parliamentary powers for the settlement of Scotland under Edward the First. The same year (1305) he was fined by King Edward in three years' rent of his estate, for his former opposition to that monarch. In 1306, on the release from imprisonment of William Lamberton, bishop of St. Andrews, he became one of the sureties for the good behaviour to the English king of that patriotic prelate. In January 1312, he was appointed by King Edward one of the commissioners to treat of peace with King Robert the Bruce, but at that time without effect. In April 1312, he and the earl of March were sent into England by the party of Baliol, to endeavour to get some of their grievances redressed, and in November of the same year he was again employed by King Edward to negociate a peace with the Scottish king. Baliol dying the following year, Sir Adam immediately gave in his adhesion to King Robert, and in 1320 was appointed one of the ambassadors sent to Rome to solicit the removal of the sentence of excommunication under which Bruce had been placed by the Pope, when they were the bearers of the famous letter from the nobles of Scotland to his holiness, asserting the independence of their country In reward of his faithful services, Bruce granted to him and his heirs the noble lordship of Strathbolgie (now Strathbogie), in Aberdeenshire, then in the Crown, by the forfeiture of David de Strathbolgie, earl of Athol, which grant was afterwards confirmed to his family by several charters under the great seal Sir Adam fixed his residence there, and gave those lands and lordship the name of Huntly (or Hunt-Lee), from a village of that name in the western extremity of Gordon parish, in the Merse, the site of which is now marked only by a solitary tree From their northern domain, the family afterwards acquired the titles of lord, earl, and marquis of Huntly, and the latter is now their chief title. He was slain, fighting bravely in the vanguard of the Scotch army at the battle of Halidonhill, July 12, 1333 By Annabella, his wife, supposed to have been a daughter of David de Strathbolgie above mentioned, he had four sons and a daughter The eldest son, Sir Alexander, succeeded him The second son, William, was ancestor of the viscounts of Kenmure (see KENMURE, earl of) The two youngest sons became churchmen The daughter, Mary de Gordoune, was the second wife of Walter Fitz-Gilbert, ancestor of the duke of Hamilton, in 1613

The eldest son, Sir Alexander Gordon, behaved gallantly at the battle of Halidonhill, where his father was killed He attended King David in his unfortunate expedition into England, and according to Abercrombie (Military Achievements of the Scots Nation, vol. i. p. 98), he was slain at the battle of Durham, October 17, 1346, though his name does not appear in Lord Hailes' list of those killed at that battle

His son, Sir John Gordon, styled of Huntly, was taken prisoner with King David, at the battle of Durham, and not released till the beginning of 1357, when the earl of Douglas became one of his sureties. On his release he obtained a charter from David the Second, confirming him in the Strathbogie lands. He died soon after

Sir John Gordon, his son, got a new charter from King Robert the Second of the lands of Strathbogie, dated 13th June 1376. In 1377, the earl of March having attacked and burned the town of Roxburgh, the English borderers retaliated on the Berwickshire lands of Sir John Gordon, who, with his own vassals and followers, entered England, and routed at Carham a considerable body of the English under Sir John Lilburn, whom he took prisoner Soon after, he surprised and took prisoner Sir Thomas Musgrave, governor of Berwick castle, but in a short time released him In 1378 he and the earl of Douglas entirely defeated a large English force under Sir Thomas, killing most of them and taking prisoners the rest. He was slain, with the said earl, at the battle of Otterbourne in 1388.

His son, Sir Adam, lord of Gordon, fell at the battle of Homildon, 14th September, 1402. Having descended the hill, accompanied only by a hundred men, the whole of them were killed in a desperate attempt to turn the fortune of the day By his wife, Elizabeth, daughter of Sir William Keith, great mareschal of Scotland, he had an only child, Elizabeth Gordon, who succeeded to the whole family estate, and marrying Alexander Seton, second son of Sir William Seton of Seton, ancestor of the earls of Winton, that gentleman was styled lord of Gordon and Huntly In 1411 he was engaged at the battle of Harlaw against Donald of the Isles, and in 1421 was one of the Scots sent to France to the assistance of the dauphin against the English. At the desire of James the First, then the prisoner of Henry the Fifth of England, he quitted the French service, with several other Scotsmen, and was one of the commissioners appointed to treat for the release of James, and one of the hostages on his obtaining his liberty, when the annual revenue of Alexander, lord of Gordon, was stated at four hundred marks. He left two sons, the younger of whom became ancestor of the Setons of Meldrum

Alexander, the elder, was also one of the commissioners selected to treat for the release of King James, and one of his hostages. In 1437 he was one of the ambassadors extraordinary appointed to treat with the English about a truce, and in 1439 was again sent into England, to treat of a final peace In 1449 he was created earl of Huntly, with limitation to his heirs male, by Elizabeth Crichton, his third wife, they being obliged to bear the name and arms of Gordon (See HUNTLY, Earl of)

The descendants of Sir Adam de Gordon continued to possess their original estates in Berwickshire till the beginning of the fifteenth century

GORDON, Duke of, a title (extinct in 1836) in the Scottish peerage, conferred in 1684 on George, fourth marquis of Huntly, born about 1650, only son of the third marquis, (see HUNTLY, Marquis of,) who died in 1653 On the restoration, the attainder passed against his grandfather, the second marquis, beheaded at Edinburgh, March 30th, 1649, for his loyalty to Charles the First, was rescinded by act of parliament. About 1668, the fourth marquis went to France, and after studying about two years in academies there, proceeded to Italy, Germany, and Hungary, and in 1670 returned to Scotland. In the following year he joined the French army at Oudenarde, and subsequently served in it at the siege of Maestricht. In 1674 he was with the French army at the conquest of Burgundy, and afterwards joined the troops commanded by Marshal de Turenne before the battle of Strasburg In 1675 he served a campaign in the army of the prince of Orange in Flanders. By King Charles the Second, he was created duke of Gordon by patent, dated November 1, 1684. On the accession of James the Second of England and Seventh of Scotland to the throne, he was appointed one of the lords of the treasury, and sworn a privy councillor He was likewise made governor of Edinburgh castle, and on June 6, 1687, on its revival, invested with the order of the Thistle. Although a Roman Catholic, the faith which his family had always professed, he disapproved of the measures adopted by King James for re-establishing that religion in Scotland, on which account, on his appearance at court, he was very coldly received by the king. At the Revolution he adhered to King James, and held out the castle of Edinburgh for the abdicated monarch. The convention of Estates summoned him to surrender, 15th March, 1689, and on his refusal, proclaimed him a traitor, and commenced the siege of the castle. On the departure of the viscount of Dundee to raise troops for King James in the north, the duke had that celebrated conference with him at a postern-gate of the castle, which is mentioned by our historians. No account has been preserved of the nature of the conversation which passed between these two devoted adherents of King James, but it is understood that Dundee entreated the duke to hold out the castle as long as he could, as he would endeavour to raise the siege as soon as he had collected sufficient forces. At last, on the 13th June, four days before the battle of Killiecrankie, the provisions being quite exhausted, and no prospect of relief, the duke surrendered the castle, on honourable terms. He subsequently printed a journal of the siege in French, for the satisfaction of the court of St. Germains. After proceeding to London, and making his submission to King William, he passed over to Flanders, and, in 1691, visited the court of the exiled monarch, but being ungraciously received by King James, he retired into Switzerland. Having been arrested there, he was sent to Scotland, by way of Holland, and during the reign of King William he was subjected to frequent imprisonment. On the accession of George the First, the lords justices of Scotland, in September 1714, considering the duke disaffected to the house of Hanover, ordered him to be confined in the city of Edinburgh on his parole. He died at Leith, on 7th December 1716, aged about 67 He had married, in October 1676, Lady Elizabeth Howard, second daughter of the earl of Norwich Her grace having retired into a convent in Flanders, the duke, in 1697, instituted a process of adherence. In 1711, a remarkable sensation was created by her grace transmitting to the faculty of advocates, a silver medal, having the head of the Pretender on one side, and on the reverse a representation of the British isles, with the motto Reddite. A motion thanking her grace for her gift was carried, after a warm debate, by a majority of 63 to 12 Dundas of Arniston, who, with another advocate named Horne, was deputed to convey the vote to the duchess, thanked her grace for having presented the faculty with a medal of their sovereign, and expressed a hope that she would very soon be enabled to compliment them with a second medal struck upon the restoration of the king and the royal family Sir David Dalrymple, then lord advocate, was directed by the ministry to inquire into the matter The faculty, alarmed, disclaimed the conduct of Dundee and Horne, and by a solemn resolution declared their attachment to the queen and the protestant succession. Although the lord advocate was dismissed from office, because he had been remiss in bringing the delinquents to justice, no instructions were given to his successor to prosecute them Their graces had a son, Alexander, second duke, and a daughter, Lady Jean Gordon, married to the fifth earl of Perth, styled by the Pretender's party, duke of Perth.

Alexander, second duke of Gordon, when marquis of Huntly attended the earl of Mar at Braemar on the breaking out of the rebellion of 1715, and, with other suspected noblemen and gentlemen, was summoned by the lord advocate to appear at Edinburgh, under the pain of a year's imprisonment and other penalties, to give bail for their allegiance to the government, but very few so summoned chose to answer the citation. After proclaiming the Chevalier St. George at Castle Gordon with a large body of horse and foot he joined the Pretender's standard at Perth, 6th October, and was at the battle of Sheriffmuir, on 13th November After that event he returned home, and capitulated with the earl of Sutherland In the following April, he was brought from the north to Edinburgh, and committed prisoner to the castle, but no farther proceedings appear to have been instituted against him. He died November 28, 1728. He had married in 1706, Lady Henrietta Mordaunt, second daughter of the celebrated general, Charles earl of Peterborough and Monmouth, and had by her four sons and seven daughters. Her grace educated all her children in the protestant faith, and on that account received, in 1735, a pension from George the Second, of one thousand pounds annually. She died 11th October 1750, at Prestonhall, near Edinburgh, an estate which she had purchased at a judicial sale in 1738, for £8,877, and which she left to her fourth son, Lord Adam. The sons were, Cosmo-George, third duke, Lord Charles, an officer in the army, died unmarried in 1780, Lord Lewis, a lieutenant in the royal navy, but such a keen Jacobite that on the breaking out of the rebellion of 1745, he declared for the Pretender, raised a regiment of two battalions, and defeated a party of royalists under the laird of Macleod, near Inverury 23d December of that year. On the surrender of Fort Augustus to the rebels, Lord Lewis was left with a few troops in command of that place. After the battle of Culloden, he escaped to the continent, and was attainted in 1746. He died, unmarried, at Montreuil, in France, 15th June, 1754. The Jacobite song, 'O send Lewie Gordon hame" written by Dr Geddes, (see this volume, page 286,) took its name from his lordship.

The fourth son, Lord Adam Gordon, who died a general in the army, entered the 18th regiment of foot in 1746 and in 1755 became a captain in the 3d foot-guards. The previous year he had been elected M P for the county of Aberdeen. He represented the county of Kincardine from 1774 to 1788, when he vacated his seat. In 1758 he accompanied his regiment in the unfortunate expedition of General Bligh to the coast of France, and on a re-embarkation being resolved upon six days after the landing of the troops, at the head of his grenadier company of guards he greatly distinguished himself, by bringing up the rear at St. Cas, and resolutely retarding the advance of a very superior force of the enemy. As colonel of the 66th foot, he next served for several years in America, but returned in 1765, and having been intrusted by the heads of the colonies with a statement of their grievances, on 20th November of that year he had a long conference with the secretaries of state on the subject. In 1775 he became colonel of the 26th or Cameronian regiment, and in April 1778 was appointed governor of Teignmouth castle. In 1782 he was appointed commander-in-chief in Scotland, when he took up his residence at Holyrood palace, which he caused to be greatly repaired. In 1796 he was constituted governor of Edinburgh castle. In June 1798 he resigned the command of the forces in Scotland, in favour of Sir Ralph Abercromby, and retired to his seat of "The Burn," Kincardineshire, where he died on 18th August 1801. He had no issue by his lady, Jane, daughter of John Drummond, Esq of Megginch, Perthshire, widow of the second duke of Athol, and the heroine of Dr Austen's song of "For lack of gold she's left me, O!"

Cosmo George, third duke, in reward of his loyalty during the rebellion of 1745, was on February 10th 1747, invested with the order of the Thistle. He was elected one of the sixteen representative peers to the tenth parliament of Great Britain, and died at Bretenil, near Amiens, 5th August, 1762, in his 32d year. He had married in 1741, Lady Catherine Gordon, only daughter of his brother-in-law, the second earl of Aberdeen, by whom he had three sons and four daughters. Lord George Gordon, celebrated for his share in the No-popery riots of 1780, of whom a memoir is afterwards given, was his youngest son. The duchess took for her second husband Major afterwards General Staates Long Morris.

The eldest son, Alexander, the fourth duke, born about 1745, was in 1771 elected one of the sixteen representative peers of Scotland, and in 1775 was created a knight of the order of the Thistle. In 1759 a regiment having been raised from his estates, which became the 89th Highlanders, chiefly that his stepfather, Major Morris, might be appointed lieutenant-colonel commandant, he was appointed captain in it, and in 1778, during the American war, he raised the Gordon fencibles (660 men) of which he himself had the command. In 1793 he raised another regiment of fencibles, called the Gordon Highlanders, which was reviewed by George the Third in Hyde-park. The regiment was disbanded, with the other fencible corps, in 1799. In 1784, in consideration of his lineal descent from Henry Howard, earl of Norwich, that title in the peerage of the United Kingdom was revived in his person, being created earl of Norwich in the county of Norfolk, and Lord Gordon of Huntly, in the county of Gloucester. He was also appointed keeper of the great seal of Scotland. His grace was the author of the excellent humorous song "Cauld Kail in Aberdeen," or 'the Reel of Bogie." To his encouragement of his butler, Mr William Marshall, celebrated as a musician, in the cultivation of Scottish music, we owe "Tullochgorum," "Miss Admiral Gordon's Strathspey," and many of our best modern melodies. He died June 17, 1827. He was twice married. His first wife was Jane, daughter of Sir William Maxwell of Monreith, baronet. Her union with the duke arose from the following incident. His grace, when a young man, and very handsome, happening to be present at one of the old Assembly balls of Edinburgh, overheard one lady whisper to another, "How I should like to be duchess of Gordon!" He turned and beheld a youthful maiden of very fine figure and considerable beauty. An introduction followed and then a dance, and in process of time a marriage. The duchess became a leader of fashion in her day, and a person of no slight political importance, as her mansion in London long formed the chief resort of the leaders of the Tory party, as that of the duchess of Devonshire was that of the Whigs. She died in 1812, having had, with five daughters, two sons, viz. George, fifth duke, and Alexander, an officer in the army, who died 8th January 1808, in his 23d year. The daughters were, Lady Charlotte, by marriage, duchess of Richmond and Lennox, Lady Madelina, married, first, to Sir Robert Sinclair of Murkle, Caithness shire, baronet, and secondly, to Charles F Palmer, Esq of Huckley park, Berkshire, Lady Susan, by marriage, duchess of Manchester, Lady Louisa, by marriage, marchioness Cornwallis, and Lady Georgina, by marriage, duchess of Bedford. The duke married, a second time, in 1820, Mrs. Christie of Cochalors, without issue.

George, fifth and last duke of Gordon, was born at Edinburgh, February 2, 1770. In his twentieth year, being then marquis of Huntly, he entered the army as an ensign in the 35th regiment, his brother-in-law, the duke of Richmond, being a captain in the same corps. In the following year (1791) he raised an independent company of foot, which he exchanged with Captain Grant for a company in the 42d, and he served in that distinguished regiment, commanding the grenadiers, till 1793, when he procured the captain lieutenancy of the 3d foot-guards, which gave him the rank of lieutenant colonel. Soon after he embarked in the duke of York's first expedition to Flanders, and was present in the actions of St. Amand, Famars, Lannoi, and Dunkirk, and at the siege of Valenciennes. On his return to Scotland in 1794, from the tenantry on his father's estates he raised, in the course of the summer, a regiment of the line called the Gordon Highlanders, and this fine body of men was gazetted as the 100th, but afterwards, during the short peace, became the 92d. Of this gallant regiment he was appointed lieutenant-colonel commandant. In his zeal for the service he was supported by his father and mother, both of whom, with himself, recruited personally It is stated that his mother, the duchess, at their first review, appeared attired in the Gordon tartan, the dress of the regiment. She is even said to have procured recruits for her son, by placing the enlistment shilling betwixt her lips. The marquis went out with his regiment to Gibraltar, and leaving it there, in September of the same year he embarked at Corunna for England, but three days after, the packet was taken by a French privateer, when his lordship was plundered of every thing valuable, put on board a Swedish vessel, and landed at Falmouth, the 24th of the same month. He afterwards rejoined his regiment in Corsica, where he served for above a year He received the brevet of colonel, May 3, 1796.

In 1798, the 92d Regiment having, about the middle of May, arrived in England, was, on the breaking out of the rebellion in Ireland, actively employed against the rebels, particularly in the county of Wexford, and during its stay there it was most exemplary for its good conduct and discipline. Such was the estimation in which the corps was held, that an address of thanks was presented to the marquis of Huntly, its colonel, by the magistrates and inhabitants, on the regiment being about to leave. At this time the marquis was made a brigadier-general On the second expedition to Holland in 1799, the 92d again embarked, and at the battle of Bergen, October 2, the marquis was severely wounded, at the head of his regiment, by a musket ball in his shoulder General Moore, of whose brigade the 92d formed a part, was so well pleased with the heroic conduct of the corps on the occasion, that when he was made a knight of the Bath, and obtained a grant of supporters for his armorial bearings, he took a soldier of the Gordon Highlanders in full uniform as one of his supporters, and a lion as the other The marquis received the rank of major-general January 1, 1801, and on January 7, 1806, became colonel of the 42d or Royal Highlanders. On May 9, 1808, he was promoted to be lieutenant-general. In 1809 he commanded a division of the army in the unfortunate expedition to the Scheldt, under the earl of Chatham. He attained the full rank of general, August 12, 1819, and on the death of the duke of Kent, January 20th, 1820, he was appointed colonel of the first foot-guards. In the following May he was invested with the insignia of the Grand Cross of the Bath, and on the death of the duke of Gloucester, he was removed to the colonelcy of the 3d guards, December 4, 1834 He succeeded to the dukedom of Gordon on his father's death, June 17, 1827, when he was appointed keeper of the great seal of Scotland In the following November he became governor of Edinburgh castle. In the exercise of a princely hospitality he resided chiefly at his noble seat of Gordon Castle, of which, from a view in Nattes' Scotia Depicta, the subjoined is a woodcut

His grace married, Dec. 11, 1813, Elizabeth, daughter of Alexander Brodie, Esq, of Arnhall, by whom he had no issue, and who survived him At his death on 28th May 1836, the title of duke of Gordon became extinct, as well as that of earl of Norwich in the British peerage, and the marquisate of Huntly devolved on George earl of Aboyne (see HUNTLY, marquis of), while the duke of Richmond and Lennox (see LENNOX, duke of), son of his eldest sister, succeeded to Gordon castle, Banffshire, and other estates in Aberdeenshire and Inverness-shire.

GORDON, a clan, at one period one of the most powerful and numerous in the north Although the chiefs were not originally of Celtic origin, as already shown, (see page 317,) they yet gave their name to the clan, the distinctive badge of which was the rock ivy The clan feuds and battles were frequent, especially with the MacIntoshes, the Camerons, the Murrays, and the Forbeses. Their principal exploits will be noticed under the head of HUNTLY, earl of The Gordons adhered to the cause of Queen Mary, while the Forbeses uphold that of her son, King James. The fine old ballad of 'Edom O' Gordon' took its rise from the following event. Sir Adam Gordon of Auchindoun, brother of the earl of Huntly, and his deputy as lieutenant of the north of Scotland for the queen, committed many acts of oppression on the Forbeses, and in November 1571, he sent a party under one of his retainers named Captain Ker, to reduce the castle of Towie, in the parish of that name, one of the chief seats of the rival clan. Alexander Forbes, its proprietor, was then absent, but his lady, whose maiden name was Margaret Campbell, not only gave Ker some abusive language from the battlements, but fired upon, and slightly wounded him in the knee. Transported with rage, he ordered the castle to be set on fire, when the whole inmates, thirty-seven persons in all, were burnt in the flames. In the ballad Sir Adam is represented as the principal actor in this disastrous proceeding The Forbeses, it appears, afterwards attempted to assassinate him on the streets of Paris. "Forbes," says Gordon, in his History of the Gordons, (vol i. page 381,) "with some desperate fellows, lay in wait in the street through which he was to return to his lodgings from the palace of the archbishop of Glasgow, then ambassador in France. They discharged their pistols upon Auchindoun, as he passed by them, and wounded him in the thigh His servants pursued, but could not catch them, they only found, by good chance, Forbes's hat, in which was a paper with the name of the place where they were to meet. John Gordon, lord of Glenluce and Longormes, son of Alexander Gordon, bishop of Galloway, lord of the bedchamber to the king of France, getting instantly notice of this, immediately acquainted the king, who forthwith despatched le grand provost de l'hotel, (or the great provost of the palace,) with his guards, in company with John Gordon, and Sir Adam's servants, to the place of their meeting, to apprehend them When they were arrived at the place, Sir Adam's servants, being impatient, rushed violently into the house, and killed Forbes, but his associates were all apprehended, and broke upon the wheel" It was this same Sir Adam Gordon who, in a rencontre with the Forbeses in 1572 at Clatt, killed the master of Forbes' brother, styled "Black Arthur," as related at page 229

The duke of Gordon, who was the chief of the clan, was usually styled "The Cock of the North" His most ancient title was the "Gudeman of the Bog," from the Bog-of-Gight, a morass in the parish of Bellie, Banffshire, in the centre of which the former stronghold of this family was placed, and which forms the site of Gordon castle, considered the most magnificent edifice in the north of Scotland, a view of which is given in the preceding page. The Marquis of Huntly is now the chief of the clan Gordon

In Berwickshire, the original seat of the Gordons, the gipsies still retain the surname, and the natives of the parish of Gordon in that county, from their simplicity of manners, were usually styled "the Gowks of Gordon."

Of the name of Gordon, the most ancient families belong to Aberdeenshire, Banffshire, and the north of Scotland.

The Gordons of Pitlurg, in the former county, descended from John de Gordon, who, in 1376, received a grant of Strabolgie from Robert II, count among the most eminent of its members, the celebrated geographical and antiquarian writer, Robert Gordon of Straloch, a memoir of whom is given at page 329 of this volume. He succeeded his brother, John Gordon of Pitlurg, in 1619. With 6 daughters he had 11 sons, five of whom predeceased him Robert, the eldest, succeeded him in Pitlurg and Straloch, John, the 2d son, was designed of Fechill, James, the 5th son, minister of the parish of Rothiemay, in Banffshire, marrying the heiress of Fraser of Techmuiry, founded a respectable family, Alexander, the seventh son, was appointed, on 19th June, 1688, a judge of the court of session, under the title of Lord Auchintoul, but was deprived of his seat on the bench at the Revolution, which happened soon after, Arthur, the ninth son, an eminent advocate, who died in 1680, was the father of Robert Gordon, the founder of Gordon's Hospital, Aberdeen, of whom a memoir is given hereafter at page 332, Lewis, the youngest son, a physician, died in 1704

Alexander Gordon of Pitlurg, great-grandson of the geographical writer, dying in 1748, without issue, the estates devolved upon the nearest collateral male heir, his uncle's grandson, James Gordon of Hilton, M D, who married, in 1731, Barbara, daughter of Robert Cuming of Birness, parish of Logie Buchan, and his son, John Gordon of Pitlurg, on succeeding in right of his mother to the entailed estates of Birness and Leask, assumed the additional name of Cuming. The latter's eldest son, John Gordon Cuming of Pitlurg and Birness, inheriting in 1815 the estates of his relative Skene of Dyce, the eldest collateral branch of Skene of Skene, assumed, in accordance with a deed of entail, the additional name of Skene. He was a lieutenant-general in the army, and died in 1828 His eldest son, William Gordon-Cuming-Skene of Pitlurg and Dyce, born in 1786, also an officer in the army, served several years with the 92d regiment, and afterwards with the 6th foot, in France and the Peninsula, and on the staff in the West Indies. The Gordons of Knockespock, in the parish of Clatt, Aberdeenshire, obtained from James IV, in 1508, a grant of the barony of Clatt, which was renewed by James VI in 1604, "to his beloved James Gordon of Knockespoke." About the middle of that century, the then owner of Knockespock took for his second wife, Jean, daughter of Leith of Harthill, a lady celebrated for her beauty and no less for her attachment to her husband. When he was laid on a bed of sickness, she tended him with the most affectionate care, till one night, overcome by fatigue, she fell asleep beside him, and was awakened only to find that the mansion of Knockespock was in flames. All the servants had fled, and no assistance was near Losing not a moment, she carried her suffering husband from the burning house, and laying him in a sheltered spot, returned through the flames, at the greatest danger to herself, for plaids and other coverings, to wrap him from the cold This affecting incident forms the subject of a ballad entitled "Knockespock's Lady," and a poem by William Thom, the weaver-poet of Inverury

The estate of Terperale or Dalperse, in the united parishes of Tullynessle and Forbes, which, some time after the rebellion of 1745, was added to the Knockespock property, had previously belonged to a cadet of the house of Gordon, who was engaged in that outbreak on the side of the Pretender, and after the battle of Culloden, concealed himself for a considerable period among the hills beside his mansion At last, venturing to sleep for one night in his own house, he was apprehended there by a party of the king's soldiers who had received information of the circumstance. There being some doubt as to his identity, the soldiers carried him before the minister of the parish, but not being satisfied on the point, they next conveyed him to a farm-house, rented by their prisoner, on the opposite side of the hills, where his wife and family then resided, when his children, on seeing him approach, came running towards him, exclaiming, "Daddy! Daddy!" and thus were the unconscious instruments of betraying their father to the government. His estate being forfeited, came into possession of the York Building company, and from them it was purchased by the proprietor of Knockespock, a connection of the same family

Colonel Harry Gordon of Knockespock, of the Royal Engineers, served, during the revolutionary war in America, and married a lady of Philadelphia, of the name of Hannah Meredith, by whom he had four sons, Peter, Harry, James, and Adam, and two daughters, Jane, died in infancy, and Hannah, died unmarried, in February, 1827 Peter, the eldest son, died in Grenada, in the West Indies, at the age of 27, Harry, the second son, succeeded his father, James, the third son, was a barrister in London, and Adam, the youngest son, a major general in the army, and colonel of the 67th regiment, died in 1815

Harry Gordon of Knockespock, the second son, born in Philadelphia, was sent to Scotland for his education, and at an early age entered the army He served in India as captain, and was taken prisoner with Sir David Baird in the war against Hyder Ali, and with the rest of the British prisoners suffered great hardships while detained in the dungeons of that barbarous chief After his return to Scotland, he succeeded to the family estates, and died in 1836 He had married Anne, daughter of George Carnegie, Esq of Pittarrow, Kincardineshire, by whom he had a daughter, Hannah Having no male issue, and Knockespock being strictly entailed, he was succeeded by his kinsman James Adam Gordon of Naish, Somersetshire, and Stocks, Hertfordshire, whose great-grandfather, James Brebner Gordon, Esq of Knockespock, was the son of George Gordon of Knockespock, and grandson of Harry Gordon of the same place. He had a son, James Brebner Gordon, of Moore Place, Hertfordshire, who married Jane Lavington, and, with a daughter, Mary Anne, married in 1777, to Sir William Abdy, baronet, of Felix Hall, Essex, had a son and heir, James Gordon, M P successively for Stockbridge, Truro, and Clitheroe, who married, in 1789, Harriet, eldest daughter of the celebrated Samuel Whitbread, Esq of Arlington, M P for Bedfordshire, and died in 1832 His son, the said James Adam Gordon, born 16th April 1791, was, in 1830, M P for Tregony, one of the small boroughs disfranchised by the Reform Bill, and of which he was recorder He was a magistrate and deputy lieutenant for the counties of Somerset, Hertford, and Bedford, and after succeeding to the Knockespock estate, for Aberdeenshire. In 1830 he served as high sheriff of Somersetshire. He married Emma Kathrine, second daughter of Vice-admiral Thomas Wolley, and dying, without issue, on 4th March 1854, was succeeded by the next heir in the entail, Sir Henry Percy Gordon, bart., of Northcourt, Isle of Wight, son of Sir James Willoughby Gordon, bart., quarter-master general of the forces, who died in 1850 Sir Henry's grandfather, Captain Francis Grant R.N, assumed the name of Gordon in 1768, in accordance with the testamentary injunction of his maternal uncle, James Gordon, Esq of Manor Place. Sir Henry Percy Gordon's mother was Julia, daughter of Richard H A Bennet, Esq of Beckenham, Kent, and first cousin to the duke of Northumberland

The next heir in the Knockespock entail is Hannah, daughter of Harry Gordon, Esq of Knockespock (who died in 1836), and wife of Capt William Abdy Fellowes, R N, with issue. In the same entail, are the children and descendants of Mrs. Barbara Duthie, who died in Aberdeen in 1852, cousin german of Sir James Willoughby Gordon, Bart., above mentioned, her third daughter Barbara, being the wife of William Anderson, Author of 'The Scottish Nation,' whose issue are included in the entail

The disposition and deed of tailzie, dated Dec. 20, 1769, were made by James Brebner, then Gordon, Esq., chief judge of Grenada, eldest son of James Brebner in Towie of Clatt, and Margaret, eldest sister of James Gordon of Knockespock, and Capt. Francis Grant, then Gordon, R.N.

The Gordons of Abergeldie, Aberdeenshire, descend from Sir Alexander Gordon, 2d son of 1st earl of Huntly, by his 3d wife, Elizabeth, dr of William Lord Crichton, chancellor of Scotland. Besides receiving from his father various lands in the barony of Midmar, he acquired from James III (deed of gift dated at Edinburgh 26th December 1482,) the lands of Abergeldie, in the parish of Crathie, and this branch of the Gordons was ever after designed of that place. The fifth in descent from Alexander, John Gordon, Esq of Abergeldie, dying without issue, the estates and representation of the family devolved on his sister Rachel, who married Captain Charles Grant, son of Peter Gordon of Minmore, a cadet of the ducal family, and they have ever since continued in the male line.

The splendid old Scottish air, "The birks o' Abergeldie,' was appropriated by Robert Burns, for his song, "The birks of Aberfeldy," which is in Perthshire, but he improved the words adapted to the air, for the old Aberdeenshire song of "The birks of Abergeldie" was little better than doggerel rhyme.

In Aberdeenshire, the other principal families of the name are Gordon of Wardhouse, of Cluny, of Fyvie, of Avochie, &c. In 1745, the then laird of Avochie took part in the rebellion, and some others of the Gordons had representatives among the insurgents, but they contrived somehow to come out of all the forfeitures and confiscations consequent on that ill-fated outbreak, in some cases better, and in others no worse, than they entered them Many Highland families were ruined by Prince Charles' attempt to recover the kingdoms of his ancestors, but amidst the disasters of the period the Gordons flourished, while many who engaged in that enterprise were compelled to spend their lives in exile.

The Gordons of Gight in Aberdeenshire, now extinct, sprung from William, third son of Adam, second son of the second earl of Huntly, and the princess Jane, daughter of James the First In 1579, Sir George Gordon of Gight was attacked and slain, after crossing the ferry from the south, at Dundee, by Lord Forbes and his followers. In 1644 the then Gordon of Gight, with the lairds of Newton and Ardlogie, with a party of forty horse and musketeers, all, in the language of Spalding, "brave gentlemen," made a raid upon the town of Banff, and plundered it of buff-coats, pikes, swords, carbines, pistols, "yea and money also," and compelled the bailies to subscribe a renunciation of the Covenant. Catherine Gordon, the last heiress of Gight, married in 1785, Captain John Byron of the Guards, and was the mother of Lord Byron, the celebrated poet, so that it was not without reason that his lordship was proud of having royal blood in his veins. Gight now belongs to the earl of Aberdeen

The family of Culvennan in Wigtonshire, descended in the direct male line from Sir Adam de Gordon of Lochinvar in the Glenkens of Galloway, the companion in arms of Sir William Wallace, is a branch of the noble house of Kenmure. (See KENMURE, viscount of) James Gordon of Craichlaw, county of Wigton, eighth in descent from the above-named Sir Adam de Gordon, was one of those who signed the band for the defence and protection of King James the Sixth in 1567 His son, William Gordon of Craichlaw, purchased the estate of Culvennan, in the same county, and the grandson of this gentleman, William Gordon of Culvennan, an eminent Covenanter, was, with his kinsman, Alexander Gordon of Earlston, persecuted by the tyrannical government of the day, for their steadfast adherence to the civil and religious liberties of the country Their estates were forfeited, but restored to them by act of parliament, after the Revolution This laird of Culvennan died in 1703 He had a son also named William, who succeeded him, and whose son, Sir Alexander Gordon of Culvennan, lieutenant-colonel of the Kirkcudbrightshire militia, and successively sheriff of the counties of Wigton and Kirkcudbright, was knighted in 1800 Having made a representation (for which he received a letter of thanks) to the duke of Wellington, then at the head of the ordnance, of the state of neglect in which the sword of Wallace was kept at Dumbarton castle, it was ordered to be sent to the Tower of London, and, after being properly mounted and furbished, returned. On his death 21st October, 1830, Sir Alexander was succeeded by his eldest son, James Gordon of Culvennan, who, dying 27th May, 1843, without issue, his nephew, William Gordon of Greenlaw, became proprietor of Culvennan

In the baronetage of Scotland and Nova Scotia there are three families of the name of Gordon, namely, Gordon of Gordonstoun and Letterfourie, Banffshire, (premier baronet), Gordon of Embo, Sutherlandshire, and Gordon of Earlston, Kirkcudbrightshire and in the baronetage of the United Kingdom are Gordon of Halkin, and Kinstair, Ayrshire, and Crombie, Banffshire (1813), and Gordon-Cumming of Altyre and Gordonstoun, Elginshire (1804), already mentioned (see vol 1 p 740), besides Gordon of Northcourt, Isle of Wight, and Knockespock, Aberdeenshire (1818, see p 321 of this vol).

In Banffshire are the Gordons of Park House, derived from a scion of Huntly In 1808 Thomas Duff, of the family of Duff of Drummuir, succeeded to the barony of Park, through his grandmother, Helen Gordon of Park, and thereupon assumed the name of Gordon in lieu of his own patronymic.

The family of Gordon of Letterfourie, baronet, descend from Adam, 2d son of 2d earl of Huntly, and the princess Jane, daughter of King James I They had 4 sons. 1 Alexander, 3d earl of Huntly 2 Adam, of Aboyne, who m. Elizabeth, countess of Sutherland, and, in her right, assumed the title of earl of Sutherland, (see SUTHERLAND, earl of) 3 Sir William, slain at Flodden, ancestor of the Gordons of Gight, Banffshire, (see p. 222) This family is now extinct. 4 Sir James Gordon of Letterfourie, admiral of Scotland in 1513, whose descendants continued the line, of whom afterwards.

John Gordon, eldest son of Alexander, master of Sutherland, (who predeceased his father, in January 1529), and grandson of Hon. Adam Gordon of Aboyne, above mentioned, succeeded as 10th earl of Sutherland The Hon Sir Robert Gordon, 2d son of his lordship's only son, the 11th earl, was the first baronet. Vice-chamberlain of Scotland, sheriff of Inverness-shire, and a lord of the privy council, he was created a baronet of Nova Scotia, May 26, 1625 He died in 1656.

His eldest son, Sir Ludovick, 2d baronet, had 4 sons and 4 daughters. Of the latter, the eldest, Lucy, m. Robert Cumming, Esq of Altyre. Sir Ludovick died in 1686

His eldest son, Sir Robert, 3d baronet, was twice married By his 2d wife, Elizabeth, daughter of Sir William Dunbar, baronet, of Hempriggs, Caithness-shire, ancestor of 6th Lord Duffus, he had 3 sons and a daughter, Lucy, m. to David Scot of Scotstarvet, Fifeshire. He died in 1701

His eldest son, Sir Robert, 4th baronet, on the death of the 17th earl of Sutherland without sons, claimed that title, but the House of Lords, in March 1771, adjudged it to the deceased earl's daughter, Elizabeth, first duchess of Sutherland. Sir Robert m. Agnes, daughter of Sir William Maxwell of Calderwood, baronet, and died in 1772

His eldest son, Sir Robert, 5th baronet, died, unmarried, June 2, 1776 His only surviving brother, Sir William, succeeded as 6th baronet. This gentleman also died unmarried, March 5, 1795, when his estates were bequeathed to Sir Alexander Cumming-Gordon of Altyre, baronet, (see CUMMING-GORDON).

The baronetcy, having been granted to heirs male whatsoever, was inherited by James Gordon, Esq , of Letterfourie, who became 7th baronet, as lineal representative of Sir James Gordon of Letterfourie, admiral of Scotland in 1513, youngest brother of Hon Adam Gordon of Aboyne, above mentioned, husband of the countess of Sutherland

His descent is thus given The admiral's son, James Gordon of Letterfourie, who lived during the reigns of James V and Queen Mary, was succeeded by his son, also named James. The latter seems to have been involved in the commotions in the north during the reign of Charles I His son, with others of the name of Gordon, having joined in the depredations committed on the property of Crichton of Frendraught, (see FRENDRAUGHT, page 271,) the laird of Letterfourie appeared at Edinburgh in Feb 1635, with Sir Adam Gordon of Park and various gentlemen of the Gordon surname, similarly situated, and was, with them, committed to prison, until their sons, who had engaged in the combination against Frendraught, should be presented before the council These gentlemen denied being accessory thereto, and petitioned to be set at liberty, a request which was complied with, on condition that they should either produce the offenders, or force them to quit the kingdom Accused by Adam Gordon, one of the principal leaders of the confederacy against Frendraught, and son of Sir Adam Gordon of Park, with having employed him and his associates, in name of the marquis of Huntly, against the laird of Frendraught, Letterfourie was cited to appear at Edinburgh for trial On being confronted with his accuser, he denied every thing laid to his charge, and was committed a close prisoner to the gaol of Edinburgh The marquis himself was confined in the castle. This happened in January 1636 There being no proof against them, both the marquis and Letterfourie were released, by command of the king, on giving security for indemnifying the laird of Frendraught in time coming for any damage he might sustain from the Gordons and their accomplices. In 1647 the laird of Letterfourie was commander of the Bog of Gicht or Gordon castle, which was taken by General David Leslie, and Letterfourie with his brother, Thomas Gordon of Clasturin, and other gentlemen of the name of Gordon, sent prisoners to Edinburgh The house of Letterfourie was burned by the Covenanters. This James Gordon of Letterfourie had 6 sons. 1 John, who succeeded. 2 James, who acquired the lands of Cuffarach 3 Peter, progenitor of the Gordons of Aberlour 4 Alexander 5 William, who went into the service of the duke of Tuscany 6 Robert.

The eldest son, John Gordon of Letterfourie, adhered to the interest of James VII , and was in the castle of Edinburgh, in 1689, when the duke of Gordon, the governor, held it in name of the fallen monarch In 1695 the laird of Letterfourie m. Gliceria, daughter of Sir William Dunbar, first baronet of Durn, and had 4 sons. 1. Peter, who died in 1743, unmarried. 2. James, wine merchant, Madeira, who returned to Scotland, and died in 1790, also unmarried. 3. William, who was robbed and murdered in crossing the Alps in 1740 4. Alexander

The youngest and only surviving son, Alexander, succeeded his father in Letterfourie. A stanch Jacobite, he engaged in the rebellion of 1745, and being obliged, in consequence, to leave Scotland, he went for a time to his brother at Madeira. He m. in 1778, the daughter of Alexander Russell, Esq. of Moncoffer, Aberdeenshire, issue, 3 sons. 1 James, who succeeded. 2 Alexander, who died in 1810, in his 28th year 3 Charles Stuart, so named after the pretender, died at Venice, Dec. 18, 1805, in his 21st year Alexander Gordon of Letterfourie died January 16, 1797, in his 83d year

His eldest son, James, was the next laird of Letterfourie. On the death of Sir William Gordon, 6th baronet of Gordonstoun, the succession to that baronetage opened to him, and April 22, 1806, he was served heir male general to Sir Robert Gordon, the first baronet of Gordonstoun In consequence he became 7th baronet. In 1801, Sir James m. Mary, daughter and heiress of William Glendonwyn, Esq of Glendonwyn, and had 4 sons, 1 William, who succeeded, 2 James, b. in 1805, deceased, 3 Charles, b. Nov 11, 1808, deceased, 4 Robert, b Aug. 18, 1824, and 3 daughters, 1 Helen, 2 Mary, m. William Shee, Queen's serjeant, 3 Alexandrina Jane. Sir James died Dec. 24, 1843

His eldest son, Sir William, 8th baronet, b Dec. 26, 1803, was in 1855 appointed lieutenant-colonel 66th foot, but the same year he exchanged to the 3d West India regiment, and in 1858 retired from the army

The family of Gordon of Embo, Sutherlandshire, also in possession of a baronetcy, descend from Adam Gordon, dean of Caithness, youngest of 3 sons of Alexander, first earl of Huntly, and brother of George, 2d earl of Huntly, above mentioned, who married the princess Jane The dean himself married the heiress of Sutherland, and had 3 sons and a daughter, Elizabeth, wife of Lord Findlater The sons were, 1 William, chancellor of Dunkeld, rector of Petty, and treasurer of Caithness. 2. George of Beldorney 3. John, ancestor of the family of Embo. The dean died in 1528.

The 3d son, John Gordon of Drummoy, had a son, John Gordon, first styled of Golspietour, and afterwards of Embo In the feuds between the earls of Sutherland and Caithness, he took an active part. In the beginning of 1588 the former sent 200 men into Caithness under his command and that of John Gordon of Kilcalmekill, his own kinsman, to reconnoitre and ascertain the strength of the earl of Caithness, before invading the country himself The Gordons and their party entered the parishes of Dumbaith and Lathron, and after wasting the country and killing some of the Caithness men, returned with an immense booty in cattle, which they divided amongst themselves. This division was long known by the name of Creach Iarra, that is, the harship of Lathron In Oct. 1590, a considerable party of Caithness men carrying off a large number of cattle from Sutherland, were pursued by John Gordon of Embo, Patrick Gordon of Gartay, and John Gordon of Kilcalmekill, and attacked by them, at a place called Clyne. The battle that ensued was a severe and prolonged one, but, on the approach of night, the Caithness men were forced from the field and obliged to abandon the cattle which they had stolen. John Gordon of Embo was succeeded by his only son of the same name.

This gentleman, when John Gordon, younger of Embo, was, like his father, involved in most of the commotions arising out of the feuds with the rival house of Caithness. In 1612 Sir Robert Gordon, tutor of Sutherland, having got a commission from the privy council, authorising him to apprehend one Arthur Smith, a forger, under the protection of the earl of Caithness, (see vol. i p. 528.) entrusted the commission to Donald Mackay, his nephew, and to John Gordon, younger of Embo. Smith was apprehended in Thurso, and Mackay went off with him, but Gordon and his party were attacked in the town by John Sinclair of Stirkage, nephew of the earl of Caithness, and a large party of Sinclairs. The latter were defeated with loss, and Sinclair of Stirkage killed. For this slaughter, the earl of Caithness summoned Gordon, younger of Embo, and his friends, to appear and answer at Edinburgh. The earl himself, and several of the parties engaged on Sinclair's side, were also cited, for resisting the king's commission The parties met at Edinburgh, and the lords of the privy council compelled them to sign a deed of submission of their differences to the adjustment of the marquis of Huntly The following year the earl of Sutherland sent John Gordon, younger of Embo, and Donald Mackay with 300 men and 140 servants, into Lochaber, in an enterprise against the clan Cameron In October of the same year, the earl of Caithness having again assembled his men, the earl of Sutherland sent his brother, Sir Alexander Gordon, Donald Mackay, and Gordon, younger of Embo, with a party of men, after him, to watch his movements, on which he dissolved his force and returned home. In December, a remission and pardon from the king were granted to John Gordon, younger of Embo, and his accomplices, for the slaughter of Sinclair of Stirkage in Thurso. During the year 1621, the following circumstance occurred "A dispute arose between Sutherland of Duffus and John Gordon, younger of Embo, respecting the marches between Embo and the lands of Cuttle, which belonged to the former Duffus, accompanied by his brother, James Sutherland, and 7 other persons, visited the marches one evening, when he sent for young Embo to come and speak with him regarding them Though late in the evening, Embo went, unaccompanied by any person, and met Duffus and his party, and after exchanging some words, they attacked Gordon and wounded him before he had time to draw his sword. As soon as this attack became known, the Gordons and the Grays, with some of the earl of Sutherland's tenants, came to Embo, and proceeded thence to the castle of Skelbo, where Duffus then resided, with the design of attacking him Sir Alexander Gordon, sheriff of Sutherland, hearing of the meeting, immediately hastened to the spot, to prevent mischief Sir Robert Gordon afterwards prevailed upon the parties to hold a friendly meeting, at which they agreed to refer their disputes to arbitration"

In the army raised by Sir Robert Gordon in 1623, by order of the government, for the apprehension of the earl of Caithness, Gordon, younger of Embo, with two others, had command of the left wing In 1625, young Embo, riding one day between Sidderay and Skibo, met John Sutherland of Clyne, 3d brother of the laird of Duffus, who had formerly attacked him This gentleman was also on horseback, and Embo inflicted on him several blows with a cudgel which he held in his hand. Sutherland drew his sword, Gordon unsheathed his, and in the combat that ensued, Sutherland was severely wounded in the head and in one of his hands. Duffus immediately cited Gordon to appear before the privy council, to answer for this breach of the peace, and on the day appointed the parties met at Edinburgh, when young Embo was declared guilty of a riot, and committed to prison. On the intercession of Sir Robert Gordon, he was released shortly after, on payment of a fine to the king of one hundred pounds

Scots. This gentleman, after he came into possession of Embo, was created a baronet of Nova Scotia. Jan. 29 1631

His eldest son, Sir Robert, 2d baronet, member of the Estates for Sutherland, married a daughter of James, 2d Lord Duffus (attainted in 1715), and had 4 sons. John, Robert, James, and William, and 3 daughters.

His eldest son, Sir John, succeeded as 3d baronet During his father's lifetime, being then called John Gordon, younger of Embo, he was summoned by the Prince of Orange to the convention of Estates at Edinburgh in 1688–9, and sat there as member for Sutherland He had a son, William, and 2 daughters, the elder of whom m. Lord Reay Sir John died Oct. 16, 1697

His only son, Sir William, 4th baronet, was, in 1741, M P for Cromarty and Nairn He had 2 sons, John and William, the latter, in 1751, commander of the Otter sloop of war

The elder son, Sir John, 5th baronet, was twice married, and had 5 sons and 6 daughters. He died January 24, 1779

His eldest son, Sir James, 6th baronet, colonel in the Dutch service, died, unmarried, at Zutphen, Guelderland, in 1786.

The title devolved upon his brother, Sir William, 7th baronet, born in 1736 He entered the army in 1755, as an officer in the 19th regiment, and was afterwards in the Norfolk militia. He m. June 15, 1760, Sarah, only daughter of Crosby Westfield, Esq, R N, and had 14 children, several of whom predeceased him He died January 7, 1804

His son, Sir John, succeeded as 8th baronet. A lieutenant of engineers, Bengal army, he died, unmarried, at Prince of Wales Island, Nov 12, 1804

His only surviving brother, Sir Orlando, the youngest of his father's family, was the 9th baronet. He was a captain 78th Highlanders, and m., in Dec. 1813, Frances, daughter of General Gore Browne. He died June 19, 1857, leaving a son and 3 daughters.

The son, Sir Home Gordon, 10th baronet, was educated at Trinity College, Cambridge, where he graduated B A in 1839 He subsequently became M A, a deputy lieutenant of Sutherlandshire. He m. March 26, 1844, Ellen Harriet, youngest daughter of Bartholomew Barnewell, Esq, issue, one son, Home Seton, born March 21, 1845

The Gordons of Earlston, stewartry of Kirkcudbright, descend from Alexander, 2d son of William de Gordoune, 6th lord of Lochinvar This Alexander Gordon, about the beginning of the 15th century, entertained some of the followers of John Wicliffe, and having obtained possession of a New Testament in English, was accustomed to read it to them at their meetings in the woods of Airds, in the neighbourhood of his estate. His great-grandson, John Gordon, by his marriage in 1582, with Margaret, eldest daughter of John Sinclair of Earlston, acquired that estate. This lady died early, leaving only a daughter, but by a marriage with a daughter of Chalmer of Gadgirth, he had 5 sons, of whom the youngest was David Gordon of Gordonstoun, Galloway

On his death in 1628, John Gordon was succeeded by his eldest son, Alexander, born in 1587, commissioner for Kirkcudbright in the Scottish parliament, who, though a stanch royalist, opposed the measures of Charles I for the establishment of episcopacy in Scotland In his place in parliament he boldly maintained that the wearing the Scottish crown involved no right, as in England, to the headship of the Church of Scotland For not conforming to the liturgy, he is said, by an old historian, to have been fined 500 merks, and confined for a time to a certain town In a conversation with the earl of Galloway, Earlston's kinsman, the king jocularly bestowed upon him the title of "earl of Earlston." An offer of a baronetcy was subsequently made to him, but he declined it. He was a friend of Livingston the celebrated divine (see LIVINGSTON, JOHN). By his wife Elizabeth, daughter of John Gordon, 2d laird of Pennynghame of that name, (grandfather of Alexander, 5th Viscount Kenmure,) he had 3 sons and one daughter His eldest son predeceased him in 1645 He himself died in Nov. 1653

He was succeeded by his 2d son, William Gordon of Earlston, born in 1614 This gentleman began early to distinguish himself by his firm attachment to the presbyterian cause. He made it a condition, in granting leases of his lands, that the party obtaining them should observe family worship, and he went every Sunday to church at the head of his tenantry It also appears from some curious anecdotes in Wodrow's Analecta, printed for the Maitland Club, that he had acquired a high reputation for his skill in solving cases of conscience. Feeling deeply the execution of Charles I, he supported the right of Charles II to the Scottish throne He was also in favour of the Restoration, 1660 In 1663, he was ordered by the commissioners to assist in settling an episcopalian minister in the parish of Dalry of which he was the patron, but refusing to comply, he was, on July 30, summoned before the council To this citation he paid no attention, and, in consequence, was, Nov 24, the same year, charged with keeping conventicles and private meetings in his house, and ordered to appear before them, to answer for contempt. Disregarding this second summons also, sentence of banishment was immediately issued against him He was commanded to depart the kingdom within a month—not to return under pain of death, and bound to live peaceably during that time under the penalty of £10,000 This severe sentence he likewise disobeyed, and was thereafter visited with a most rigorous persecution by the government. In 1667, he was turned out of his house, which was taken possession of by a military force, and, for some years afterwards, he was forced, like many others, to lead a wandering life, exposed to many hardships and privations After the battle of Bothwell Bridge, as he was hastening forward to join the Covenanters, not having heard of their defeat, he was encountered near the fatal field by a party of English dragoons, when, refusing to surrender, he was killed upon the spot. This took place on 22d January, 1679 He was buried in the churchyard of Glassford, where a pillar, without any inscription, was erected over his grave. By his wife, the 2d daughter of Sir John Hope, Lord Craighall, he had 3 sons and a daughter

His eldest son, Alexander Gordon, born in 1650, succeeded him in his estates. He was engaged in the action at Bothwell Bridge, and narrowly escaped being taken In riding through the town of Hamilton, pursued by the military, he met one of his tenants, who caused him to dismount, dress himself in woman's clothes, and rock his child's cradle After the search was over, he proceeded to his brother-in-law, Mr Hamilton, in Holland, to represent the depressed state of the united societies to the churches of the Netherlands, and in his absence he was, Feb 19, 1680, declared guilty of treason, his estate forfeited, and he himself condemned to death, when found. Some time after he was captured on board ship, and on August 21, 1683, ordered to be beheaded on the former sentence, without trial His execution, however, was delayed till some questions were put to him, particularly in regard to the Rye House plot, with a participation in which he had been unjustly charged, and, in the meantime, an answer was required by the privy council from London as to the following point, which it seems had occurred to them as one of difficulty "Whether a person under sentence of death could be put to question by torture?" To which the reply was, "Yes, as to any crimes after condemnation!" meaning the condemnation of 1680 It was accordingly resolved to examine him upon events of which he might be cognisant from the period between February 1680 and August 1683. The examination is given in Bishop Sprat's History of the Rye House Plot, of which Mr Gordon declared his ignorance, when believed to be on his death-bed, 7th December the same year Owing to his state of health, he was not actually put to the torture, being only examined with the instruments before his eyes. By the intercession of his friend, the duke of Gordon, his life was spared; but he was detained a prisoner successively in the castle of Edinburgh, on the Bass Rock, and in Blackness castle, till the Revolution released him The heavy hours of his nearly six years' imprisonment he relieved by devoting himself to wood carving, and executed some pieces curiously descriptive of his times and family Heraldry, in which he had a good taste, formed another amusement. By his 1st wife, Janet, eldest daughter of Sir Thomas Hamilton of Preston, he had a large family, and by his 2d wife, Hon Marion Gordon, dr of 5th Viscount Kenmure, he had a son, William Gordon, 5th of Culvennan, and a dr, Grizell, m. Alexander Gordon of Carleton Sir Alex. died Nov 10, 1726

Although the eldest son, Sir Alexander Gordon was the 2d baronet of Earlston, the title having been conferred, first, on the 2d son, Sir William Gordon, of Afton, born in 1654 When only 16 years of age, the latter joined the army of Frederick, duke of Brandenburgh, and for 15 years was engaged in constant active military service on the continent With the earl of Argyle he landed on the west coast of Scotland, May 27, 1685, and after the failure of that enterprise he rejoined the Prussian army, but came over to England with the prince of Orange, at the Revolution He subsequently served against France, under the duke of Marlborough, and was present at the battle of Steinkirk in July 1692 He attained the rank of lieutenant-colonel in the army, and having received several wounds, he enjoyed pensions of £182 a-year He was also appointed governor of Fort William in Inverness-shire, and on July 9, 1706, was created a baronet of Scotland and Nova Scotia. Dying without issue male in Dec. 1718, his elder brother Alexander, of Earlston, succeeded him in the baronetcy, in terms of the patent as well as in the estate of Afton

Patricia, great-granddaughter of the 2d baronet, and daughter of Gilbert Gordon of Halleaths, was the first wife of the first Lord Panmure, and the mother, with other children, of the 2d Lord Panmure, long known as Hon Fox Maule.

Sir Alexander, the 2d baronet, was succeeded by his eldest son, Sir Thomas, 3d baronet The latter, born Oct. 26, 1685, married, 1st, in 1710, Anne, eldest daughter of William Bouck, or Boyuck, Esq., Edinburgh, issue, several children, 2dly Miss Gibson of Whitehaven, without issue. His two eldest sons, Thomas and Archibald, predeceased him He died March 23, 1769

His 3d but eldest surviving son, Sir John, became 4th baronet. Born Dec. 20, 1720, he entered the army and was a captain 70th foot. He married, in 1775, Anne, daughter of Mylne of Powderhall, without issue, and died Oct. 17, 1795.

His nephew, Sir John, born Oct 4, 1780, son of James Gordon, Esq of Jamaica (who died in 1794), youngest son of the 3d baronet, succeeded as 5th baronet. He was at one period an officer in the Royal or 1st regiment of foot, and resided for some time on his estate in St. Anne's parish, Montego Bay, Jamaica, called Earlston, after the ancient residence of his ancestors in Galloway He died January 8, 1843 He was twice married, but had issue only by his 2d wife, Mary, eldest daughter of William Irving, Esq of Gribton, Dumfriesshire, 3 sons and 5 daughters. The sons were, 1 John, born in 1826, drowned while bathing, July 16, 1842. 2. William, who succeeded. 3. James Irving, born Dec. 19, 1838. Mary Christian the 2d daughter, married, in 1854, John Shand, Esq, M D, Kirkcudbright.

The second son, Sir William, born Oct. 20, 1830, succeeded as 6th baronet. In 1849 he entered the army as a cornet 17th lancers, and served with his regiment in the Crimea, also in India. In 1854 he was severely wounded before Sebastopol, and in 1856 was created a knight of the Legion of Honour. In 1858 he became a major in the army, and in 1859 a major in his own regiment. He married, in 1857, Catherine, relict of P J Joyce, Esq of Caltra Park, county Galway, and 2d daughter of John Page, Esq Since the death of the 9th Viscount Kenmure, on 1st September 1847, he is considered the nearest male heir of Sir John Gordon, the 12th laird of Lochinvar, (see KENMURE, Viscount of).

The Gordons of Park, Banffshire, distantly connected with the Letterfourie family, also possessed a baronetcy, conferred in 1686 The 4th baronet of this family was attainted for engaging in the rebellion of 1745, but the attainder was subsequently reversed

The family of Gordon Duff of Halkin, Ayrshire, inherit the baronetcy from James Duff, Esq, British consul at Cadiz, (see vol i. p. 71, art. DUFF,) created a baronet of the United Kingdom, Nov 12, 1818, with remainder to his nephew William Gordon, Esq, 2d son of Hon Alexander Gordon, a lord of session, under the title of Lord Rockville, and grandson of 2d earl of Aberdeen He succeeded as 2d baronet, on the death of Sir James Duff, in 1815, and having assumed, by royal license, the additional surname of Duff, he became Sir William Gordon Duff Born in April 1772, he married, in 1810, Caroline, daughter of Sir George Cornewall, Baronet, of Moccas Court, Herefordshire, and had by her 2 sons and 2 daughters. He died March 8, 1823

The elder son, Sir Alexander Cornewall, born Feb 8, 1811, became 3d baronet In 1854 he was appointed a senior clerk to the treasury, and was secretary to the chancellor of the exchequer In 1856 he became a commissioner of the board of Inland Revenue, and is assistant gentleman usher of the privy chamber to the Queen. He married, in 1840, Lucy, only child of John Austin, Esq, issue, a son, Maurice, born in Feb. 1849, and 2 daughters

The Gordons of Methlic and Haddo, progenitors of the earls of Aberdeen, are said to have descended uninterruptedly in the male line, while the other noble families of the name succeeded by female right to their estates and titles. The current tradition already referred to, that the Gordons derive their descent from Bertrand de Gordon, the slayer of Richard the Lion Heart, is applied particularly to this branch, and in accordance with it they bear for crest two arms about to shoot an arrow from a bow, with the motto, "Fortuna sequatur." In 1296 Sir William Gordon swore fealty to King Edward the First, for some lands in Berwickshire, which, according to Crawford, (Lives of the Officers of State, p. 266,) were the lands of Coldingknows, the ancient inheritance of the family of Haddo, celebrated as the scene of the old song, 'The broom of the Cowdenknows.' The son of this Sir William Gordon is said to have accompanied his cousin, Sir Adam Gordon, to the north of Scotland, when he got the lands of Strathbogie from Robert the First, and to have married the daughter and sole heiress of John de Catharista, lord of the barony of Methlic in Aberdeenshire. Owing, however, to the destruction of the family papers in the civil wars of 1644, the descent of the Gordons of Methlic and Haddo cannot now be clearly deduced from the Gordons of Coldingknows. The first authentic ancestor of the earls of Aberdeen was Patrick Gordon of Methlic, a firm friend of King James the Second, (Douglas' Peerage, vol. i. p. 16,) who joined the king's forces under the command of his cousin, the earl of Huntly, against the earl of Crawford, and was killed at the battle of Arbroath in 1445

His son, James Gordon of Methlic, obtained from King James the Second a grant of part of the barony of Kellie, then vested in the Crown by the forfeiture of Alexander earl of Crawford. He also acquired several other lands. He had, with two daughters, five sons Patrick, his successor, Robert, of Fetterletter, whose only daughter was married to John Gordon of Gight, Alexander, bishop of Aberdeen from 1516 to 1518, George, of Auchterhouse, and James, rector of Lonmay and prebendary of Aberdeen

Patrick, the eldest son, got charters from Kings James Third, Fourth, and Fifth, of various lands, and died before 11th September 1531 His eldest son, George, predeceased him, but having married a daughter of Hay of Dalgettie, he had a son, James Gordon of Haddo and Methlic, who succeeded his grandfather In 1567 he was one of the barons who signed the bond of association for the defence of the young prince, James the Sixth, but believing that Queen Mary, his mother, had been imposed upon, he soon joined the earl of Huntly, her lieutenant in the north, and adhered faithfully to her interest ever after He died in May 1582 By his wife, Margery, daughter of Sir Thomas Menzies of Pitfoddels, comptroller of Scotland in the reign of Queen Mary, he had six sons. David, the fourth son, was ancestor of the Gordons of Nethermuir

Patrick, the eldest son, died before his father, leaving a son, James, who succeeded to the estates, and had two sons, George and William The former predeceased him, but by his wife, Margaret, daughter of Sir Alexander Bannerman of Elsick, he left a son in his infancy, known in history as Sir John Gordon of Haddo, who succeeded his grandfather on his death in November 1624 Appointed by King Charles the First next in command to the marquis of Huntly in conducting the forces raised against the Covenanters in 1639, he behaved with great courage at the battle of Turriff on the 14th May of that year, in which the Gordons were victorious, a skirmish styled by the writers of the period "The trot of Turray," and distinguished as the occasion on which blood was first shed in the civil wars. The day after the action, the victors took possession of Aberdeen, and expelled the Covenanters from that city On the treaty of pacification being entered into between the king and his subjects in arms on the 20th June, the laird of Haddo repaired to his majesty, then at Newark, and, for his eminent services in the royal cause, was created a baronet in 1642 In November 1643, for opposing the Covenant, letters of intercommuning were issued by the convention against him, and an order granted for his apprehension, in pursuance of which the sheriff of Aberdeen, in January 1644, at the head of a large force, proceeded to his house of Kellie, but Sir John was not there On the rising of the marquis of Huntly for the king, he joined that nobleman, and sentence of excommunication was pronounced against them both by order of the committee of the General Assembly, on the 16th April of that year On the retreat of the marquis' forces, Sir John attempted to defend his house of Kellie against the marquis of Argyle, then at the head of the army appointed to quell the insurrection, but was obliged to capitulate unconditionally on 8th May He was sent to Edinburgh, and imprisoned in the western division of the cathedral of St. Giles, adjoining the old Tolbooth, and, in consequence, it acquired the name of "Haddo's Hole," which it still retains. On his trial he pleaded that he had the king's commission, and acted under his authority, but was condemned and beheaded, with the maiden, at the cross of Edinburgh, 19th July of the same year, one Captain Logie, also taken at Kellie being executed with him By his wife, Mary, daughter of William Forbes of Tolquhon, he had, with one daughter, two sons, Sir John, and Sir George, the latter the first earl of Aberdeen

Sir John, second baronet, was restored to the title and his father's forfeited estate in 1661, and died in 1665 His only daughter was married to Sir James Gordon of Lesmor

Sir George, the second son, third baronet and first earl of Aberdeen, born 3d October, 1637, succeeded his brother He was educated at the Marischal college, Aberdeen, where he was for some time a professor, but resigning that situation he went to the continent to study the civil law, and after his return to Scotland he was admitted advocate, 7th February 1668 Being sufficiently wealthy, it is recorded of him that he never took fees as an advocate, though he had abundance of clients, and many of them persons of the first rank [Crawford's Officers of State, pp 250 255] In the parliament of 1670 he was one of the commissioners for Aberdeenshire, and a project of union between Scotland and England being then contemplated by the court, he is stated to have objected to it, on the ground of injustice to the House of Hamilton In the parliament of 1673 he also represented the county of Aberdeen, and was appointed one of the committee nominated by the royal commissioners, to apportion the supply granted by parliament for the service of the king Sworn a privy councillor on 11th November 1678, he was appointed a lord of session on 8th June 1680, and named president of the court in a new commission issued to the judges on 14th October 1681 Through the influence of the duke of York, (afterwards James the Seventh,) he was appointed, by letters patent, dated 1st May 1682, lord chancellor of Scotland. Being in London at the time, he embarked that same week for Edinburgh with the duke in the Gloucester frigate, which, on the 5th of May, struck on the sandbank called the Lemon and Ore, near Yarmouth, and was lost The duke escaped from the cabin window into a boat, accompanied only by Sir George Gordon, the earl of Wintoun, and two gentlemen of his bedchamber, who drew their swords to prevent the people from crowding into and sinking the boat. In his anxiety for the safety of Sir George Gordon, the duke is said to have called out "Take care of my lord chancellor," which was the first public intimation of his having been intrusted with the great seal, and as none but peers or prelates had for several generations received the office, his appointment gave great offence to many of the nobility To meet this objection Sir George was, by letters patent dated at Whitehall, November 30, 1682, created by Charles the Second earl of Aberdeen, Viscount Formartine, Lord Haddo, Methlic, Tarves and Kellie. In conjunction with the duke of Queensberry, he had the chief management of affairs in Scotland for two years, when a difference occurred between him and some of his colleagues which led to his resignation The occasion was this. Owing to the severity of the laws against nonconformity, the churches were generally well attended by the landed gentlemen, but their wives, not being named in the act of parliament, did not accompany them The privy council, seeing that a husband and wife are one person in law, determined that a husband might be fined for his wife's offence as well as for his own. This decision was opposed by the lord chancellor on the ground that the act did not mention wives, and that as the statute provided a fine to be paid by the husbands for their wives going to conventicles, but none for their not going to church, they could not be legally fined for the latter offence. In consequence of this opinion, his lordship and the duke of Queensberry were sent for to court to give an account of it to the king, who decided the point against the earl, on which he resigned the chancellorship, when the earl of Perth was appointed to that office, 23d June 1684. The latter and the duke of Queensberry are said to have bribed the king's mistress, the duchess of Portsmouth, with a large sum of money, to procure his dismissal. At the Revolution the earl of Aberdeen retired to his estates to avoid taking the oaths to King William, and was repeatedly fined for his absence from parliament. On the accession of Queen Anne he took the oath of allegiance, and sat in one or two of the earlier sessions of her parliament, but did not attend the last parliament when the union was settled. He died at Kelloe 20th April 1720, in his 83d year By his countess Anne, daughter and heiress of George Lockhart of Torbrecks, he had, with four daughters, two sons, George Lord Haddo, who predeceased his father, and William, second earl

The second earl, while Lord Haddo, was chosen M P for Aberdeenshire, but unseated on petition After succeeding to the earldom, he was one of the sixteen Scots representative peers, and generally opposed ministers. He died 30th March, 1746, in his 70th year His fourth son, but third by his third wife, Lady Ann Gordon, daughter of the second duke of Gordon was the Hon Alexander Gordon, a lord of session under the title of Lord Rockville, from his estate in the county of Haddington, who died March 13, 1792 Lord Rockville's second son, William, inherited a baronetcy on the decease of his uncle Sir James Duff, of Halkin, and accordingly assumed the name of Duff in addition to his own

The eldest son of the second earl, George, third earl, was also one of the Scots representative peers, and died 13th August, 1801 With four daughters, he had two sons, George and William George, Lord Haddo, the elder son, died of injuries received by a fall from his horse, on 2d October 1791 By his wife, Mary, youngest daughter of William Baird, Esq of Newbyth, sister of Major-general Sir David Baird, he had six sons and one daughter Anna.

George Hamilton Gordon, the eldest son, born at Edinburgh 28th January 1784, became fourth earl, on the death of his grandfather in 1801 Educated at Harrow school, and at John's college, Cambridgeshire, where he graduated A M in 1804, he subsequently visited several parts of the continent and Greece, and, on his return, originated the Athenian Society, which limited its members to those who had visited Athens, on which account he is styled by Byron in his 'English Bards,' 'the travelled thane, Athenian Aberdeen" He was chosen one of the 16 Scots representative peers at the general election in 1806, rechosen in 1807, and invested with the order of the Thistle, 16th March 1808 In July 1813, he was sent on a special mission to Vienna, and was the means of bringing over Austria to the alliance with Britain against the Emperor Napoleon I He was present at the battles of Lützen and Bautzen It was in his quarters that Moreau died after receiving at Dresden his mortal wound He rode over the field of Leipsic in company with Humboldt, and he was present at Hanau. He it was also who prevailed upon Murat, King of Naples, to detach himself from his imperial brother-in-law, the great Napoleon In 1814 he was created Viscount Gordon of Aberdeen, in the peerage of the United Kingdom He was elected chancellor of King's college and university, Aberdeen, in 1837, appointed chancellor of the duchy of Lancaster in January 1828, remaining in that office till the following June, and was secretary of state for foreign affairs from 1828 to 1830, and colonial secretary in 1834-5. He was again appointed foreign secretary in September 1841, and retained that office till July 1846. His act in 1843 for admission of ministers to parish charges in Scotland was too late to save the disruption in the church, and in its working has not proved satisfactory. In 1815 he was appointed ranger of Greenwich Park, and in 1816 lord-lieutenant of Aberdeenshire. He was also president of the Society of Antiquaries, of which and of the Royal Society he was a member On 28th Dec. 1852, on the resignation of the earl of Derby, he was appointed prime minister when he formed a coalition administration which continued in power till 30th January 1855. His indecisive action and irresolute policy, with the terrible disasters resulting therefrom to the British army, on its first landing in the Crimea, rendered his administration unpopular, and after his resignation of office, he took no further part in public affairs. He m. first, in 1805, Lady Catherine Elizabeth Hamilton, daughter of first marquis of Abercorn, and she dying in 1812, without issue, he m. 2dly, in 1815, Harriet, daughter of Hon John Douglas, relict of James Viscount Hamilton, and mother of 2d marquis of Abercorn, issue, 4 sons and a dr Besides reviewing 'Gell's Topography of Troy,' in 1822 he published an 'Inquiry into the Principles of Beauty in Grecian Architecture' His taste in the fine arts was unquestioned, and his learning and private virtues gained him a high place in the estimation of his contemporaries. He died Dec. 14, 1860. His eldest son George John James, Lord Haddo, M P for Aberdeenshire, b in 1816, succeeded as fifth earl. He m. in 1840, Mary, 2d daughter of George Baillie, Esq of Jerviswoode, and 2d sister of 10th earl of Haddington, with issue, 8 sons and 3 daughters The eldest son, George Lord Haddo, was born Dec. 10, 1841

A brother of the 4th earl, Sir Alexander Gordon, K.C B, lieutenant-colonel in the army, aide-de-camp to his uncle Sir David Baird, and afterwards to the duke of Wellington, was killed at Waterloo. Another brother, Sir Robert Gordon, G C B, long an ambassador, died in 1847

GORDON, ALEXANDER, stated by KNOX and WODROW to have been the only Popish prelate who joined in the Reformation, was the son of John Lord Gordon, master of Huntly, by Margaret, natural daughter of King James the Fourth, and spent his youth in the company of James the Fifth, with whom he became a favourite He is supposed to have been educated abroad. During the absence of the bishop elect of Caithness in England, in 1514, that see was for a short time committed to his care On the death of Archbishop Dunbar, he was elected by the chapter to the vacant archbishopric of Glasgow, of which he was dispossessed by the earl of Arran, then governor of Scotland, who obtained a decision of the pope in favour of James Bethune, abbot of Arbroath, but, in recompense, Gordon was by his Holiness created titular archbishop of Athens, and shortly after, in November 1558, was by the earl of Arran made bishop of the Isles, and abbot of Inchaffray. He was also commendator of Icolmkill, to the temporalities of which he had been admitted on the 11th of the preceding March In 1558 he was translated to the see of Galloway He was present in the parliament of July 1560, when popery was abolished as the national religion, and readily acceded to the Reformation In January 1561 he subscribed, with others, the First Book of Discipline, by which he renounced both popery and prelacy, but with the saving proviso that the prelates who had already joined the cause should retain their benefices during life In 1562 he petitioned the General Assembly to be appointed superintendent of Galloway, and in the subsequent December was put on the leet for that office, but was unsuccessful in his object, though he was still continued as one of the commissioners for planting ministers and other office bearers in the church On 26th November 1565, having been previously sworn a privy councillor, he was made an extraordinary lord of session These dignities, says Knox, so uplifted him that he now refused the title of superintendent, for which he had some years ago humbly petitioned the Assembly, "and now he would no more be called overlooker or overseer of Galloway, but bishop" His name appears at the bond granted to Bothwell on 20th April 1567 The same year he resigned the rents of the see of Galloway into the king's hands, in favour of his son, Mr John Gordon, who was then pursuing his studies in France He afterwards joined the party of the queen Accusations were upon several occasions brought in the Assembly against him for not visiting his charge, and neglect of duty in preaching and planting kirks, and, in 1568, he was inhibited from exercising any functions in the church

In June 17, 1571, he preached in the pulpit of John Knox, at the desire of the lords who had met at Edinburgh in arms for the queen's defence During the captivity of the unfortunate Mary he made several journeys into England, to treat with the English commissioners on her behalf In August 1573 he was ordered by the Assembly to be excommunicated, for non-appearance to their citations In 1575 he appeared before the Assembly, and gave verbal answers to the charges brought against him, and made due submission otherwise, when he was restored to his functions, excepting as a commissioner of visitation He died in 1576 By his wife, Barbara Logie, daughter of the laird of Logie, he had John Gordon, the subject of the following notice, Lawrence Gordon, lord of Glenluce, two other sons, and a daughter

GORDON, JOHN, D D, a learned divine of the Church of England, eldest son of the preceding, was born in Scotland in 1544, and studied "philosophie and other sciences" in St Leonard's college, St Andrews, and Baliol college, Oxford In June 1565 he was sent by his father to France, to complete his education at the desire of Mary queen of Scots, who allowed him a yearly pension, for his better maintenance in that kingdom He attended the universities of Paris and Orleans, and soon became celebrated for his acquirements, particularly for his skill in the oriental languages In a charter of the bishopric of Galloway, and abbey of Tongland, conferred upon him during his stay in France, on the resignation of his father, in order to preserve the revennes in the family, his knowledge of Hebrew, Chaldaic, Syriac, Greek, and Latin, is specially commended

After finishing his studies, it appears that he became an attendant of the prince of Conde, who was slain at Brissac in 1569 Coming over to England he entered the retinue of the duke of Norfolk, on whose imprisonment he attended for a short time on Queen Mary during her captivity, and by her was sent back, with high recommendations, to France, where he was appointed gentleman in ordinary to King Charles the Ninth He held the same office in the household of Henry the Third and Henry the Fourth From each of these sovereigns he had a yearly pension of four hundred French crowns In 1568, he and the bishop of Ross, with the Lords Livingstone and Boyd, went to York as commissioners for Queen Mary, to meet the English commissioners, and answer the accusations brought against her by the regent Murray He afterwards returned to France, where, during the dreadful massacre of Paris, in 1572, he was instrumental in saving many of his countrymen of the Reformed religion, to which he himself belonged Two years thereafter, he had a public disputation in Hebrew in the town of Avignon, in presence of the bishop of that see, and seven other prelates, against the principal Rabbi of the Jewish synagogue in that place, called Rabbi Benetrius, which disputation was afterwards published In 1601 he again appeared as a public disputant against Cardinal Peron, and other Roman Catholic divines, on which occasion he was assisted by Tilenus and Dumoulin, and completely overpowered his opponents by his learning and skill in argument This disputation had been appointed by Henry the Fourth, with the view of converting his sister, the duchess of Lorraine, to the Romish Faith At the earnest entreaty of that princess, Gordon was induced to come forward, and the result was, that the duchess was more confirmed than ever in the truth of the Reformed religion, to which she adhered till her death

On the accession of James the Sixth to the throne of England, his majesty sent for Gordon from France, and in October 1603 made him dean of Salisbury, with the episcopal jurisdiction of eighty parishes He was present, by the king's appointment, at a conference, which his majesty held at Hampton Court with the bishops and others of the clergy, and is mentioned in a treatise, afterwards published by William Barlow, dean of Chester, as one "whom his majestie singled out with a speciall encomium, that he was a man weill travelled in the auncients," &c In 1605, he received the degree of D D, at Oxford, in the king's presence, on his majesty's first visit to that university He died in his triennial visitation at Lewson House, in Dorsetshire, on September 3d, 1619, in his 75th year, and was buried in the choir of the Cathedral church of Salisbury He was twice married first, in 1576, to the widow Anthonette de Marolles, by whom he obtained the lordship of Longormes in France; and, secondly, in 1594, to Genevieve Betau, daughter of the first president of the court of parliament in Brittany, by whom he had an only daughter, Louise, married to Sir Robert Gordon of Gordonstoun, the historian of the Sutherland family

GORDON, SIR ROBERT, of Gordonstoun, baronet, author of the 'Genealogical History of the Family of Sutherland,' was born at Dunrobin, May 14, 1580. He was the fourth son of the eleventh earl of Sutherland, by Lady Jean Gordon, daughter of the fourth earl of Huntly, who had been first married to the earl of Bothwell In 1598 he was sent with his brother to the university of St Andrews, where they remained six months, and afterwards finished their education at Edinburgh In January 1603 he went over to France to study the civil law, and perfect himself in all the accomplishments of a gentleman, and remained there till October 1605, when he returned home In 1606 he was appointed a gentleman of the privy chamber to King James the Sixth In 1609 he was knighted, and received a pension of £200 sterling a-year for life out of the exchequer of England In February 1613 he married at London Louisa, only daughter and heiress of Dr John Gordon, dean of Salisbury, with whom he received the lordship of Glenluce and other large possessions, both in France and Scotland

On the death of his brother in 1615 he became guardian and tutor of his nephew, John, thirteenth earl of Sutherland In March of the same year, having attended the king to Cambridge, he received, with several other noblemen and gentlemen, the degree of M A, which was conferred upon them with great solemnity In 1617 James I came to Scotland for the first time since his accession to the English throne, and as he was accompanied by a great number of the English nobility, all sorts of sports, shows, recreations, and exercises were performed for their entertainment Amongst others, there was a competition of archery in the garden of Holyrood, when Sir Robert Gordon gained the prize, being a silver arrow He remained in Scotland for some time, and having settled his affairs in Sutherland, in November 1619 he returned with his family to England, and in the succeeding May visited France, when he disposed of his property of Longormes to Walter Stewart, because he could not attend to his estates in the three kingdoms of England, Scotland, and France In 1621 he returned to Sutherland, when he relieved the estates of the earl of a great amount of debt with which they were burdened, to the hazard of his own property, for which he cared little so that the house of Sutherland might flourish In 1623, the earl of Caithness being proclaimed a rebel, Sir Robert Gordon received a commission from the privy council to proceed with fire and sword against him, when he took possession of Castle Sinclair, the chief residence of the earls of Caithness, which had been abandoned by the earl, who had fled to the Orkneys Having quieted the county of Caithness, he returned with his army into Sutherland, and soon after went back to the court in England

In 1624 he was appointed one of the commissioners of the estates of the young duke of Lennox, and two years thereafter, one of his grace's curators On the accession of Charles I he was continued in his office of a gentleman in ordinary of the king's privy chamber, and in 1625, when his majesty created the order of baronets of Nova Scotia, Sir Robert Gordon was made the first baronet, when he obtained a charter of the barony of Gordon in that province

In August 1629 he was appointed sheriff of Inverness, and in May 1630 was sent by the lords of the council with Sir William Seton into the north to quell some disturbances that had broken out in that quarter On the 13th of July the same year he was, by James, duke of Lennox, lord high chamberlain of Scotland, appointed his vice-chamberlain during his absence in France After having governed the earldom of Sutherland with great moderation, judgment, and discretion for fifteen years, he resigned the administration of the same to his nephew, the earl, on his attaining his majority in November 1630 At the coronation of Charles I in Scotland in 1633, he, as vice chamberlain, with four earls' sons, carried the king's train from the castle to the abbey, and the next year he was sworn of his majesty's privy council in Scotland Sir Robert died in 1656, in his 76th year He was the ancestor of the family of Gordonstoun, to whom he bequeathed a large estate in the county of Elgin, and now represented by Sir William Gordon Cumming, baronet His 'Genealogical History of the earldom of Sutherland, from its origin to the year 1630,' with a continuation by Gilbert Gordon of Sallach, to the year 1651, was published in 1813, from the original manuscripts in the possession of the marchioness of Stafford, afterwards duchess of Sutherland A catalogue of the singular and curious library originally formed between 1610 and 1650, drawn up by Sir Robert, was published in 1815.

GORDON, Robert, of Straloch, an eminent geographical and antiquarian writer, second son of Sir John Gordon of Pitlurg, was born at Kinmundy, Aberdeenshire, September 14, 1580 His father was held in such high estimation by James the Sixth, that he was invited by that monarch to the baptism of his son, Prince Charles He was educated at Marischal college, Aberdeen, (founded in 1593, by George, fifth earl Marischal,) and was the first graduate of that university In 1598, to complete his studies, he went to Paris, and returned home on his father's death in 1600 Eight years afterwards, on his marriage with a daughter of Alexander Irvine of Lenturk, he bought the estate of Straloch in his native county, and thenceforth devoted his attention chiefly to geographical and antiquarian pursuits In 1619 he succeeded his brother in the estate of Pitlurg In 1641, at the request of Charles the First, he undertook the correction and superintendence of a complete Atlas of Scotland, which was published in 1648, by the celebrated map publishers, the Messrs Blaeu of Amsterdam, with a dedication to Sir John Scott of Scotstarvet A second edition appeared in 1655, and a third in 1664 This work, styled 'Theatrum Scotiæ,' comprises forty-six maps, seven of which were executed, mostly from actual survey and mensuration, by Mr Gordon himself, who appended interesting descriptions and treatises on the antiquities of Scotland, &c Besides this work, he wrote a critical letter in Latin to Mr David Buchanan, containing Strictures on the Histories of Boece, Buchanan, and Knox, and on Buchanan's treatise, 'De Jure Regni apud Scotos,' a preface intended for Spottiswood's History, and various other pieces, some of which have been printed in the Spalding Club volumes. He likewise compiled a History of the family of Gordon, and collected materials for a History of his own times, which he did not live to complete. He died in August 1661, in the 81st year of his age. His portrait by Jamesone is preserved in the public hall of Marischal college, Aberdeen There is also one by the same celebrated artist in possession of the representative of the family, Mr. Gordon-Cuming-Skene of Pitlurg and Dyce. From an engraving in Smith's Iconographia Scotica, the subjoined woodcut is taken

His fifth son, Mr James Gordon, minister of Rothiemay, assisted him in his geographical labours, and prepared from his papers a 'History of Scots Affairs from 1637 to 1641,' which has been printed by the Spalding Club, in 3 vols He also published a highly curious map of Edinburgh, with views of some of the then chief buildings of that city, when it was chiefly confined to the ridge of the old town He constructed also a plan of the cities of Old and New Aberdeen, which was engraved in Holland at the expense of the corporation, who presented Mr Gordon with a silk hat, and a silver cup, weighing twenty ounces, besides making a donation to his lady To accompany his plan he wrote a 'Description of bothe towns of Aberdeen,' which has been printed in one of the volumes of the Spalding Club He also composed, in 1646, a comprehensive book of practical divinity

GORDON, Patrick, author of the 'Famous Historie of the renowned and valiant Robert the Bruce,' was, about the beginning of the seventeenth century, according to Dempster, employed as the king's envoy to Poland Mr. Pinkerton supposes him to have been a man of property, a conclusion which Dr Irving conjectures seems to have been drawn from Gordon's styling himself gentleman But, as Waterhouse observes in his 'Humble Apology for Learning and Learned Men,' published in 1653, "all men learnedly bred, and members of universities and houses of law, are by consent of Christendom, as well as our own nation, accounted gentlemen, and warranted to write themselves so, be their extract how mean and ignote soever" The memorials preserved of Patrick Gordon are very scanty He was the author of the following poems, 'Neptunus Britannicus Corydonis De Luctuoso Henrici Principis Obitu,' London, 1613, 'The famous Historie of Penardo and Laisso, otherwise called the Warre of Love and Ambition, doone in heroik verse,' Dort, 1615, to this poem a panegyrical sonnet by Drummond is prefixed, 'The famous Historie of the renowned and valiant Prince Robert, surnamed the Bruce, King of Scotland, and of sundrie other valiant knights, both Scots and English, enlarged with an addition of the Scottishe Kings lineallie descended from him, to Charles now Prince A Historie both pleasant and profitable, set forthe and done in heroik verse by Patrick Gordon, Gentleman,' Dort, 1615, 4to, Edinburgh, 1718, 12mo, Glasgow, 1753, 12mo Both these poems in English are incomplete, consisting only of the first book each The history of Bruce, which is of considerable length, and written in the octave stanza, contains some striking passages, though not as a whole entitled to be considered a work of much merit, possessing, as Dr Irving observes, neither the dignity of an epic poem, nor the authenticity of a historical narration

GORDON, JOHN, first viscount Kenmure, a nobleman eminent for his piety, was the son of Sir Robert Gordon of Lochinvar, in Galloway, by his wife, Lady Isabel Ruthven, daughter of the first earl of Gowrie, and was born about 1599 The family to which he belonged were celebrated for their attachment to Presbyterian principles, and he himself was the friend of Welch, Gillespie, Livingston, and Rutherford After finishing his studies, he travelled on the continent, and while there he resided in the house of the famous John Welch, who was then settled as a minister at St Jean d'Angely in France, having been banished from Scotland for his connection with the proceedings of the General Assembly held at Aberdeen in 1605 On his return home Kenmure exerted himself with success in getting Anwoth, the parish in which the family residence was situated, disjoined from two other parishes with which it was united, and, through his influence, Mr Samuel Rutherford was appointed minister of the new charge in 1627, which his lordship ever after considered the most meritorious action of his life

He succeeded his father in the family estates and honours in November 1628, and having preferred a claim, in right of his mother, to the earldom of Gowrie, attainted for treason, he sold the barony of Stitchell, the ancient inheritance of his house, in order to obtain the means of bribing the duke of Buckingham to support his pretensions, and is said to have given the price to his grace the evening before his assassination by Felton, in consequence of which he not only lost his money, but was disappointed in his object He had previously married Lady Jane Campbell, sister to the celebrated marquis of Argyle, beheaded in 1661, a lady of uncommon piety and worth, by whom he had several children, only one of whom, a son, survived him, but died a minor in 1639

At the coronation of Charles the First in 1633, Sir John Gordon was created viscount of Kenmure and lord of Lochinvar, by patent dated May 8 of that year He attended the parliament which met at Edinburgh in the succeeding June, but was present only the first day, for, not wishing to join those who opposed the king's measures relative to the church, lest he should displease his majesty, he withdrew, under pretence of indisposition, and retired to his residence at Kenmure castle, a proceeding which afterwards caused him the most poignant regret Private business called him again to Edinburgh, in August, 1634, but in a few days he returned home in very bad health, which increased till the 12th September, when he died at Kenmure in his 35th year He was attended on his deathbed by Mr Samuel Rutherford, who wrote a tract entitled 'The last and heavenly Speeches and glorious Departure of John Viscount

Kenmure,' printed in Edinburgh in 1649, 'by Evan Tyler, printer to the king's most excellent majesty,' and reprinted at Edinburgh in 1827, with an introductory memoir of Lord Kenmure by Mr Thomas Murray, author of 'The Literary History of Galloway' Rutherford also composed a long elegiac poem on his death, entitled 'In Joanem Gordonum Kenmurii Vicecomitem Apotheosis,' which still remains in manuscript To this nobleman Rutherford dedicated his first work, 'Exercitationes Apologeticæ pro Divina Gratia, contra Arminium,' &c An interesting account of Lord Kenmure's resigned behaviour during his last illness is inserted in Howie's 'Scots Worthies' Lady Kenmure, his widow, was, on 21st September, 1640, married to the Hon Sir Harry Montgomery of Giffen, second son of Alexander, sixth earl of Eglinton, without issue She was the constant correspondent of Rutherford, the last of whose letters to her is dated in September 1659 She attained to great age, and was alive in 1672

GORDON, Robert, founder of an hospital at Aberdeen, son of Arthur Gordon, advocate in Edinburgh, the ninth son of Robert Gordon of Straloch, whose life is given on page 329, was born about 1665 In early life he travelled on the Continent, where he spent his patrimony, amounting to about eleven hundred pounds He afterwards went to Dantzic, where he engaged in trade, and, having acquired a small fortune, he returned to Scotland about the beginning of the 18th century, and went to reside at Aberdeen Though styled merchant—a title in that city bestowed on any mere shopkeeper,—he does not appear to have entered into business He was noted for his extreme parsimony,—arising, it is said, from a disappointment in love, which enabled him at his death to bequeath a sum of £10,300, for the purpose of erecting and maintaining an hospital at Aberdeen, which is called after his name, for the education and support of a certain number of boys, the sons of decayed merchants and guild brethren of that burgh. He died in January 1732

GORDON, Alexander, an antiquarian writer of some note, an accomplished draughtsman, and excellent Greek scholar, was born in Scotland about the end of the seventeenth century, but the precise date of his birth has not been recorded. While yet young, he visited various parts of the Continent, and resided in Italy for some years. After his return he published various works, a list of which is subjoined In 1736 he was appointed secretary to the society for the encouragement of learning, with a salary of fifty pounds He afterwards acted for a short time as secretary to the Egyptian club, which was composed of persons who had visited Egypt In 1739 he succeeded Dr Stukely as secretary to the Antiquarian Society, which situation he resigned in 1741, when he went with Governor Glen to Carolina in North America, where besides receiving a grant of land, he was appointed registrar of the province, made a justice of peace, and filled several other offices He died there about 1750, leaving a large estate to his family

GORDON, Thomas, an industrious political writer, the son of the proprietor of Gairloch, in the parish of Kells, stewartry of Kirkcudbright, was born there towards the close of the 17th century After receiving a university education, either at Aberdeen or St Andrews, it is uncertain which, he settled in London as a classical teacher He afterwards commenced party writer, and is said to have been employed by the earl of Oxford in Queen Anne's reign He first distinguished himself in the Bangorian Controversy by publishing two pamphlets in defence of Bishop Hoadly, which recommended him to Mr Trenchard, a zealous writer on the Whig side, the author of a work entitled 'The Natural History of Superstition,' who engaged him as his amanuensis, and afterwards admitted him into partnership as an author In January 1720 they began to publish in conjunction a weekly political paper, entitled 'The Independent Whig,' which was continued for a year, and was renewed by Gordon after Mr Trenchard's death In November of the same year they began in the London, and subsequently in the British Journal, a series of papers on public subjects, under the name of 'Cato's Letters,' which were afterwards collected into four volumes, and reached a second edition in 1737 These two publications, and especially the 'Independent Whig,' were directed against the hierarchy of the Church of England, and had an express tendency to bring all religion into contempt Having been taken into the pay of Sir Robert Walpole, Gordon wrote several pamphlets in defence of his administration, for which that minister procured him the place of commissioner of wine licenses In 1728 appeared his translation of Tacitus, in two vols folio, which, with his version of the works of Sallust, published in 1744, has contributed more than his political writings to preserve his name He died July 28, 1750, at the age of sixty His works are

GORDON, Lord George, whose name is inseparably connected with the celebrated riots of 1780, 3d son of Cosmo George, 3d duke of Gordon, was born in December 1750 At an early period of life he entered the navy, in which he rose to the rank of lieutenant, but quitted the service during the American war In 1774 he was returned member for Ludgershall, a pocket borough, belonging to Lord Melbourne, which place he represented for several sessions, rendering himself conspicuous by his zealous opposition to ministers As, however, he animadverted with great freedom and often with great wit, on the proceedings of both sides of the House, it was usual at that period to say, "that there were three parties in parliament, the ministry, the opposition, and Lord George Gordon"

A bill introduced by Sir George Saville having, in 1778, passed the legislature, for the relief of Roman Catholics from certain penalties and disabilities, the excitement produced throughout the country in consequence was immense, and numerous societies were formed, and, among others, the Protestant Association at London, of which Lord George Gordon was elected president in November 1779, for the purpose of endeavouring to procure its repeal On the 2d of June 1780 his lordship headed a vast multitude, consisting of the members of the Protestant Association, and about one hundred thousand of the excited inhabitants of the metropolis, in procession to the House of Commons, to present a petition against the obnoxious measure This gave rise to a dreadful riot, which lasted for several days, and which was not suppressed till after the destruction of many Catholic chapels and dwelling-houses, the prison of Newgate, and the mansion of the chief justice, Lord Mansfield At one time, the King's Bench, Fleet Prison, Borough Clink, and Surry Bridewell, were all in flames at once, and the prisoners, with the inmates of Newgate, set at liberty to join the mob in the work of devastation On Friday the 9th a warrant of the privy council was issued for the arrest of Lord George Gordon, charged with high treason, in attempting to raise and levy war and insurrection against the king His trial took place on 5th February following, when no evidence being adduced of treasonable design, his lordship was necessarily acquitted. On this occasion he had for his counsel Mr, afterwards Lord, Kenyon, and the Hon. Thomas Erskine, afterwards lord chancellor.

Lord George's subsequent conduct could only be regarded by all rational men as that of an insane and dangerous enthusiast In May 1786 he was excommunicated by the archbishop of Canterbury for contempt, for refusing to come forward as a witness in a court of law He then published a 'Letter from Lord George Gordon to the Attorney General of England, in which the motives of his Lordship's public conduct from the beginning of 1780 to the present time are vindicated,' 1787, 8vo In April of that year two prosecutions were brought against him at the instance of the Crown, for a libel on the queen of France, the unfortunate Marie Antoinette, and the French ambassador, and for preparing and presenting a petition reflecting on the laws and criminal justice of the country Being convicted on both charges, he was sentenced to imprisonment for two years on the one, and for three years on the other, to pay a fine of five hundred pounds, and find securities for his good behaviour In the interval between the verdict and the passing of the sentence, Lord George retired to Holland, where, however, he was arrested, and conveyed to England After residing for some time in Birmingham, he was, in December 1788, apprehended and committed to Newgate, where he spent the remainder of his days In July 1789 he addressed a petition to the National Assembly of France, praying for its interference in his favour with the British government But Lord Grenville, then secretary of state for foreign affairs, acquainted those who made application on his behalf, that their wishes could not be complied with, of which Lord George was duly informed From this time the lonely hours of his confinement were devoted to reading, and the study of ancient and modern history He died November 1, 1793, of a fever, and his last moments were embittered by the knowledge that he could not be buried amongst the Jews, whose religion he had, some time before his apprehension, embraced, and all the rites and duties of which he zealously performed He was kept in confinement ten months longer than his prescribed term of imprisonment, in consequence of not being able to obtain the necessary security for his enlargement.

GORDON, Robert, D D, an eminent minister and one of the fathers of the Free protesting church of Scotland, was born in the parish of Glencairn, Dumfries-shire, in 1786 His first appointment was that of assistant master in the Perth academy Having early distinguished himself by the depth and accuracy of his mathematical knowledge, he was employed by Sir David Brewster to write the articles on Euclid, Geography, and Meteorology for the Edinburgh Encyclopedia. In 1816 he was presented by Lord Gray to the parish of Kinfauns near Perth, and in 1820 was translated to the old Chapel of Ease in St Cuthbert's parish, Buccleuch Street, Edinburgh, which soon proving too small for the crowded congregation which assembled to hear him, Hope Park church (also a Chapel of Ease) in that city was erected for him In 1825 he was translated to the New North church of Edinburgh, and in 1830 to the High church of that city, a charge considered the first in the Church of Scotland Naturally of a humble and retiring disposition, he never made himself conspicuous in church politics, but when he publicly declared his adherence to the principles and policy of the non-intrusion party in the church, perhaps no other name in Scotland carried with it so much weight among the educated and reflecting classes of his countrymen His intrepidity and unswerving firmness in the cause of truth caused him to make his appearance at the bar of the court of session on 16th June 1839, to give the comfort of his presence to the presbytery of Dunkeld, when they were called up to receive the censure of the civil court for disregarding an interdict in the settlement of a minister in the parish of Lethendy At the convocation in Edinburgh in November 1842, of twelve hundred ministers and elders specially assembled to consider the crisis in the Church of Scotland, which appeared to render a disruption inevitable, Dr Gordon was called upon to preside. The solemn words of his address gave a fitting tone and character to the proceedings on that momentous occasion The author of the 'Ten Years' Conflict' has well described it as "an address whose deep solemnity and unstudied yet dignified simplicity made it come home to every heart like the words of a martyr's confession" At the disruption in the following May, he was one of the ministers who left the Established Church, and he was followed by almost the whole of his congregation He died 21st October 1853, universally lamented. As a preacher Dr Gordon stood in the very front rank of the Scottish ministry of his time After his death, was published from his sermons, a valuable and important work, entitled 'Christ as made known to the Ancient Church,' vols i and ii embracing the historical books of Scripture, in 1854, demy 8vo, and vols iii and iv the prophetic books in 1855

GOURLAY, a surname originally English, and evidently derived from lands of that name. According to Edmund Howe's History of England (p. 153), Ingelramus de Gourlay accompanied William the Lion to Scotland about 1174, after his captivity, and is mentioned in a charter by that monarch about 1200 He was the progenitor of all the Scottish Gourlays. His son, Hugo de Gourlay, appears to have been possessed of lands both in Fife and the Lothians, and his descendants were styled of Kincraig, in the parish of Kilconquhar in the former county, an estate which still belongs to the family The name of his great-grandson, William de Gourlay de Bagally, is mentioned in the Ragman Roll, as one of those barons who swore fealty to Edward the First of England, in 1296

Gow, a surname derived from a Gaelic word signifying Smith. Cowan, when not a modulation of Colquhoun, is the same word as Gowan, and has the same meaning The surname M'Gowan is the English Smithson "The Gows," says Lower, in his Essay on English Surnames, (vol i p. 104,) "were once as numerous in Scotland as the Smiths in England, and would be so at this time had not many of them, at a very recent date, translated the name to Smith"

GOW, NEIL, renowned for his skill in playing the violin, of humble origin, was born at Inver, near Dunkeld, Perthshire, March 22, 1727 He early displayed a taste for music, and was almost entirely self-taught till about his thirteenth year, when he received some instructions from John Cameron, an attendant of Sir George Stewart of Grandtully. His progress as a musician was singularly rapid. A public trial having been proposed amongst a few of the best performers in that part of the country, young Neil was prevailed on to engage in the contest, when the prize was decreed to him, the judge, who was blind, declaring that "he could distinguish the stroke of Neil's bow among a hundred players" Having obtained the notice, first, of the Athol family, and afterwards of the duchess of Gordon, he was soon introduced to the admiration of the fashionable world, and enjoyed the countenance and distinguished patronage of the principal nobility and gentry of Scotland till his death As a performer on the violin he was unequalled "The livelier airs" says Dr M'Knight, in the Scots Magazine for 1809, "which belong to the class of what are called the strathspey and reel, and which have long been peculiar to the northern part of the island, assumed in his hand a style of spirit, fire, and beauty, which had never been heard before There is perhaps no species whatever of music executed on the violin, in which the characteristic expression depends more on the power of the bow, particularly in what is called the upward or returning stroke, than the Highland reel Here, accordingly, was Gow's forte His bow-hand, as a suitable instrument of his genius, was uncommonly powerful, and where the note produced by the up-bow was often feeble and indistinct in other hands, it was struck in his playing with a strength and certainty which never failed to surprise and delight the skilful hearer To this extraordinary power of the bow, in the hand of this great original genius, must be ascribed the singular felicity of expression which he gave to all his music, and the native Highland gout of certain tunes, such as 'Tullochgorum,' in which his taste and style of bowing could never be exactly reached by any other performer We may add the effect of the sudden shout with which he frequently accompanied his playing in the quick tunes, and which seemed instantly to electrify the dancers, inspiring them with new life and energy, and rousing the spirits of the most inanimate"

Neil Gow excelled also in the composition of Scottish melodies, and his sets of the older tunes, and various of his own airs, were prepared for publication by his son Nathaniel In private life Neil Gow was distinguished by his unpretending manners, his homely humour, strong good sense and knowledge of the world His figure was vigorous and manly, and the expression of his countenance spirited and intelligent His whole appearance exhibited so characteristic a model of a Scottish Highlander, that his portrait was at one period to be found in all parts of the country A woodcut of it is subjoined

Four admirable likenesses of him were painted by the late Sir Henry Raeburn, one for the County Hall, Perth, and the others for the duke of Athol, Lord Gray, and the Hon William Maule, created in 1831 Lord Panmure His portrait was also introduced into the view of a 'Highland Wedding,' by Mr Allan, with that of Donald Gow, his brother, who usually accompanied him on the violoncello

Neil Gow died at Inver March 1, 1807, in the 80th year of his age He was twice married first, to Margaret Wiseman, by whom he had five sons and three daughters, and secondly to Margaret Urquhart, but had no issue by her Three sons and two daughters predeceased him, and besides Nathaniel, the subject of the following notice, he left another son, John, who long resided in London, as leader of the fashionable Scottish bands there, and died in 1827

GOW, NATHANIEL, an eminent violin player, teacher, and composer of music, the youngest son of the preceding, was born at Inver, near Dunkeld, May 28, 1766 Having exhibited early indications of a talent for music, his father soon began to give him instructions on the violin, and afterwards sent him to Edinburgh, where he studied first under M'Intosh, and subsequently under M'Glashan, at that period two well known violinists, and the latter especially an excellent composer of Scottish airs He took lessons on the violoncello from Joseph Reneagle, afterwards professor of music at Oxford In 1782 he was appointed one of his majesty's trumpeters for Scotland, and on the death of his elder brother, William, in 1791, he succeeded him as leader of the band formerly conducted by M'Glashan at Edinburgh, a situation which he held for nearly forty years with undiminished reputation

In 1796 he and Mr William Shepherd entered into partnership in Edinburgh, as music-sellers, and the business was continued till 1813, when, on the death of the latter, it was given up He afterwards resumed it, in company with his son Neil, the composer of 'Bonny Prince Charlie,' and other beautiful melodies, who died in 1823 The business was finally relinquished in 1827, having involved him in losses, which reduced him to a state of bankruptcy

Between 1799 and 1824 Nathaniel Gow published his six celebrated collections of Reels and Strathspeys, a Repository of Scots Slow Airs, Strathspeys, and Dances, in 4 vols , Scots Vocal Melodies, 2 vols , a collection of Ancient Curious Scots Melodies, and various other pieces, all arranged by himself In some of the early numbers he was assisted by his father, and these came out under the name of Neil Gow and Son

During the long period of his professional career, his services as conductor were in constant request at all the fashionable parties that took place throughout Scotland, and he frequently received large sums for attending with his band at country parties. He was a great favourite with George the Fourth, and on his visits to London had the honour of being invited to play at the private parties of his majesty, when prince of Wales, at Carlton House Such was the high estimation in which he was held by the nobility and gentry of his native country, that his annual balls were always most numerously and fashionably attended, and among the presents which at various times were made to him were, a massive silver goblet, in 1811, from the earl of Dalhousie, a fine violoncello by Sir Peter Murray of Ochtertyre;

and a valuable violin by Sir Alexander Don of Newton Don, baronet. As a teacher of the violin and piano-forte accompaniment he was paid the highest rate of fees, and he had for pupils the children of the first families in the kingdom

In March 1827 he was compelled, by his reduced circumstances, and while suffering under a severe illness, to make an appeal to his former patrons and the public for support, by a ball, which produced him about £300, and which was continued annually for three years The noblemen and gentlemen of the Caledonian Hunt were not unmindful of the merits of one who had done so much for the national music of Scotland, as they voted him, on his distresses becoming known, £50 yearly during his life, and he every year received a handsome present from the Hon William Maule, subsequently Lord Panmure He died January 17, 1831, aged 65 He was twice married first, to Janet Fraser, by whom he had five daughters and one son, and, secondly, in 1811, to Mary Hogg, by whom he had three sons and two daughters, one of whom, Mary, was married to Mr Jenkins, London, another, Jessie, was the wife of Mr Luke, treasurer of George Heriot's Hospital, and a third, Augusta, became a teacher of music

GOWRIE, Earl of, a title (attainted in 1600) in the peerage of Scotland, conferred in 1581 on William, fourth Lord Ruthven of Dirleton, (see RUTHVEN, Lord) second but eldest surviving son of the third Lord Ruthven, the principal actor in the murder of Rizzio In that transaction he was also engaged, and in consequence fled to England with his father after whose death he obtained the queen's pardon, through the intercession of the earl of Morton He joined the association against the earl of Bothwell, in 1567, and on the surrender of the queen to the confederated lords at Carberry Hill on the 15th June of that year, he and Lord Lindsay conducted her in disguise, the following night, to Lochleven castle. He is stated to have been one of the nobles who, by menaces, forced the hapless Mary, on the 24th July following, to sign a resignation of the crown, but he does not appear to have been present on the occasion He was, however, conjoined with Lord Lindsay in the commission extorted from her, empowering them in her name to renounce the government. Throckmorton, the English ambassador in Scotland, writing to Queen Elizabeth on the 14th July, says "The Lord Ruthven is employed in another commission, because he began to show great favour to the queen, and to give her intelligence." He supported the regent Moray at the battle of Langside, and in June of the same year he did farther service to the king's party, by preventing the earl of Huntly with a thousand foot from the north, from joining the earls of Argyle and Arran, and these noblemen, who favoured the queen were, in consequence, obliged to disband their forces. On 24th June, 1571, his lordship was made treasurer for life. In 1577 he joined the other lords against his former friend, the earl of Morton, and on 24th March 1578 he was sworn a member of the king's privy council On 12th June of the same year he appears as commissioner for the city of Perth, then called St. Johnstone, of which town, as his father and grandfather had been, he was also provost. The same year he was appointed lieutenant of the borders in place of the earl of Angus, and on 25th November nominated one of the extraordinary lords of session He became the bitter enemy of the regent Morton, on account of the latter taking the part of Andrew, Lord Oliphant, in certain legal proceedings arising out of the mutual slaughter of each other's followers, while at deadly feud, on 1st November 1580 Lord Ruthven was tried and acquitted Lord Oliphant's trial is not recorded In the following year Lord Ruthven was one of the chief of the nobility who brought Morton to the scaffold On 23d August 1581, he was created earl of Gowrie, and obtained a considerable part of the lands belonging to the monastery of Scone. [Douglas' Peerage, vol i. p. 602] He was the principal of the confederated nobles engaged in the "Raid of Ruthven," 23d August 1582, the alleged object of which was the defence of the religion and liberties of the kingdom, but in reality to procure the dismissal of the king's favourites, the duke of Lennox and Stewart, earl of Arran, and to obtain possession of the king's person James had been enjoying the sports of the field in Athol, when he was invited by the earl of Gowrie to Ruthven castle, now called Huntingtower, in the parish of Tippermuir, Perthshire. The morning after his arrival, the associated lords appeared in his apartment, and presented a remonstrance against Lennox and Arran, when finding himself a prisoner, the king, after threatening and entreating them by turns, at last burst into tears. The master of Glammis, one of the confederates, fiercely exclaimed to his companions, some of whom were relenting, "No matter for his tears better children weep than bearded men!" James was first removed to Perth and afterwards to Edinburgh, most sedulously guarded by Gowrie and the noblemen concerned in the enterprise, but in the following May he effected his escape from them at St Andrews A new privy council was immediately appointed, and the king published a declaration, in which he stated, that though duly sensible of the treasonable attempt upon his person at Ruthven castle, he was willing to forgive all past offences, if the actors in that exploit would crave pardon in due time, and not be guilty of any further treason against him Through the advice of Sir James Melville the earl of Gowrie was pardoned by the king, who soon visited him again at the castle of Ruthven, where, after being royally entertained by his lordship, the latter fell down upon his knees, and most humbly professed his sorrow for his share in retaining his majesty in that unhappy house at his last being there. His pardon under the great seal is dated 23d December 1583 Arran, however, soon after regained his ascendency in the king's favour, when a convention of the estates was held, at which those concerned in the Raid of Ruthven were declared to be traitors, and the earl, notwithstanding his pardon, was ordered to leave Scotland and proceed to France He now, unfortunately for himself, entered into a correspondence with his former associates, especially with the earl of Mar and the master of Glammis, who had both retired to Ireland, with the view of concerting a second enterprise for securing the person of the king It was arranged that Mar and Glammis with their adherents should return from Ireland, and after being joined by the earls of Gowrie and Angus, were to make themselves masters of Stirling castle. To deceive the court he proceeded to Dundee, and pretended to be making preparations for his voyage to France. The time limited for his final departure was the last day of March 1584, but he contrived, under various pretexts, to delay sailing till the 16th of April, only two days before the day fixed for the intended surprise of Stirling castle, when he was unexpectedly apprehended, by Captain William Stewart of the royal guard, in the house of one William Drummond, a burgess of Dundee. He made considerable resistance, and attempted to defend the house in which he lodged, but Stewart procured some pieces of ordnance from the vessels in the harbour, and the earl was compelled to surrender He was conveyed by sea to Leith, and committed a prisoner in Edinburgh. Hopes being held out to him that he might save his life by revealing the plans of the conspirators, he emitted a confession under his own hand, which is preserved in Spotiswood's History (page 331) He was subsequently, by the king's order, removed to Stirling, where he wrote a letter on the 30th of the same month to the king, earnestly entreating an interview in order to reveal a secret, "which," he said, "might have endangered the life and estate of your mother and yourself, if I had not stayed and impeded the same, the revealing whereof may avail your majesty more than the lives and livings of five hundred such as myself" The interview was refused, and the earl was brought to trial for high treason on the 4th of May To the charges exhibited against him he urged a variety of objections, which were all overruled. He was found guilty, and beheaded between eight and nine o'clock the same evening His titles and estates were at the same time declared to be forfeited He made a long speech on the scaffold, in which he maintained that all his actions were intended for the benefit of the king, concluding with expressing the same regret which many great men have done in similar cases, "that if he had served God as faithfully as he wished to have done the king, he would not have come to that end" Archbishop Spotiswood describes him as "a man wise, but said to have been too curious, and to have consulted with wizards touching the state of things in future times." [Spotiswood's History, p. 332]

By his countess, Dorothea Stewart, second daughter of Henry Lord Methven, he had, with seven daughters, five sons. James, the eldest son, was second earl, and John, the second son, third and last earl of Gowrie Alexander, the third son, was killed with his brother, the third earl, in what is called "the Gowrie conspiracy," against King James at Gowrie House, Perth, 5th August, 1600, afterwards referred to. William, the fourth son, retired to the continent, and distinguished himself by his knowledge in chemistry Patrick, the youngest son, an eminent physician, was confined for many years in the Tower of London, whence he was not released till 1619 The eldest daughter, Lady Margaret Ruthven, married James, fourth earl of Montrose, and was the mother of the great marquis of Montrose. All his other daughters married titled persons, three of them noblemen, except the youngest, Lady Dorothea, who became the wife of James Wemyss of Pittencrieff in Fife. An extraordinary exploit of one of the first earl's daughters, probably the youngest, is recorded in Pennant's Tour through Scotland She was courted by a young gentleman, who was held by her parents to be of inferior rank, and whose addresses were, therefore, not encouraged by her family When a visitor at Ruthven castle, which then had two towers, he was lodged in the opposite one to that of the young lady One night when the lovers were together in his apartment, some prying domestic acquainted her mother with the circumstance The countess hastened to surprise them, but the young lady, hearing her footsteps, ran to the top of the leads, and took the desperate leap of nine feet four inches over a chasm of 60 feet. Alighting in safety on the battlements of the other tower, she crept into her own bed, where her astonished mother found her, and was immediately convinced of the injustice of the suspicions entertained of her Next night the young lady eloped with her lover, and was married. The place between the two towers was ever after known as "the Maiden's Leap." After the earl's execution his countess was left destitute, and could obtain no favour from the court. At the meeting of parliament on 22d August following, the king and lords went on foot to the Tolbooth, and when they were going up the High Street, the countess of Gowrie went down on her knees, crying to the king for grace to her and her poor 'bairns," who never had offended his majesty The favourite Arran would not suffer her to come near, but thrust her down, and hurt her back and her hand She fainted on the spot, and lay on the street till they were in the Tolbooth, when she was taken into a house. "This," says Calderwood, "was the reward she received for saving Arran's life at the Raid of Ruthven"

James, the second earl, was restored to his titles and estates in 1586, and died in 1588, in his 14th year Although so young, he held the office of provost of Perth

His next brother, John, third earl and sixth Lord Ruthven, succeeded when about eleven years old He was educated at the grammar school of Perth, and carefully instructed in the doctrines of the protestant religion While attending the university of Edinburgh, he was elected, though a minor like his brother, provost of Perth In August 1594, he went to the continent to prosecute his studies, and on his departure the town council of Perth, as a testimony of their respect for the Ruthven family, bound themselves and their successors in office by a written obligation, to choose him annually as their provost during his absence He was away nearly six years, and returned to Perth on 20th May 1600, being then in the 22d year of his age. He was killed in his own house on 5th August following, with his brother, the Hon Alexander Ruthven, in an alleged treasonable attempt on the person of the king, for an account of which the reader is referred to the life of James the Sixth, post. The mystery connected with their fate has never yet been unravelled, and in all probability never will All the evidence respecting what is historically known by the name of the "Gowrie Conspiracy," will be found in Pitcairn's 'Criminal Trials of Scotland,' where the subject is ably investigated, but all the inquiries that have been made into the circumstances of the transaction leave an impression unfavourable to James, which no special pleading has yet been able to remove. The great accomplishments of the two brothers, thus untimely slain, their popular manners, generous disposition, and religious character, rendered their countrymen slow to believe their guilt, and no motive could be imputed to them for perpetrating such a crime, as an attempt to assassinate their sovereign, but that of a desire to avenge on the king the execution of their father The presbyterian clergy, in particular, entertained doubts of their treason, and the great Robert Bruce, minister of Edinburgh, was exiled from Scotland for refusing to offer up thanks in his pulpit for the king's deliverance. James himself showed a suspicious anxiety to fasten the crime of treason on their memory In 1600 appeared 'A Discourse of the unnatural conspiracy attempted against his majesty's person at St. Johnstone,' on the 5th of August that year, which is reputed to be the king's own account of the matter. He volunteered to give the city of Perth, where the Ruthven family were held in the highest estimation, a charter of confirmation of rights and privileges, besides entering his name on the guildry book as a burgess of the town The conduct pursued towards the two unfortunate young men after death showed a marked hostility to their name and house. Douglas states, (vol. i. p. 602,) that their dead bodies were removed to Edinburgh, and an indictment of high treason preferred against them. After the examination of witnesses, parliament, on 15th November of the same year, pronounced sentence, declaring them guilty of treason, and decerning their name, memory, and dignity to be extinguished, their arms to be cancelled, their whole estate forfeited and annexed to the crown, their bodies to be drawn, hanged, and quartered at the cross of Edinburgh, the name of Ruthven to be abolished, and their posterity and surviving brothers to be incapable of succeeding to, or of holding any offices, honours or possessions. The fifth day of August, the day of the king's miraculous escape, was also ordered to be held annually as a day of public thanksgiving, but, besides its never being very popular, it was soon superseded by the more memorable event of the Gunpowder Plot.

GRÆME, or GRAHAM, a surname said to be derived from the Gaelic word grumach, applied to a person of a stern countenance and manner, hence the Gothic term grim It is more likely to have originated in the British word grym, signifying strength, hence grime's dyke, erroneously called Graham's dyke, the name popularly given to the wall of Antoninus, from an absurd fable of Fordun and Boece, that one Greme, traditionally said to have governed Scotland during the minority of Eugene the Second, broke through the mighty rampart erected by the Romans between the rivers Forth and Clyde It is unfortunate for this fiction, and for the supposititious Gaelic origin of the name, that the first authenticated person who bore it in North Britain was Sir William de Græme (the undoubted ancestor of the dukes of Montrose and all "the gallant Grahams" in this country), who came to Scotland in the reign of David the First, from whom he received the lands of Abercorn and Dalkeith, and witnessed the charter of that monarch to the monks of the abbey of Holyrood in 1128. In Gaelic grim means war, battle Anciently, the word Grimes-dike was applied to trenches, roads, and boundaries, and was not confined to Scotland. Chalmers remarks that if Graham be the proper spelling of the name, it may be said to be a compound of Gray-ham, the dwelling of Gray, but if it be Græme, it is a genuine Saxon word signifying angry, fierce. Gram and Grim were English names, hence Grimsby, Grimsthorp, &c. One of the Orkney Islands is named Græmsey Graham is the spelling of the name of the witness in the charter of Holyroodhouse.

This Anglo-Norman knight, Sir William de Graham, had two sons, Peter and John, in whom the direct line was carried on. The elder, Peter de Graham, styled of Dalkeith and Abercorn, had also two sons, Henry and William Henry, the elder, witnessed some of the charters of King William the Lion. He was succeeded by his son Henry, whose son, also named Henry, by marrying the daughter of Roger Avenel (who died in 1248), acquired the extensive estates of Avenel, in Eskdale (see vol i p. 170). He was one of the magnates Scotiæ in the parliament of Scone 5th February 1283-4, who bound themselves, by their oaths and seals, to receive and acknowledge as their sovereign, the princess Margaret of Norway, the grand-daughter of Alexander the Third, in the event of that monarch's death without issue.

His son, Sir Nicholas de Graham, sat in the parliament at Brigham, now Birgham, in Berwickshire, in 1290, when the treaty was signed for the marriage between Prince Edward of England and the infant Maiden of Norway In 1292 he was one of the nominees of Bruce the competitor, when he became a candidate for the vacant crown In 1296 he swore fealty to Edward the First of England, being designed of the county of Linlithgow, his lands of Abercorn being in that county His son, Sir John de Graham of Dalkeith, had a son, John de Graham, who, dying without issue, was the last of the elder line of the original stock of the Grahams. He had two sisters, his heiresses,—the one, married to William More, who obtained with her the lands of Abercorn, and the other, Margaret, becoming the wife of William Douglas of Lugton, ancestor of the earls of Morton, conveyed to him Dalkeith and the vast property of the Avenels in Eskdale. The former (Dalkeith) came into possession of the Buccleuch family in 1642, by purchase from the then earl of Morton, and gives the title of earl to that ducal house.

The male line of the family was carried on by the younger son of Sir William de Graham first above mentioned, John de Graham, whose son, David de Graham, obtained from his cousin, Henry, the son of Peter de Graham, the lands of Clifton and Clifton Hall in Mid Lothian, and from King William the Lion those of Charlton and Barrowfield, as well as the lordship of Kinnaber, all in Forfarshire This was the first connection of the family with the district near Montrose, whence they subsequently derived their ducal title. His eldest son, also named Sir David de Graham, had, from Patrick, earl of Dunbar, in the reign of King Alexander the Second, with other lands, those of Dundaff in Stirlingshire, and in 1244 he was one of the guarantees of a truce entered into between King Alexander the Second and Henry the Third of England, who, after the accession of Alexander the Third, a boy of only nine years of age, to the throne, began that systematic attempt on the kingdom of Scotland, which afterwards under Edward the First brought so much calamity on the country The policy of Henry, during the minority of the king, who had married his daughter, the princess Margaret, was to sow dissensions among the nobility, and he succeeded in forming a party among them favourable to English interests. To this party the Grahams did not belong, and the son of the Sir David de Graham last mentioned, also named Sir David de Graham, who appears to have held the office of sheriff of the county of Berwick, was one of the Anti-Anglican or Comyn party (see vol i p 84) who were removed from the administration of affairs, on 21st September 1255, when, under the influence of Henry, a regency was appointed, with the custody of the young king and the government of the country, till Alexander should attain majority From Malise earl of Strathearn he acquired the lands of Kincardine in Perthshire, which became one of the chief designations of the family He died about 1270 By his wife, Annabella, daughter of Robert, earl of Strathearn, he had three sons, namely, Sir Patrick, who succeeded him, the celebrated Sir John the Graham, the companion of Wallace, a notice of whom is given at page 848, and Sir David, one of the nominees, his eldest brother being another, of Baliol in his competition for the crown of Scotland, 5th June 1292. Both brothers swore fealty to Edward the same year This act of homage, however, as in the case of many others of the Scots nobles, was a forced one, as in 1296 Sir David was taken prisoner by the English monarch, with his nephew Sir David de Graham They were released on 30th July 1297, on condition of serving Edward in his wars against France. The lands of Loveth or Lovat, in Inverness-shire, which subsequently became the property of the Frasers, were among the possessions of this Sir David de Graham

The eldest son, Sir Patrick Graham of Kincardine, was in 1281, sent to negotiate the marriage of Alexander prince of Scotland with Margaret, daughter of Guy earl of Flanders, which took place the following year That young prince, however, died 12th January 1283–4, and Sir Patrick sat in the general council at Scone, 5th February following, in which the crown was settled on the princess of Norway, granddaughter of Alexander the Third. He was also one of the assembly at Brigham in 1290, that agreed to the marriage treaty between the young queen Margaret, who died on her voyage to Scotland, and the prince of Wales, the son of Edward the First. He fell in battle against the English at Dunbar, 28th April 1296. Hemingford, the English chronicler, says of him in Latin that he was a stout knight, the wisest among the wise in council, and among the noblest the most noble.

His son, Sir David de Graham, a favourite name among the early Grahams, was also designed of Kincardine. He was a strenuous assertor of the independence of Scotland, and a faithful adherent of Robert the Bruce. He was one of the persons excepted out of the general conditions of the pacification made by Edward with the Scots, 9th February 1303–4, as it was provided that he should be banished from Scotland for six months. From Robert the First, in consideration of his good and faithful services, he had several grants, and he exchanged with that monarch his property of Cardross in Dumbartonshire for the lands of "Old Montrose" in Forfarshire. He was one of the nobles who, in 1320, signed the famous letter to the pope, asserting the independence of Scotland, and in 1323 he was one of the guarantees of a treaty with the English He died in 1327 Among other persons of the name who signed the letter to the pope were John de Graham and Patrick de Graham, the latter styled Chivaler d'Escoce, who for his adherence to Bruce was sent prisoner to England in 1303

Sir David's son, also Sir David, styled of "Auld Monros," accompanying king David the Second in his unfortunate expedition to England in 1346, was taken prisoner with that monarch at the battle of Durham 17th October of that year In 1354 he was one of the commissioners for negotiating the ransom of the king, and one of his hostages, as was also Sir Patrick his son He died in 1364

The son, Sir Patrick Graham, of Dundaff and Kincardine, was a commissioner to treat with the English, 30th August 1394, and died before 1404 By a first wife, he had a son, Sir William, his successor, and a daughter, Matilda, married to Sir John Drummond of Concraig His second wife was Egidia, daughter of Sir John Stewart of Ralston, the brother of King Robert the Second By this lady he had four sons. Patrick, the eldest of these, by his marriage with Euphame Stewart, countess palatine of Strathern, and countess of Caithness, became, in her right, earl of Strathern (see STRATHERN, Earl of). From this alliance their descendants quarter the royal arms of Stuart on their shield. He was slain by his brother-in-law, Sir John Drummond of Concraig, at Crieff, 10th August, 1418, (see page 64) and the principal agents in his murder, Walter Oliphant and Arthur Oliphant, brothers, were drawn and hanged for the crime.

Sir William Graham of Kincardine, the eldest son, was frequently employed in negociations with the English relative to the liberation of King James the First. Like his father, he was twice married. By his first wife he had two sons, Alexander, who predeceased him, leaving two sons, and John His second wife was the princess Mary Stewart, second daughter of King Robert the Second; widow of the earl of Angus and of Sir James Kennedy of Dunure, and after Sir William Graham's death she took for her fourth husband Sir William Edmonstone of Duntreath By this lady he had five sons, namely, 1. Sir Robert Graham of Strathcarron, ancestor of the Grahams of Fintry, of Claverhouse, and of Duntrune. 2. Patrick Graham, consecrated bishop of Brechin, in 1468, and three years after translated to the see of St. Andrews. He was brother of the half-blood of the previous bishop, Kennedy, chancellor of the kingdom, and is described as a worthy man and a prelate of primitive simplicity His election to the latter see was opposed by the Boyds, who then ruled everything at court. The bishop, therefore, secretly left the country for Rome, and there obtained his confirmation from Pope Paul the Second. At this time (1471) the old controversy concerning the claim of the archbishop of York to the supremacy over the Scottish church (see vol. i. p 55), was revived, and Graham was able to convince the pope that it was utterly unfounded He procured a bull erecting his own see of St. Andrews into an archbishopric, and the twelve bishops of Scotland were solemnly enjoined to be subject to it in all time coming. He was farther appointed the pope's legate in Scotland for three years. His proceedings at Rome excited the displeasure of the king and the envy of the clergy, while the nobility, fearing that he would put a stop to the scandalous sale of church livings which had so long prevailed, were also opposed to him. On his return to Scotland he was summoned to answer for having intruded himself into the legation, and for having carried on a negotiation with the papal court without the knowledge or permission of the king, and in the meantime interdicted from taking the title of archbishop or exercising the office of legate Shevis, the archdeacon of St. Andrews, who had obtained great influence over the mind of the king, by his skill in judicial astrology, and who had an eye to the see for himself, forged accusations against the archbishop, and agents were employed at Rome for the purpose of charging him with heresy His judges were bribed by the clergy, and it is stated that an offer of eleven thousand merks was made to the king himself to sway his mind against him The rector of his university, forcing a quarrel upon him, dragged him before his court, and formally excommunicated him In the midst of all this persecution he bore himself with meek and pious fortitude, but it broke his heart at last, and threw him into a state of distraction, from which he appears never to have recovered. Procuring him to be declared insane, Shevis obtained the custody of his person He was confined first in Inchcolm, and afterwards in the castle of Lochleven, where he died in 1478 3 William, ancestor of the Grahams of Garvock in Perthshire, from a younger son of whom came the Grahams of Balgowan, the most celebrated of which family was the gallant Sir Thomas Graham, Lord Lynedoch, the hero of Barossa, of whom a memoir is given hereafter in its place. 4 Henry, of whom nothing is known 5. Walter, of Wallacetown, Dumbartonshire, ancestor of the Grahams of Knockdolian in Carrick, and their cadets.

Patrick Graham, of Kincardine, the son of Alexander, the eldest son, succeeded his grandfather, and was created a peer of parliament in 1451, under the title of Lord Graham. He died in 1465 His only son, William, second Lord Graham, married lady Anne Douglas, eldest daughter of the fourth earl of Angus, and had two sons, William, third Lord Graham, and George, ancestor of the Grahams of Calendar, and two daughters, Jean, married to the second Lord Ogilvy of Airlie, and Christian, married, first to James Haldane of Gleneagles, and secondly, to Sir Thomas Maule of Panmure.

William, third Lord Graham, sat in the first parliament of king James the Fourth, 7th October, 1488; and on 3d March, 1504–5, he was created earl of Montrose, a charter being granted to him of that date. of his hereditary lands of

"Auld Montrose," which were then erected into a free barony and earldom, to be called the barony and earldom of Montrose. It is from these lands, therefore, and not from the town of Montrose, that the family take their titles of earl and duke. [See MONTROSE, duke of] He fell at the battle of Flodden, 9th September 1513. He was thrice married. By his first wife, Annabella, daughter of Lord Drummond, he had a son, second earl of Montrose, by his second wife, Janet, a daughter of Sir Archibald Edmonstone of Duntreath, he had three daughters; and by his third wife, Christian Wavance of Segy, daughter of Thomas Wavance of Stevenston, and widow of the ninth Lord Halyburton of Dirleton, two sons, Patrick, ancestor of the Graemes of Inchbrakie, Perthshire, of whom afterwards, and Andrew, consecrated bishop of Dunblane in 1575, and the first protestant bishop of that see

From the third son of the second earl of Montrose came the Grahams of Orchil, and from the fourth son the Grahams of Killearn From the second son of the third earl descended the Grahams of Braco, who once possessed a baronetcy of Nova Scotia, conferred on the first of the family, 28th September 1625 From the third son of the same earl, the Grahams of Scottistoun derived their descent.

The first of the Graemes of Inchbrakie received that estate from his father, the first earl of Montrose, with the lands of Fowlis and Aberuthven, also in Perthshire, (charter dated 20th June 1513,) and married Margaret Stewart, granddaughter of the duke of Albany, brother of King James the Fourth. His second son, George, archdeacon of Ross in 1575, was ancestor of the Graemes of Drymie, Ross-shire His grandson, John Graeme, second son of his successor, was the first of the Grahams of Buchlivie, and the younger brother of the latter, George, bishop of Orkney in 1615, was ancestor, by two of his sons, of the Graemes of Graham's Hall and the Graemes of Gorthy Patrick Graeme of Inchbrakie, the fifth laird, was the well known royalist officer, cousin of the great marquis of Montrose, at whose house of Tullybelton, among the hills near the Tay, that daring and chivalrous leader arrived in disguise in 1644, and who accompanied him seventy miles, as his guide, to Blair Athole, to raise his standard there in support of the king, when he commanded the Athol Highlanders, and was known as "Black Pate" In 1651 he was colonel of the Perthshire force, and on account of his adherence to the royal cause he suffered great losses, and his castle of Inchbrakie was burned by Cromwell. He himself was outlawed and imprisoned, and was only released on the earl of Tullybardine and Lord Drummond signing a bail bond for him, in 1654, that he "should do nothing to hurt the commonwealth of England nor their armies in Scotland" Major George Drummond Graeme, tenth proprietor of Inchbrakie in a direct line, fought in the Peninsular war, and was severely wounded at Waterloo. He subsequently served in the Hanoverian guards, and in 1816 was created a knight of the Guelphic order He also had conferred on him the gold cross of William the Fourth and the Hanoverian Peninsular medal.

The Grahams of the borders are descended from Sir John Graham of Kilbryde, called, from his bravery, Sir John "with the bright sword," second son of Malise, earl first of Strathern, and afterwards of Menteith (see these titles), by his wife, the Lady Ann Vere, daughter of Henry, earl of Oxford. The principal families that derive from him are those of Esk and Netherby, which both possess baronetcies, and the Grahams of Plomp, their progenitors having settled in what was called "the debateable land," a territory consisting of that portion of Cumberland lying immediately to the south of the river Esk and the Solway Frith, and so named from being a constant scene of strife between the Scottish and English borderers. The first baronet of Esk, who fought on the king's side, and was wounded at the battle of Edgehill, purchased the estate of Netherby and the barony of Liddell from the earl of Cumberland. His grandson, the third baronet, also Sir Richard Graham, was created in 1680 Viscount Preston in the Scottish peerage [see PRESTON, viscount of], and on the death of the third viscount without issue in 1739, when the title became extinct, his extensive estates devolved on his two aunts, the last survivor of whom, Lady Widdington, devised them by will, in 1757, to the Rev Robert Graham, D D., grandson of Sir George Graham, second baronet of Esk, and father of James Graham of Netherby, created a baronet 28th December 1782, and whose son is the Right Hon. Sir James Robert George Graham of Netherby, first lord of the Admiralty (1854). Richard, the younger son of Sir Richard Graham, the first baronet of Esk, was created a baronet in 1662, and was the founder of the house of Norton-Conyers, Yorkshire. The Grahams of Kirkstall, in the same county, who also possess a baronetcy, conferred in 1808, are descended from a branch of the Grahams of Esk No Scottish family of the name now possesses a baronetcy

Sir John "with the bright sword," was also ancestor of the Grahams of Gartmore in Perthshire Sir William Graham of Gartmore, created a baronet of Nova Scotia, in 1665, married Elizabeth, second daughter of John Graham, Lord Kilpont, (son of the earl of Airth,) who was slain by one of his own vassals, James Stuart of Ardvorlich, in the camp of the marquis of Montrose, in 1644, and had a son, Sir John Graham, second baronet of Gartmore, declared insane in 1696 On his death, 12th July 1708, without issue, the baronetcy became extinct, and the representation of the family devolved upon his sister Mary, wife of James Hodge, Esq of Gladsmuir, advocate Their only daughter, Mary Hodge, married, in 1701, William son of John Graham of Callingod, and had a son, William Graham, who assumed the title of earl of Menteith

The castle of Kilbryde, near Dunblane, built by Sir John "with the bright sword," in 1460, was possessed by his representatives, the earls of Menteith, till 1610, when it was sold The Menteith Grahams were called the Grahams "of the hens," from the following circumstance An armed party of the Stewarts of Appin, headed by Donald Nan Ord, called Donald of the Hammer, in their retreat from the disastrous field of Pinkie in 1547, in passing the lake of Menteith, stopped at a house of the earl of Menteith, where a large feast, consisting principally of poultry, was prepared for a marriage party, and ate up all the provisions, but, being immediately pursued, they were overtaken in the gorge of a pass, near a rock called Craig-Vad, or the Wolf's cliff, where a bloody encounter took place. The earl and nearly the whole of his followers were killed, and Donald of the Hammer escaped, amidst the darkness of the night, with only a single attendant. From the cause of the fight the Highlanders gave the name of Gramoch na Gerse, or "Grahams of the hens," to the Menteith branch ever after [See MENTEITH, Earl of]

The Grahams of Leitchtown, Perthshire, descend from the 2d son of 2d earl of Menteith, through the Grahams of Gartur, being the eldest cadet of that family, by direct descent.

The Grahams of Tamrawer, Stirlingshire, are descended from Graham of Dundaff, the adjacent barony Robert Graham, the tenth laird of Tamrawer, an eminent agriculturist, is mentioned in the Old Statistical Account as the first person who introduced the culture of potatoes in the open fields of Scotland to any extent. In Stirlingshire also are the Grahams of Airth castle, the first of whom was James Graham, dean of the faculty of Advocates and judge of the high court of Admiralty in Scotland, who died in 1746, and the Grahams of Meiklewood

The Grahams of Monkhouse, in Dumfries-shire, have held that estate in direct descent for more than two centuries. The Grahams of Duchray in Perthshire were once of some note.

The Grahams of Morphie, Kincardineshire, were an offset from the noble house of Montrose. They are mentioned as an ancient branch of the house of Graham in the reign of Robert the Bruce, and they got the lands of Morphie confirmed to them by the charters of David I In the reign of James VI., Sir Robert Graham of Morphie was knighted by his chief, John, earl of Montrose, chancellor and viceroy of Scotland, his arms being sable a chevron argent, between three escalops or (Nisbet's Heraldry) Sir Robert's daughter, Giles, married Sir William Douglas of Glenbervie, 9th earl of Angus, and was the mother of the 10th earl

Sir Robert Graham of Morphie, his son, was one of the tutors of his kinsman the great marquis of Montrose, and in 1638 he accompanied him on his first visit to Aberdeen at the head of the army of the Covenant. He continued to adhere to him during the whole of the wars in which he was engaged in Scotland, previous to his departure for the Continent in 1646, nearly to the ruin of his estate. In 1661, when Montrose's head was taken down from the pinnacle of the Tolbooth of Edinburgh, Graham of Morphie was one of the five personal friends of the great marquis present to receive it.

Margaret Graham, the mother of the last Graham of Morphie, was a sister of the celebrated Graham of Claverhouse, Viscount Dundee, having married Sir Robert Graham of Morphie. That gentleman entailed what remained of the Morphie estate on his kinsman, Barclay of Balmakewan, descended, through the 2d son of David Barclay of Johnston, from the Barclays of Mathers, or Madders, afterwards of Urie (see vol. i p 240,) on condition of his taking the name and carrying the arms of Graham of Morphie.

This Barclay of Balmakewan was grandfather of the present proprietor, Barron Graham, Esq of Morphie, who succeeded his uncle, Francis, in that estate.

The clan Graham were principally confined to Menteith and Strathern Their badge was the laurel spurge, laureola

GRÆME, JAMES, an ingenious poet, the youngest son of a poor farmer, was born at Carnwath, Lanarkshire, in December 1749 At the age of 14 he was sent to the grammar school of Lanark, then taught by Mr Robert Thomson, brother-in-law of the author of 'The Seasons' In 1766, he was removed to the university of Edinburgh, and at the close of his first session at college, he became tutor to the sons of Lawrence Brown, Esq of Edmonston

In 1770 he resumed his studies at Edinburgh, and entered himself in the theological class In the summer of 1771 he was employed as tutor in the family of Mr White of Milton, near Lanark; but symptoms of consumption having appeared, he was obliged, on the approach of winter, to return home to his parents He died July 26, 1772, before he was 23 years of age His Poems, consisting of elegies and miscellaneous pieces, were collected by his friend Dr Anderson, and published at Edinburgh in 1773, with a prefatory account of his life and character His works have also obtained a place in Dr Anderson's Collection of British Poets, where his merits as a poet are, however, much overrated

GRAHAM, SIR JOHN THE, the faithful companion of Sir William Wallace, was the second son of the knight of Dundaff, in Stirlingshire, by some called Sir John, by others Sir David, Graham, by Annabella, his wife, daughter of Robert earl of Strathern He joined the patriot Wallace in his heroic attempt to achieve the independence of his native country, and was slain, gallantly fighting, at the battle of Falkirk, July 22, 1298 He was buried in the churchyard of Falkirk, and his monument there, which has been several times renewed, bears in the centre the arms of the ancient family of Graham, at the upper part, round an architectural device, is the legend "Vivit post funera virtus," and at the lower part this inscription

Mente manuque potens, et Vallæ fidus Achates, Conditus hic Gramus, bello interfectus ab Anglis.
22d July, 1298.

The following English translation proceeds lengthwise, two lines being along each of the side margins

Here lys
Sir John the Grœme, baith wight and wise,
Ane of the chiefs reskewit Scotland thrise,
Ane better knight not to the world was lent,
Nor was gvde Grame of trvth and hardiment.

Wallace's lamentation over his dead body in the Metrical Chronicle of Henry the Minstrel, is one of the most elegant passages in that romantic and popular, though not over-trusty, narrative of the Scottish hero's exploits Blind Harry represents him saying,

"My dearest brother that I ever had;
My only friend when I was hard bestead,
My hope, my health! O man of honour great,
My faithful aid, and strength in every strait,
Thy matchless wisdom cannot here be told,
Thy noble manhood, truth, and courage bold!
Wisely thou knew to rule and to govern,
Yea, virtue was thy chief and great concern,
A bounteous hand, a heart as true as steel,
A steady mind, most courteous and genteel."

The sword of Sir John the Graham is in the possession of the duke of Montrose. It bears the following inscription, the first couplet of which is borrowed from the English translation of his epitaph

"Sir John ye Grame verry vicht and wyse,
One of ye chiefes relievit Scotland thryse,
Fought vith ye sword, and ner thout schame, Commandit name to beir it bot his name."

GRAHAM, JAMES, first marquis of Montrose, a distinguished military commander, celebrated by one party as comparable to the greatest heroes of antiquity, and branded by another as a renegade and traitor, was the eldest son of John, fourth earl of Montrose, by his countess, Lady Margaret Ruthven, eldest daughter of the first earl of Gowrie, and was born in 1612 He succeeded his father in 1626, and being the only son of his family, was soon after prevailed on by his friends to marry Lady Magdalen Carnegie, sixth daughter of the first earl of Southesk His education having been interrupted by his nuptials, he engaged preceptors to come into his house, and soon made great progress in Greek and Latin, and other branches of study. After which he spent some years on the continent, and having acquired all the accomplishments of a gentleman, returned to Scotland about 1634 Not meeting with such an encouraging reception at court as he expected, he eagerly joined the Presbyterian party, became a lord of the Tables, November 15, 1637, and was one of the most active and zealous supporters of the National Covenant on its renewal in 1638 In the following year he had the command of the forces sent to the north against the town of Aberdeen, the inhabitants of which city, then principally Episcopalians, he compelled to take the Covenant. On his approach, the marquis of Huntly, who had collected a force for the purpose of preventing a meeting of the Covenanters at Turriff, disbanded his followers, and was sent by Montrose prisoner to Edinburgh, but his second son, the earl of Aboyne, having appeared in arms the same year, Montrose marched against him, and totally routed his forces at the Bridge of Dee on the 18th of June; on which occasion the Covenanters again took possession of Aberdeen.

On the pacification of Berwick being concluded, Montrose, with the earls of London and Lothian, paid their respects to Charles the First at that place, in July 1639, being sent for to consult with his majesty as to the measures necessary to be adopted for restoring peace and prosperity to the country In 1640, the king, having raised another army against the Scots, the latter, assembling their forces, advanced into England On this occasion, Montrose, who had the command of two regiments, one of horse and another of infantry, led the van of the Scots army across the Tweed, wading through the river on foot, and he contributed greatly to the victory obtained over the royalists at Newburn, August 28, 1640

Filled with resentment against the Covenanters for preferring to himself the earl of Argyle and the marquis of Hamilton, Montrose was easily gained over by the king, when, deserting the cause he had hitherto so zealously supported, he entered into a secret correspondence with his majesty, and at a meeting at Cumbernauld in Lanarkshire, prevailed on nineteen peers to subscribe a bond to aid in restoring Charles to the unlimited exercise of all his prerogatives To destroy the superior influence of the earl of Argyle, Montrose accused him of having asserted that the estates of parliament intended to depose the king, and brought forward as his informer one John Stuart, commissary of Dunkeld, who declared that he heard Argyle make the statement Stuart, however, confessed that he had himself forged the speech attributed to Argyle, and by the advice of Montrose and others had transmitted it to the king He was in consequence tried before the high court of justiciary for his share in this transaction, and being found guilty was executed Montrose and three others were committed prisoners to the castle of Edinburgh, where they remained from June 1641 to January 1642, when they were set at liberty Retiring to his own house in the country, he lived privately till March 1643, when he went to Burlington to meet the queen on her return from Holland, and accompanied her majesty to York He availed himself of this opportunity to solicit a commission to raise an army for the king, as it was the intention of the Scots to give their assistance to the English parliament, but being thwarted in his views by the marquis of Hamilton, he again returned home Soon after he repaired to the court at Oxford, when he received a commission as lieutenant-general for the king in Scotland, and collecting some troops in Westmoreland, he crossed the border, and, on April 13, 1644, erected the royal standard at Dumfries He was obliged, however, within two days, to make a precipitate retreat into England On the 26th of that month he was excommunicated by the General Assembly, and on the 6th of May was by the king raised to the rank of marquis Anxious to show his zeal for the royal cause, Montrose attacked and dispersed the parliamentary garrison at Morpeth, and succeeded in throwing provisions into Newcastle, but the defeat of Prince Rupert at Marston Moor, in the subsequent July, compelled him, though he himself was not present in the action, to retire into the Highlands In the disguise of a groom, under the assumed name of Anderson, with only Sir William Rollock and Colonel Sibbald as his companions, he reached Strathern, where he was informed of the arrival of a body of Irish sent by the marquis of Antrim, who, after ravaging the northern extremity of Argyleshire, had landed in Skye, and traversed the extensive range of Lochaber and Badenoch In August, Montrose, in the dress of a simple Highlander, put himself at the head of these auxiliaries in Blair of Athol, and being joined by the Athole Highlanders, and others of the clans, soon found himself in command of about three thousand men With these tumultuary bands he rushed forth like a torrent from the mountains, and when he was thought by all to be utterly unable to bring a single follower into the field, commenced with them a career of victory which is almost without a parallel in history

On the 1st of September he attacked an army of the Covenanters, amounting to upwards of six thousand, foot and horse, drawn up at Tippermuir, near Perth, and without the loss of a man on his side, totally routed them, when their artillery and baggage fell into his hands The town of Perth immediately surrendered to him, but on the approach of the marquis of Argyle with a strong body of troops, he deemed it advisable to proceed northward. Twelve days after the action at Tippermuir, he defeated another army of Covenanters under Lord Lewis Gordon, a son of the marquis of Huntly, at the bridge of Dee, after which he took possession of the town of Aberdeen, which for four days was given up to the pillage of his savage soldiery

The marquis of Argyle having been sent against him with a superior force, Montrose, on his approach, retreated northward, and was pursued into Badenoch, where his army dispersed, and he himself escaped among the mountains Soon after he appeared in Athol, and subsequently in Angus, at the head of some disorderly troops hastily collected, but being pursued by Argyle, by a sudden march he repassed the Grampians, and returned to Aberdeenshire, with the expectation of receiving the support of the Gordons At Fyvie he was nearly surprised by Argyle, October 27, 1644, but maintained his situation against the repeated attacks of a superior army, till the darkness of night enabled him to retire again into the wilds of Badenoch Being joined by some of the clans, he now marched into Argyleshire, and laid waste the estates of his rival Argyle, who, collecting all the force he could command, went in pursuit of him Montrose, however, did not wait to be attacked, but surprised the army of Argyle at Inverlochy on February 2, 1645, and totally defeated them, no less than 1,500 Campbells being killed, while his own loss did not exceed three or four men in all He next traversed Morayland, burning and ravaging the country as he went along, and having been joined by the Gordons and Grants, he proceeded to the Bog of Gight, where he lost his eldest son, the earl of Kincardine, a youth of sixteen years of age, who, dying here, was buried in Bellie church After plundering Cullen, Banff, Turriff, Stonehaven, and other towns, he marched to the southward, and, on April 4, took by storm the town of Dundee, from which he was almost immediately driven by the arrival of Generals Baillie and Hurry with a superior force To intercept his return to the north, these generals divided their forces, but by a rapid and masterly movement he passed between their divisions, and once more regained the mountains, where, having recruited his forces, by one of those hurried marches for which he was remarkable, he suddenly appeared in Inverness-shire, and, on May 4, 1645, defeated General Hurry at Auldearn, near the town of Nairn, and, with the loss of 2,000 men, obliged him to retreat to Inverness On July 2 he encountered and defeated Baillie at the village of Alford, but the victory was embittered by the loss of Lord Gordon, who fell in the action With a body of about 6,000 men he now descended into the heart of Scotland, and fought a decisive battle at Kilsyth, August 15, when Baillie was again defeated with the loss of about 5,000 men

This victory opened to him the whole of Scotland, and, finding no longer any force opposed to him in that kingdom, he marched forward to the borders, with the intention of pouring his victorious army into England, and encamped at Philiphaugh, near Selkirk Recalled by the danger into which the cause of the covenant had been thrown by the successes of Montrose, General David Leslie hastened from England at the head of those iron squadrons whose bravery had been proved in the battle of Long Marston Moor, so fatal to the royalists His army consisted of from 5,000 to 6,000 men, chiefly cavalry With the view of forcing Montrose to battle, and at the same time cutting off his retreat to the Highlands, Leslie marched along the eastern coast from Berwick to Tranent, but learning that the enemy was lying secure in Ettrick Forest, he suddenly altered his direction, and crossing through Mid-Lothian, turned again to the southward, and, following the course of the Gala Water, arrived at Melrose before Montrose had any intimation of his approach On September 13, 1645, Leslie unexpectedly attacked the royalist army posted at Philiphaugh and gained a complete victory before Montrose had time even to form a line of battle Throwing himself upon a horse the instant he heard the firing, and followed by such of his disordered cavalry as had gathered upon the alarm, Montrose galloped from Selkirk across the Ettrick, and made a bold and desperate attempt to rally his flying troops, and retrieve the fortune of the day Finding, however, that all his efforts were in vain, he cut his way almost singly through a body of Leslie's troopers, and, like his scattered followers, hurried precipitately from the field He continued his retreat up Yarrow and over Minchmoor, nor did he once draw bridle till he arrived at Traquair, 16 miles from the field of battle At Philiphaugh he lost in one defeat the fruit of six splendid victories, nor was he ever again able to make head against the covenanted cause in Scotland

Retiring into Athol, Montrose succeeded in gaining the support of some of the Highland chieftains, and laid siege to Inverness, from which place he was compelled by General Middleton to retreat In the subsequent May he received orders from the king, who had surrendered to the Scottish army, to disband his forces and withdraw from the kingdom, when he capitulated with General Middleton, July 22, 1646, and, after arranging his affairs, on the 3d September of that year he left the harbour of Montrose in a small boat, disguised as the servant of James Wood, a clergyman who accompanied him, and the same evening went safely on board a vessel in the neighbouring harbour of Stonehaven, and setting sail arrived in a few days at Bergen, in Norway, where he received a friendly welcome from Thomas Gray, a Scotsman, the governor of the castle of Bergen He afterwards proceeded to Paris, where he resided for some time In May 1648 he went to Germany, and offered his services to the emperor, by whom he was raised to the rank of mareschal He was at Brussels when he heard of the execution of the king, on which he wrote the following stanza

"Great, good, and just! could I out rate
My griefs to thy too rigid fate,
I'd weep the world to such a strain,
As it would deluge once again
But since thy loud-tongued blood demands supplies,
More from Briareus' hands than Argus' eyes,
I'll sing thy obsequies with trumpet sounds,
And write thy epitaph with blood and wounds."

He subsequently repaired to the Hague, having been sent for by Charles the Second, who granted him a commission to attempt the recovery of Scotland, and invested him with the order of the Garter With arms supplied by the queen of Sweden, and money from the king of Denmark, Montrose embarked at Hamburgh with 600 Germans, and landed in Orkney in March 1650 His small army having been reinforced by the addition of about 800 islanders, he crossed over into the mainland, but as he traversed the wilds of Caithness and Sutherland, he was joined by very few of the royalist party Advancing into Ross-shire, he was surprised at Invercharron, and totally defeated by Colonel Strachan on April 27, 1650 After a fruitless resistance, he fled from the field of battle upon a horse lent him by the young and generous Viscount Frendraught, his own having been killed, but, being pursued, he quitted his horse, threw away his cloak, his ribbon, and his star, and exchanged clothes with a countryman whom he met in his way He took refuge in the grounds of M'Leod of Assynt, by whom he was delivered into the hands of General Leslie, and, in the same mean habit in which he was taken, sent prisoner to Edinburgh He was received by the magistrates of that city at the Watergate, bottom of the Canongate, May 18, placed on an elevated seat on a cart, to which he was pinioned with cords, and in slow procession, in presence of thousands of spectators, was, by the public executioner, conducted bareheaded to the common gaol Having been forfeited by parliament in 1644, sentence of death was now, without the previous formality of a trial, pronounced against him, and, on May 21, 1650, he was hanged on a gibbet thirty feet high, with the history of his exploits appended to his neck His body was afterwards quartered, and his limbs affixed to the gates of the principal towns in Scotland He bore his fate with a fortitude and magnanimity that excited the admiration even of his enemies, attesting with his latest breath his attachment to the royal cause With the most impetuous and chivalric daring, Montrose possessed a mind of unusual refinement for that stormy age, and was accustomed to occupy his few intervals of leisure with the elegant pursuits of literature The night before his execution he wrote the following lines upon the window of the chamber in which he was confined:

"Let them bestow on every airt a limb,
Then open all my veins, that I may swim
To thee, my Maker, in that crimson lake,
Then place my parboiled head upon a stake,
Scatter my ashes, strow them in the air
Lord, since thou knowest where all these atoms are,
I'm hopeful thou'lt recover once my dust,
And confident thou'lt raise me with the just."

Some other poems of his have been preserved, and a work written by him in Latin, entitled 'De Rebus Auspicus Serenissimi et Potentissimi Caroli, Dei Gratia Magnæ Britanniæ Regis,' &c, was published at Paris in 1648

After the Restoration, his remains received a state funeral On the 7th of January, 1661, the marquis' son, the then marquis of Montrose, with his friends of the name of Graham, the whole Scots nobility and gentry, with the Lord Provost, Magistrates, and Town Council of Edinburgh, and four companies of the Trained Bands of the city, went to the Burgh Muir, where his body had been buried, and having taken it up, conveyed it, with the honour befitting the occasion, to the Abbey Church of Holyrood house The other remains were collected from the various quarters to which they had been dispersed, excepting one hand which was never found, and after having lain in state for a long time in Holyrood, were borne to the church of St Giles, with a splendour surpassing that of any funeral of the time in Scotland, and there, we are told, "they still repose, in the grave of his grandfather, Earl John, immediately to the eastward of the Regent Moray's vault, in the southern transept of St Giles, which for generations afterwards was known as the Montrose Aisle"

GRAHAM, JOHN, Viscount Dundee, a royalist officer, celebrated for his hostility to the Covenant and fidelity to James VII, was the eldest son of Sir William Graham of Claverhouse near Dundee, descended from the noble family of Montrose, and Lady Jean Carnegie, fourth daughter of John first earl of Northesk He was educated at the university of St. Andrews, where, as would appear from his letters, he seems to have made no great proficiency in scholarship of any kind, being chiefly remarkable in his youth for his enthusiastic predilection for Highland poetry, and for his headlong zeal in behalf of episcopacy and the established order of things. He commenced his military career as a volunteer in the French service, but in 1672, in the war against France, he became a cornet in the guards of the prince of Orange, whose life he saved at the sanguinary battle of Seneff, in August 1674, on which occasion he was rewarded with a captain's commission A vacancy taking place soon after in one of the Scottish regiments in Holland, he applied for the command of it, but the prince, having pre-engaged it to another, refused his request, on which he quitted the Dutch service, saying, "The soldier who has not gratitude cannot be brave" He returned to Scotland in 1677, when he was nominated by Charles the Second commander of one of the independent regiments of horse raised against the Covenanters On May 29, 1679, a meeting of the persecuted presbyterians took place on Loudonhill in Ayrshire, for the celebration of the sacrament of the Lord's Supper To disperse them, Claverhouse, at the head of his own dragoons, instantly marched from Glasgow, and arrived at Hamilton 31st May, so unexpectedly, as to make prisoner Mr John King, a famous field preacher, and fourteen others, on their way to Loudonhill, he then rapidly continued his march, carrying his captives along with him, till he reached the village of Drumclog, about a mile east from Loudonhill Here those of the congregation who were armed, having skilfully posted themselves in a place which was almost inaccessible to cavalry, with a broad ditch in their front, calmly waited for the assault of the king's troops, which took place on the 1st of June The dragoons, after discharging their carabines, made an attempt to charge, but the nature of the ground threw them into confusion, and after a short but furious engagement, they were compelled to give way, and the Covenanters gained a complete victory Claverhouse himself was forced to fly, and his horse's belly being cut open by the stroke of a scythe, he escaped with difficulty In his flight he passed King, the minister, lately his prisoner, but now deserted by his guard, and the latter tauntingly cried out to him to "stay and take the afternoon's preaching!" The insurgents, as they were styled, were repulsed the next day in an attack upon the town of Glasgow, which, however, Claverhouse deemed it expedient to evacuate

When the victory at Drumclog became known, a number of preachers, gentlemen, and common people of the west, joined the Covenanters, who had pitched their camp in the neighbourhood of Hamilton Their numbers and zeal excited great alarm at Edinburgh, and the foot militia was instantly called out, and two additional regiments of dragoons were ordered from England to join the royal army, which, under the command of the duke of Monmouth, reached Bothwell Muir on Sunday June 22, 1679 The Covenanters, unfortunately, were divided amongst themselves, they were likewise deficient in subordination and discipline, and, in addition, were but ill provided with arms and ammunition, and especially with artillery They were encamped chiefly in the park of the duke of Hamilton, along the river Clyde, which separated the two armies Bothwell bridge, which at that period was long and narrow, had then a portal in the middle with gates, which the Covenanters shut, and barricaded with stones and timber This important post was bravely defended by 300 of their best men, under Hackston of Rathillet, but their ammunition being soon expended, they were compelled reluctantly to abandon it, on which the king's troops, with their cannon in front, defiled along the bridge, and formed in line of battle The duke commanded the foot, and Claverhouse the cavalry At the first discharge of their guns, the Covenanters were driven from the field with great and indiscriminate slaughter, and Monmouth in vain attempted to restrain the fury of his troops Disregarding the orders of the duke, Claverhouse mercilessly pursued the fugitives, and by his relentless proceedings acquired for himself the unenviable appellation of "The Bloody Claver'se"

In 1682 he was appointed sheriff of Wigton, in which office his brother David was joined with him the following year Both brothers, but particularly Claverhouse, rendered themselves odious from the extreme cruelty of their measures. Claverhouse himself has been accused of as cold-

bloodpd and atrocious a murder as was ever committed, that of John Brown, the Christian carrier, in 1685, with the details of which every reader of the history of the cruel persecutions of that period must be familiar Claverhouse's own account of it is contained in a letter from him to the duke of Queensberry, discovered among the collections of the duke of Buccleuch, and it clearly refutes the story, current in all our histories, that Brown was shot by Claverhouse with his own hand, and proves that Brown might have saved his life on the same conditions which were accepted by his nephew, who was captured along with him Accused of cruelty in his proceedings against the Covenanters, Claverhouse answered, that "terror was true mercy, if it put an end to or prevented war" For his services he was, in 1684, constituted captain of the royal regiment of horse, sworn a privy councillor, and had a gift from the king of the castle of Dudhope, and the constabulary of Dundee, then in the hands of the earl of Lauderdale, by paying a sum of money to the chancellor

On the accession of James VII he was left out of the commission of privy council, on pretence, that having married into the earl of Dundonald's family, it was not safe to intrust him with the king's secrets, but was soon restored He had the rank of brigadier-general in 1686, and of major-general in 1688, and was created viscount of Dundee, and Lord Graham of Claverhouse, by patent, November 12, 1688 At this time he was in London with the king, whose affairs were now becoming desperate When his majesty, on the approach of the prince of Orange, withdrew to Rochester, Claverhouse strongly opposed his departure, and undertook to collect 10,000 of his disbanded soldiers, and to march through England at their head, driving the Dutch forces before him. His offer was not accepted, and Dundee returned to Scotland with a troop of sixty horse, which had deserted from his regiment in England He was present at the convention of Estates in January 1689, but not finding himself safe in Edinburgh, he retired with his troopers from the capital; and in the beginning of May appeared in the Highlands in arms in favour of the expatriated king. General Mackay was sent, at the head of a considerable force, to oppose him, and two months were passed in great impatience by Dundee, in consequence of orders he had received from King James not to risk a battle until the arrival of some assistance from Ireland. He was accustomed, we are told, to march on foot with the soldiers, at one time by the side of one clan, and anon by that of another, flattering them with his knowledge of their genealogies, and animating them by the recital of the deeds of their ancestors, and of the verses of their bards It was one of his maxims, that no general should fight with an irregular army, unless he was acquainted with every man he commanded Yet, with these habits of familiarity, his discipline was dreadfully severe, the only punishment he inflicted was death "All other punishments," he said, "disgraced a gentleman, and all who were with him were of that rank, but death was a relief from the consciousness of crime" It is related of him, that having seen a young officer under him fly in his first action, he pretended he had sent him to the rear on a message. The youth fled a second time; when he brought him to the front of the army, and, saying "That a gentleman's son ought not to fall by the hands of a common executioner," shot him dead with his own pistol in presence of his troops. His followers chiefly consisted of Highlanders from the interior of the Highlands, with whom, as being of the blood of the marquis of Montrose, he was the object of peculiar attachment On hearing that Mackay, with 3,000 foot and two troops of horse, was advancing through Athol, Dundee marched to meet him, with about 2,500 men, and, at the pass of Killiecrankie, on June 17, 1689, an engagement took place, which ended in the defeat of the former, with the loss of 2,500 men But the victory proved fatal to Dundee, who, at the moment he was pointing to the retreating enemy, with his arm extended to his troops, received a shot in his side, through an opening in his armour, and dropped from horseback as he rode off the field. The statement that he survived to write an account of his victory to King James is not true, and the letter usually given as his, is a forgery. His remains were interred in the church of Blair-in-Athol, and with him was buried the cause of King James in Scotland.

GRAHAM, Dougal, a rhymster of Glasgow, author of a metrical history of the rebellion of 1745, and of various "chap books," at one time very popular among the peasantry of Scotland, was born near Raploch in Stirlingshire in 1724, and was at first a servant near Campsie, Stirlingshire He then became a sort of packman, or travelling dealer in small wares, in which capacity he followed both the rebel and the royal armies in 1745. According to his own statement he had been "an eye-witness to most of the movements of the armies from the rebels' first crossing the ford of Frew to their final defeat at Culloden" He afterwards became a printer in Glasgow, and ultimately was appointed bellman of that city, a situation of considerable usefulness, if not of some profit, in those days when there was scarcely any other method of advertising practised His history of the rebellion, in doggerel rhyme, is said to have been a favourite with Sir Walter Scott It was first printed under the following title: 'A full, particular and true account of the Rebellion in the years 1745-6,

> Composed by the poet D Graham,
> In Stirlingshire he lives at hame,

To the tune of the Gallant Grahams To which is added several other poems by the same author' Glasgow, 1746, 12mo The second edition, 1752, bears "printed for and sold by Dougal Graham, merchant in Glasgow" The third edition, published in 1774, was entirely re-written, without, says his biographer, being improved The work ran through several subsequent editions He was also the author of the humorous songs of 'The Turnimspike,' and 'John Hielandman's remarks on Glasgow,' and of the facetious penny histories of 'Lothian Tam,' 'Leper the Tailor,' 'Simple John and his Twelve Misfortunes,' 'Jocky and Meggy's Courtship,' 'John Cheap the Chapman,' 'The Comical Sayings of Paddy from Cork, with his coat buttoned behind,' 'John Falkirk's Carritches,' 'Janet Clinker's Orations in the Society of Clashing Wives,' &c, which contain a great deal of coarse and low humour, and long formed staple articles with the "flying stationer" and on the old bookstalls, but since the introduction of a higher and better kind of cheap literature, have become almost unknown. Dougal Graham died July 20, 1779. An account of him was given by William Motherwell, the poet, in the Paisley Magazine for 1828

GRAHAM, Thomas, Lord Lynedoch, a distinguished general, of the family of Balgowan in Perthshire, was born at the family mansion there in 1750 The progenitor of the family was William, third son of William Graham of Kincardine, of the house of Montrose, by his 2d wife, the princess Mary, 2d daughter of Robert III.; and the Balgowan Grahams were in use to carry for arms, Or, on a chief indented, sable, three escallops of the first, and in the centre a martlet of the second, within the double tressure of Scotland, as a badge of their descent from royal blood John Graham, second son of John Graham of Garvock, purchased the estate of Balgowan from James Lord Innermeath, in 1584, and on account of his loyalty and the assistance given to James the Sixth against the earl of Gowrie, he received from that monarch several of the forfeited lands on the Gowrie estate, namely, Nether Pitcairns, Craigengall, Half lands of Monedie, Half lands of Legalurie, and half of Codrachie-mill, with the patronage of the church of Monedie The subject of this memoir was the third son, and only surviving child of Thomas Graham, Esq of Balgowan, by his wife, Lady Christian Hope, sixth daughter of Charles first earl of Hopetoun He did not enter the army until he was forty-three years of age, and then under circumstances of a somewhat romantic nature His father had died on 6th December 1766, and on the 26th December 1774 he married the Hon Mary Cathcart, second daughter of Charles ninth Lord Cathcart, her elder sister, Jane, being married the same day to the fourth duke of Athol From this period till 1792 he remained a private country gentleman, cultivating his estates, and indulging in classical studies, and the enjoyment of elegant leisure On 26th June of the latter year, his wife, to whom he was most tenderly attached, died without having had any children His grief for her loss was so overwhelming as greatly to injure his health, and with the view of obtaining relief from change of scene and variety of objects, he was recommended to travel After visiting France, he went to Gibraltar, and during his sojourn there, he fell into the society of the officers of the garrison, and thenceforth determined on devoting himself to the profession of arms. Lord Hood was then about to sail for the south of France, and Mr. Graham accompanied him as a volunteer. In 1793 he landed with the British troops at Toulon, and served as extra aide-de-camp to Lord Mulgrave, the general commanding in chief, who acknowledged by his particular thanks his gallant and able services He was always foremost in the attack, and on one occasion, at the head of a column, when a private soldier fell, Mr Graham took up his musket, and supplied his place in the front rank. On returning to Scotland he raised from among his countrymen the first battalion of the 90th regiment, of which he was appointed colonel commandant, 10th February, 1794 Shortly after, he was elected the representative in parliament of the county of Perth In politics he was a whig, and after continuing M P for Perthshire till 1807, he was defeated in two contested elections in 1811 and 1812 by James Drummond, Esq

His regiment, which formed part of the army under the command of Lord Moira, afterwards marquis of Hastings, passed the summer of 1795, at Isle Dieu, whence it was ordered to Gibraltar, and on 22d July of that year he was promoted to the rank of colonel in the army He soon grew tired of the idleness inseparable from garrison duty, and obtained permission to join the Austrian army He continued in that service during the summer of 1796, and in it found ample opportunities not only of perfecting himself in the art of war, but of sending to the British government intelligence of the military operations and diplomatic measures adopted by the commanders and sovereigns of the continent His despatches, at this period, evinced, in a remarkable degree, his great talents and characteristic energy Attached to the Austrian army of Italy, he was shut up in Mantua, with General Wurmser, during its investment; but as the siege of that city continued long, and the garrison began to suffer severely from want of provisions, it was determined, at a council of war, that intelligence should be sent to the Imperialist General, Alvinzi, of their desperate situation This perilous mission Colonel Graham volunteered to perform in person. Disguised as a peasant, on the night of the 29th December, in the midst of a deep fall of snow, he quitted Mantua, which is situated on two islands formed by the expansion of the waters of the Mincio. Owing to the darkness of the night, the boat in which he was embarked stranded several times before a convenient landing place could be reached. During the night he travelled on foot, wading through mire and swamps, and in constant danger of losing his way, or of being shot by some one of the numerous pickets that were out At day-dawn he concealed himself till night, when he resumed his journey At length, after having eluded the vigilance of the French patrols, and surmounted numerous hardships and dangers, he arrived at the head-quarters of General Alvinzi at Bassano, on 4th January, 1797

A short time after, Colonel Graham returned to England, but in the autumn of the same year he joined his regiment at Gibraltar He next proceeded, with Sir Charles Stuart, to the attack of Minorca, and on the reduction of that island the warmest eulogium was bestowed by that commander on the skill and valour displayed by him Colonel Graham then repaired to Sicily, where his exertions were so effective, that he received the repeated acknowledgments, as well as various marks of gratitude, from the king and queen of Naples In 1798, with the local rank of brigadier, he besieged the important island of Malta, then held by the French, having under his command the 30th and 89th regiments and some corps embodied under his immediate direction Aware of the prodigious strength of the place, he resorted to a blockade, and after a resistance of two years' duration, the garrison were obliged by famine to surrender in September 1800

On the surrender of Malta, Colonel Graham returned to England, and being anxious to rejoin his regiment, the 90th, which had served with distinction in Egypt, (having formed the advanced guard of the first line on the 21st March, 1801,) he sailed for that country Previous to his arrival, however, Egypt had been completely conquered, and, in company with Mr Hutchinson, the brother of the commander-in-chief, Lord Hutchinson, afterwards earl of Donoughmore, he
